The Virtuous Citizens of Kentucky hav by ballot declined the offer of Colonel Breckinridge to serve them further as a representativ in Congress. He made his campaign on the strength of his experience as a public servant, and he was opposed and defeated on moral grounds, with a substratum of religious hysteria. There was a majority of two hundred opposed to him, and there is no reason to doubt that among those who voted against him were at least that number whose lives had been no more moral than his. If morality is to be made an issue in politics, the business of office seeking might as well be abandoned. There are not enough virtuous men to fill the positions, and if we resort to women as office holders we should still lack a majority of pure persons to elect them. The victory against Breckinridge has heen won on false pretenses, for it is not the Pollard who was deceived, but the woman that married the candidate, and she has not complained. Breckinridge is without doubt unfit for any position of trust for a man who will betray his wife will betray his constituents. Nevertheless, as I dispassionately view the matter, the primaries in the Ashland district hav demonstrated that Colonel Breckinridge is not the only hypocrit in Kentucky.

Canadian papers report that a half-million American settlers hav within the past year deserted their claims this side the border and taken up land in the northwestern provinces of British Columbia. No doubt of it, for the means the Canadian government has used of late to induce such emigration would be very likely to produce the result reported. Canada does not depend upon the private real estate dealer, of whom the prospectiv settler has learned to be suspicious. She has an official commission composed of substantial and corpulent gentlemen, who range the country lying contiguous to the Canadian border all the way from the Great Lakes to the Pacific coast, looking after material for subjects of the queen. I ran across one out West. His name was McLean, I think, and he weighed about seventeen stone, as they compute weight in English. He bore a card with his titles on it. He had been mayor of Vancouver, and was an esquire and justice of the peace. The card conveyed also the information that he was in government service. The land for which he sought settlers lies somewhere north of Montana. It is flat, productiv, easily worked, and cheap. Intending settlers from this country needed only to get their goods together and take the train, the government doing the rest, with the exception of paying $10 for legal services and for the publishing of final proofs. I expect that the railroad is in the scheme on account of the land boom and the coal traffic created and stimulated by the increase of settlers along its lines. I did not find out why it was necessary for ex-Mayor McLean, Esq., J. P. in the goverment service, to prospect for settlers on those terms until I asked him about the weather. Then he turned up his coat collar and shivered, and it dawned upon me that we were conversing of the country where blizzards are manufactured and sent into the United States without passing through the custom house. The pioneers in that region who do not plant trees and attach themselvs thereto with a clothes line will blow back.

The Design Argument and World Formation.

To the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The logic of your little book, "Design Argument Fallacies," seems to me not only sound but unanswerable. I take exception only to that part relating to world formation, based on the nebular hypothesis, which I hav several times controverted in THE TRUTH SEEKER and others papers. Let me briefly recapitulate my argument.

The maximum thickness of the earth's stratified rock is not less than twenty miles. There are fossils all the way down. Below a depth of thirty feet the temperature increases at the rate of one degree Fahrenheit for every fifty or sixty feet. "At this rate," says Professor Dana, "the fusing point of iron would be reached at a depth of twenty-eight miles." Accordingly, the stratified fossiliferous rock at a depth of ten miles would be heated up to one thousand degrees Fahrenheit, or nine hundred degrees hotter than the material was when deposited ages ago, with all its fauna and flora, which never could hav endured, while living, a temperature much above one hundred degrees.

Does not this fact refute the Laplace theory of a cooling world? The oldest animals and plants hav, in their fossil state, been growing hotter during all the geological ages, until those which hav not been upheaved are now four or five times hotter than boiling water.

The prodigious pressure of gravitation is the evident cause of internal planetary heat. There is no sensible radiation of internal heat through the earth's crust—not more than one-sixteenth of a degree at the surface—not a thousandth part of the heat imparted by the sun's rays. Every planet is growing by meteoric accretion. The cooling-down theory allows only eighteen million years for universal geological development. The accretion theory allows, as it were, an eternity. It is not hampered by time. There is no proof that our sun was ever any larger than it is now. On the contrary, ages of meteoric accretion must hav enlarged it. More than seven millions of meteors strike the earth every twenty-four hours.

But now comes the alleged discovery, announced ten months ago in the Scientific American, that interstellar space does not presumably convey heat radiation at all. This is what I hav for years been expecting. The writer of the article says: "We see in this the necessity for remodeling our theories upon the time required to cool the earth down." Yes, indeed, the cooling down of the sun is no longer limited to eighteen million years, as Professor Newcomb tells us in his "Popular Astronomy," but is extended to an eternity, less the comparativly infinitesimal time involved in the radiation of so much of the heat rays of the sun as impinge upon the cold surface of its planets.

The Laplace or nebular hypothesis postulates a miracle—a universe of matter fired up and left to cool down. There is no miracle involved in the accretion hypothesis. And now the alleged discovery that heat does not radiate through interstellar space demolishes at once the hypothesis of cooling worlds.

Annual Congress—Call of the Freethought Federation of America.

To the Liberals of America and Members of the Freethought Federation:

The Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation of America will be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th, in conjunction with the Annual Congress of the American Secular Union. The importance of this Congress is great. The encroachments of the church are becoming more bold and dangerous. The attempts to amend the constitution so as to place our government on a Christian basis, and to pass a national Sabbath law, are indications of the attitude of the church. It has been and is today the enemy of freedom; and we must be constantly prepared to meet its conspiracies. We can not do this as an unorganized mass. We must join forces, otherwise we shall be defeated. We need a common impulse. There must be association. Let the gathering at Chicago be the greatest yet held in America. Think of past achievements as an inspiration to something better in the future. Freethought is growing. The necessity for political action is more apparent than ever. The means of action are improving. Freethought cannot go backward; it must step forward. Now is the opportunity for union and strength. This Congress is for work. Let there be an enthusiastic rally.

Abolish the Senate.

Political may be less than religious bigotry, but not much. It is next to impossible to get theocrats to do unto others as they would hav others do to them. They resist the just demands that all church property shall be fairly taxed, and that no public money shall be used in support of any religion; and the politician will do nothing to lessen the spoils of office.

The New York state convention, still in existence, to propose amendments to the constitution, would take a good step in the direction of simplicity and economy of government and responsibility of the legislator, were it to propose the abolishment of the monarchical Senate.

How did we come to hav double legislativ bodies? The colonists, after gaining their independence of Mrs. Britain, adopted a constitution based on the declaration that all government is of, by, and for the people. But unfortunately they failed to see that the people had no more need of two legislativ bodies than a child has of two fathers.

Britain had a House of Lords, composed of barons and bishops—a house of great respectability—at that time. And our fathers thought fit to provide something near it—an upper house of more respectability. Hence we are afflicted with a Federal Senate of barons, that is, and always has been, nothing but an expensiv obstruction. Congressman Hepburn recently stated in the House that the cost of a Senator is more than double that of a Representativ; that the House, with 356 members, has but 300 employees on its payroll, while the Senate, with 88 members has 303 on its roll at a cost of $417,000.

Now the pity is that each state in the Union, big or little, has thought it necessary or proper to follow suit and saddle itself with this respectable costly obstruction—a house of lords. Consequently we hav two legislativ bodies to do the same thing; and they often quarrel (as in New Jersey recently) over the spoils. Such quarrels or differences generally end in compromises—bargains to increase and divide spoils, as in this and other states. And we now hav in this city a costly Senatorial investigating committee to expose some of the results of its own bargains.

To carry out his good plans, Tweed had to buy the Senate, and was forced to plunder this city to pay the bribes. For a like reason the city is now afflicted with four-headed departments.

Including the federal and state governments, we hav now more legislators than any three other nations combined. Consequently this country is the victim of an enormous amount of bad, meddlesome legislation. And we go from bad to worse. In 1830, the New York legislature passed but one law affecting alone this city. Now it passes over seven hundred bills annually—many of them specially devoted to this devoted city. The Senate is bound to hav a goodly share of spoil with which to reward the boys.

A monarchy like that of England and of Germany, while flattering the people with a commons or representativ body, takes good care to provide a more select "upper house" as a barrier between the common people and the crown. But, in the name of all the gods at once, why do the American people want an upper house to stand between them and their own representativs?

BEE, NEB., Sept. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As the time of my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER has expired I will take advantage of your offer to secure Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," as well as a renewal of your valuable paper, and inclose for the same $6.50.

Reading First and Best.

HAMMONTON, Sept. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 to extend my subscription. I hav to divide my means among the best papers, yours heading the list of five. I am nearing seventy-seven and may not need any long. My dear partner went over when near eighty-two, the 13th of Jan., 1893. So here I am, very lonely; hav to deny myself many pleasures to enjoy good reading. I wish I could hav had "Four Hundred Years," but hav to forbear.

PORTLAND, KAN., Aug. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which giv me THE TRUTH SEEKER two years more. Our people are getting more Liberal in sentiment, yet very few are earnest enough to pay for a Liberal paper. It is very dry here and the worst of it is we can't expect rain until I get time to pray.

I think the other gentleman is running the weather now; at any rate, it is very hot. If this is the best God can do, I say, for suffering humanity's sake, let old Splitfoot try it a while, and see if he can worst it. Yours for the truth, S. F. DAVIS.

The Spirit of '76.

FREDONIA, N. Y, Sept. 3, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 long due on THE TRUTH SEEKER. While the lamp holds out to burn I ever feel constrained to hold and maintain the spirit that wrought out the freedom of '76.

After years of experience I find THE TRUTH SEEKER the best pillar of fire that lights our principles of a free nation as founded by our fathers and sealed with their blood.

Sickness, death, and failure to get my money long since due has prevented my sending for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." But it must soon come.

PLINY SMITH.

Grape and Canister.

NEW HAMPTON, IA., Sept. 10, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.15 for nine copies of "Hero" Paine's "Age of Reason." I tried to collect enough for sixteen copies, but did not succeed. The parties named herein are all Liberals; they prefer to loan the books and when returned, repeat.

This "Missionary Scheme" is grape and canister fired in the right direction and will cause many a breach in the bulwarks of superstition.

Yours for the cause,

A Question in Science.

CHATTAROY, WASH., July 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav tried, in a feeble way, to get a new subscriber. I loan the paper to those who will take a passing notice of it, but the world is so creed-bound that few can be found who will come out and pay for a so-called Infidel paper to be seen by their friends. I do for truth's sake what scarcely anyone else dare do in this community, come boldly out and speak my sentiments in opposition to theology.

Inclosed find money order for one years' subscription. Will some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER inform me as to the probable cause of the variation of the magnetic needle as shown by scientific men of late? Giv me the places on the globe where the magnetic meridian runs due north and south in both hemispheres? Giv me the facts as to the constant variation or vibration of the needle from one side to the other for a series of years, if such changes hav been recorded as to the same place on the globe. By answering me they will greatly oblige a student of the suspected causes of magnetic vibration.

J. B. JOHNSON.

A Pension for Every Laborer.

HARLAN, IA., Sept. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: For the purpose of securing the voluntary retirement of the surplus productiv labor. The productiv capacity of labor so far exceeds the demands of use that many laborers are, and of necessity always must be, unemployed in order to avoid over-production.

Is there any room for controversy on this thesis, or are there any "weak points" in it? It is not a theory but a condition that admits of an ocular demonstration—a fact that is verifiable from reliable labor statistics. What else might we expect when we consider that steam, electricity, wind, water, and other forces, are so extensivly applied to operate improved machinery?

Or is it necessary to point out the disadvantages of over-production, which always results in greater inequality of distribution?

A time of famin, when nature is so unfruitful that the whole industrial population is pressed into service to secure even a scant supply, does not cause as much want as a time of plenty when only one-half of the laborers produce more than is needed, leaving the other half unemployed and destitute. Over-production thus inflicts more destitution than famin.

The "weak point" of our present industrial system is its lack of an equitable distribution of the products of labor. This can be secured only by an equitable distribution of labor itself. "If no man work neither shall he eat." Our system is so arranged that some work all the time, making it necessary that others should be idle all the time; but if it were so arranged that each would be idle just as much as equals his share of the surplus labor then every one could get his share of work. To realize this we propose "a pension for every laborer" on condition that he shall cease from all productiv labor. The pensionable age to be fixed so that the number thus pensioned shall equal the number which, to prevent over-production, must be unemployed. The amount of the pension to be sufficient to secure its voluntary acceptance by the pensionable laborer. In the advocacy of this scheme I cannot discover the least necessity of antagonizing anyone's political views or religious faith. I would very much like to enter more into the details, and giv additional features of the proposed scheme, which with other things must exclude the immigration of foreign labor. As a means of raising the revenue to meet the expenditures made necessary by this scheme, I would suggest a graduated tax on labor, or wages, increasing in ratio to the amount of wages received; also a graduated tax on incomes. But the Editor has cautioned me to be "brief," so I must close. I do not put this forth as a defiant challenge to "controversy." I only wish to know —"you know." I presume that remarks are now in order. J. K. P. BAKER.

Questions Not Answered.

TILLAMOOK, OR., Sept. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I am a constant reader of your paper, and consider it the best paper in the United States, I take the liberty of sending you this communication, hoping it may find place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We hav been having a course of lectures here by Mrs. Kehm Smith, of Oregon City, assisted by Miss Nettie Olds and Mr. W. P. Smith, and it has been as good to us unregenerate who do not believe that rams' horns are artillery as a lovefeast would be to the godly. They gave four lectures here at Tillamook, two at Bay City, one at Nehalem, and one at Fairview, and had crowded houses at every place. And the way they scored the musty dogmas of the past was simply astonishing. I think those people are doing a grand work in Oregon and Washington, and they are doing it without compensation. Of course since they left here, the sky-pilots and their followers hav been answering them, and the less informed they are the more ready they are to undertake the task.

We hav here at present a gospel tent, run by Seventh Day Adventists. They are telling us that Christ is about to come again, but I fail to see how they know, as the good book says none but the father shall know, not even the angels in heaven. How, then, can Adventists in Tillamook find out? This Adventist preacher tells me that when Christ said to his disciples, "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away until all these things be fulfilled," he meant whatever generation happens to be here at his coming. I also asked him to preach a sermon on the origin of the devil or sin. He said he would if I would write out the questions I wanted answered. So I gave him the following:

1 "And God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good." Gen. i, 31.

2. "I make peace and create evil. I the Lord do all these things." Is. xlv, 7.

3. "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?" Amos iii, 6.

4. "Therefore I gave them also statutes that were not good and judgments whereby they should not liv." Ezek. xx, 25.

5. "Now, therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee." 1 Kings xxii, 23.

6. Is evil good? Is lying good? Is deceiving good?

7. Did God create evil or not? If not, how can the above be true?

8. If God created evil or the devil, is he not responsible for his actions?

9. If God could destroy the devil, but will not do so, does it not prove that God approves of his works?

He set his time to handle this subject, and I gave notice of the same; and the tent where these meetings are held was full of people, most of whom were skeptics. He got up and read the questions just as they appear here, but failed to giv us any light on the matter. I told him this morning that the only difference between himself and me was, his God was my devil.

Yours for truth, C. E. REYNOLDS.

Failure at Topolobampo.

COCOSIT, SONORA, MEX., March 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received many letters of late from persons who hav read my articles in your paper. They tell me of the hard times in the states and want to come to Mexico.

The Topolobampo colony scheme of A. K. Owen has turned ont to be a delusion. I left there three months ago after being in it a little over three years, and when I left there was nothing growing nor any food in camp except cornmeal. The ditch filled up with sediment, and no water runs in it except twice a year at times of high water. There are six or eight at the bay fishing and turtling to keep alive about twenty families who cannot get away. These people all liv in their old tents or brush houses and there is no prospect of anything better.

Things would hav gone all right, I think, if the ditch could hav been kept open, but Owen or his agent sold everything as fast as it was grown and the people had to kill Mexican beeves to keep from starving at times, and a lawsuit came every few days until everybody was so sick and tired that they gobbled up what they could and those who were able to travel struck out like the children of Israel, for nearly all the horses had died either of starvation or the glanders. We journeyed for eleven days and got one hundred and eighty miles from hell—or Topolabampo, which is all the same.

I think that at least six thousand people hav come to the colony since I went there, but not over fifty are there now. Alvin Wilber, who has been Owen's agent for seven years, has finally been made to let go and another man has been appointed to handle the cash. The ditch is in the care of a Mexican officer.

A. J. Streetor was down here and I think he will make it hot for Owen one of these days. There are men here who hav a bag full of Owen's railroad bonds, ditch scrip, home scrip, checks, cash credits, commissary checks, preferred stock, and the deuce only knows what else. I hav known fifty dollars of this paper to be offered for a meal and one thousand dollars for an old saddle. There is not a thing in Owen's new city except a graveyard. But too much cannot be said in praise of climate, soil, and natural opportunities.

We are one hundred and eighty miles up the coast from Topolobampo, on the Yaqui river; a large ditch is being dug here; it will be one hundred miles long—that is, the whole system—and will cost a half million dollars. A fifteen thousand dollar dredging machine is now at work and a section of twenty miles of the ditch is contracted to a man who is to finish it in the next twelve months. Good land can easily be got of this ditch company, which owns five million acres, or from the Mexican government, which is anxious for Americans to come in and settle here. The country is new and there are no schools whatever, but I am thoroughly satisfied that there are grand opportunities here. The government will giv settlers land. Our people, who left Topolobampo —about eighty in number—hav located here on a tract of nineteen thousand acres, which the government has promised us. The river runs through this tract. It is a large stream of splendid water and the soil is excellent and easily cultivated. There is plenty of good timber and the country is full of game. We are forty miles from the coast, where there are great quantities of oysters, turtles, clams, shrimp and such like, and a single man who is used to roughing it will not miss it much to come to Mexico. Many people send me postage stamps from the States; they are worthless to me here and I havn't the time to answer one-tenth the letters I get.

Yours for truth,

A. BUTTERFIELD.

Freedom of Thought—A Colloquy.

GUY'S STORE, TEX., Aug. 20, 1894.

INTERLOCUTOR: Well, yes, Mr. Smith, but has a man the right to think?

SMITH: Certainly a man has the right to think.

I.: Then if he has the right to think, has he not also the right to express his honest thoughts?

S.: Of course he has; for no honest man claims a right that he is unwilling to accord to his fellow-man.

I.: I am truly glad, Mr. Smith, to learn that you are a man possessed of so great a spirit of generosity. Well, then, hav you ever read the Holy Bible? And if so, what do you think of it?

S.: Oh, yes. I hav read it here and there, and when I was a boy. I believe every word in the blessed book to hav been written by men inspired of God.

I.: Do you not think it a strange fact, Mr. Smith, that there is a disposition among clergymen to denounce, calumniate, and misrepresent a man whose opinion respecting that book happens to differ from their own?

S.: Yes—strange—somewhat.

I.: I think I understood you to say you believe every word of it?

S.: Yes, that is what I said.

I.: Believe it was caused to be written by an omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, infinitly loving and merciful father?

S.: Yes, sir; I believe that very thing.

I.: I would like you to define belief, Mr. Smith.

S.: Well, sir, belief is another word for credulity. To illustrate, a man is said to believe when he throws open his mouth like a young bull-bat and swallows bugs or horseshoe nails—no matter which.

I.: Mr. Smith, since you are a gentleman who thinks one ought to express his honest thoughts, I beg to differ from you as regards your definition of belief.

S.: Let us hear from you then.

I.: Belief is a thing the result of evidence as presented to a man's intellectual faculties. Belief is formed in no other way. This being so, man cannot by any possibility control his belief. To illustrate, I draw here a geometrical line. Now, the evidence, as presented to your intellect, forces the belief that the above character is nothing more nor less than a geometrical line, though I may tell you it is not a line at all, but a gold mine, and promis that if you will only believe it to be a gold mine it shall be yours without money and without price. Do you, Mr. Smith, believe that to be a gold mine?

S.: I can't say I that I do; nor, since you hav required me to believe a thing which my reason condemns as absurd, can I hav any confidence in your redeeming the promis you made me upon condition of my believing it.

I.: To be candid, Mr. Smith, I cannot censure you for your answer. What would you think of the author of a command that reads thus: "Now go and smite Amalek and utterly destroy all that they hav, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass"?

S.: My honest belief, sir, is that such a command could proceed only from a bloodthirsty fiend.

I: I thought you said you believed the Bible?

S.: Yes, sir, I said it and I meant it.

I.: I want to tell you, Mr. Smith, that that command is in the Bible, 1 Sam. xv, 3.

S.: It must hav been given by the devil.

I.: I think it was given by the so-called opposit of the devil. But, by whomsoever given, do you not think it a little brutal?

S.: I told you, sir, that I believed every word in that blessed book. Blasphemy, blasphemy!

I.: But hold a bit, Mr. Smith; you will please define blasphemy.

S.: Sir, a man is a blasphemer when he speaks disparagingly of the church or any of its adjuncts.

I.: I beg to differ from you again.

S.: What then?

I.: Blasphemy—invented by a priest—is an epithet bestowed by superstition upon honest inquiry. Mr. Smith, hav you read recently the eighth chapter of Daniel?

S.: No, sir, I hav not. Read it please; you hav the book. · · · Well, well, well, a profound mystery. I don't know.

I.: What do you understand by mystery?

S.: Mystery is the depth of meaning in such chapters as you hav just read and in the remainder of the book of Daniel, in all the book of Revelation, and, in fact, one-half at least of the whole Bible.

I.: Mr. Smith, I beg to differ from you once more in the matter of defining words.

S.: What then?

I.: Mystery is the Mother Hubbard dress in which ignorance apparels nonsense.

S.: Well, I must be going; but before taking my leave I'd like to hav you giv me the names of the chapters you referred to.

I.: Yes, with pleasure; 2 Sam. xiii, 2 Sam. xi, Num. xxxi. DR. LACEY.

Has Made A Discovery.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Aug. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You are battling manfully against religious fanaticism and proscription. But I of late hav come to the conclusion that alchohol in its debauching and demoralizing influence is a more potent factor in controlling legislation and dictating the policy in our government than either bigotry and superstition or a blind religious enthusiasm.

Rum and religion are allied and the church would sooner fellowship with the rum power and industry than with Freethought and religious liberty. There is a sympathy between religion and rum, because drink and drunkenness carry on no open warfare against superstition; so that in the eyes of the fanatics, they are not advocates of Freethought or Infidelity.

The rum oligarchy now virtually and literally dictates the policy of both old political parties in most of the states.

In nominating candidates for office the rum interest must be consulted and the liquor-selling and consuming element be secured by providing men and measures for their approval, in order to get the needed drinking and drunken vote, so essential in most of the states to hav a majority. The great mass of church voters join with the rum voters to keep their favorit party in power. Rum and religion combined are more than a match for all the Freethought and Infidelity in the land. They will outwit and outvote the Infidels, and scoff at their feeble efforts.

Church or religious people hav little regard or concern for the morality or character or religious principles of the candidate if he keeps them to himself, and if he can secure the rum vote and keep the party in power, and caters in his politics to both rum and religion he is good enough for them.

We hav drunken congressmen and religious congressmen, and they will act and vote together to secure legislation, or to prevent legislation against their respectiv interests. They fraternize in loving fellowship to support their mutual interests. A beautiful exhibition of this tender affection was very striking in Senator Quay's Sunday-closing bill for the late Columbian Exposition.

Rum and religion must unite and work together, because they can do so much good for each other and for the country. This same happy feeling exists in most of our state legislatures, in political caucuses, and in local primary meetings.

Liberals may fight the encroachments of the church and fanaticism, but while these hav such a powerful ally in the rum traffic they can make no appreciable show in self-defense. The purblind multitude do not see this alliance between rum and religion to rule the country; nor do they know that our bungling, drunken legislation in the interests of rum, religion, and capital is the cause of the financial crisis and our present industrial anarchism.

It is all folly and a waste of energy to work for any reforms or for the abolition of our social, commercial, and industrial evils while we ignore or connive at this league between the rum and the religious forces. The occupations of both are profitably followed because of the help they receive from each other.

Rum makes business for the church in trying to save sinners and criminals that drink and drunkenness produce; a source that supplies the chief cause for churches and church work. We can readily see the cause for the sympathy and near fellowship existing between them. The rum power can more than neutralize all the Infidels can do against religion by its fidelity to the church, its best friend. Liberals should bombard this alliance and either break it up or force it to the open, and self-defense; either to abandon or justify its complicity.

Fifty years ago Stephen Foster and Parker Pillsbury proved the "American church and clergy a brotherhood of thieves," and the "bulwark of American slavery." To-day they are the bulwark of the rum traffic, and the political companions and comrades of drunkards and drunkard-makers at the polls.

Then they hated and persecuted the abolitionists who were the prohibitionists of slavery and slave-holding, and fraternized with the slave-holder.

Habitual drinkers whose brains are saturated, hardened by alcohol and made obtuse to any accurate or acute sense or delicate conception of justice or of the rights of others, care very little who rules or how much others suffer, provided they are at liberty to carry on the traffic, and luxuriate on the earnings of others, millions of whom their traffic dooms to misery and premature death, besides instigating to nearly all the crime and poverty in our country. Liberals who take no interest in this question and refuse to protest against this outrage, or vote for parties who license and sustain it, hav never been enlightened or half converted to the principles they profess, and are but acting in concert with a corrupt church to keep the government under rum rule and Liberals in subjection to the church dicta.

Because some prohibitionists are church members and are acting with the bigots against Liberalism, it will be found that with a majority of those it is from a belief that they can hav more influence with their church brethren in converting them to prohibition by not antagonizing them in their bigoted religious notions; believing that the arguments converting them to prohibition for the good of man would soon convince them that the welfare of man is more important than their superstitious notions in regard to their imagined duties and special services to please God.

All the majority of church people need is the light to bring them to more rational and intelligent views of human rights.

We must not conclude because the church papers publish articles and some pulpiteers thunder their bigoted notions, that any large proportion subscribe to or advocate their narrow views. They go to church and to the polls more to please the pastors and their political leaders than from any enlightened views of religion or politics.

My acquaintance with church prohibitionists convinces me of this fact, and under the circumstances no intelligent Liberal should show himself so illiberal as to refuse to join with them in helping to abolish the saloon traffic from the land.

An Attack Resisted.

RICHMOND, VA., Aug. 17, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In the Richmond State of August 14th I read an article, "Will Bob Ingersoll Ever Suicide?" The paper was handed to me by a friend of my own belief when on the train leaving the city for several days' absence; hence delay in replying. The article was signed, "C. J. A." Now, Mr. C. J. A., in my endeavor to defend Robert Ingersoll against your charges, I will follow you closely.

You start out by complimenting the editor for some "just comments" he made upon the evil influence of Ingersoll's teachings. Those comments I did not see, therefore I will be silent concerning them.

Then you proceed by saying that "it is strange that they should hav any influence at all; they certainly hav none with those who know what he is, for he has proved himself the veriest pretender in every rôle in which he has appeared except perhaps that of a lawyer." That assertion is as false as it is malicious. Robert Ingersoll in belief and principle is no pretender, and C. J. A., if he be a scholar, knows that. He must also be lacking in knowledge if he does not know that there are hundreds if not thousands of people in every city who know what Colonel Ingersoll is, and admire him as a teacher of truth, learning, and sound philosophy.

Now let me quote the second paragraph; he says: "Take him first as a champion of Infidelity. In this rôle he has made a great show of intellectual acumen, and of profound philosophical thought. To listen to him, one would think that the true teachings of history, logic, and philosophy were never understood until the white light of his clear intellect was thrown upon them. The greatest minds heretofore hav only groped like blind men in their search for truth; it remained for him to soar away far above the mists of ignorance and superstition, and with his eagle eye take in the whole domain of human thought, and perceive and point out the true relation of all its parts. From this lofty vantage ground he discovered that there was no God, and that religion was a fraud."

In reply I will take the liberty to say that Ingersoll does not deny the existence of a God. But one thing he does affirm, and he is correct. He says that the book that you call the Bible is not the revealed word of God. It is a divine blessing indeed to mankind that Robert Ingersoll has sufficient genius, courage, and language to unfold in such an able manner the transformation of heathen mythology, under the manipulation of adroit men, into a system of priestcraft that keeps hundreds of millions of the human race in ignorance and holds them in subjection as dupes of delusion. C. J. A. saw fit to throw a sneer at Ingersoll's "modern" philosophy. Ingersoll's philosophy is modern only in so far as common sense and religious liberty are modern, and with these laws of our free country cannot and will not interfere. There has been Ingersoll belief since the time of Elijah's translation; the children heard their parents laugh at the pretension, and very naturally laughed at Elisha and said, "Go up, thou bald head." It was priestcraft that said that two she-bears came out of the woods and devoured the children (the meaning is, that God sent the bears to gobble them up). There has been Ingersoll belief throughout the ages, and the only barrier to this belief being made public was the persecution, iron shackles, and the death sentence of dogmatic priestcraft. Galileo was put behind the bars for saying that the earth moved. The publishers of Paine's works were put behind them. But I need not mention to any well-read man the hundreds of men who suffered persecution in a similar or worse way. Is it any wonder that Robert Ingersoll takes advantage of the civil and religious liberty of his day? Where would Robert Ingersoll hav been three hundred or even two hundred years ago, had he lived then and advocated what he does now? The teaching of that priestcraft has been the great and chief barrier to the progress of science, learning, and civilization.

There hav been men of perhaps equal greatness for centuries past, and any and every well-read student of history knows that priestcraft, in all the denominations, suppressed Freethought, and I dare you to come out and deny this and back your denial with historical facts. When theologians tell you that the teaching of the Bible brought about civilization they are going against the records. It was the overwhelming tide in the progress of science that compelled theologians to retreat and modify their assertions concerning many of the more glaring errors of the Bible and theology.

Robert Ingersoll is an extraordinary production of human nature; his acquirements are due to close application. His honesty and citizenship are above reproach; he is bold enough to be honest and honest enough to be bold; he is not afraid to think and to say what he believes. His object in this day of liberty and freedom of speech is to let men know the truth; to pull away the curtains and open to the gaze of the wide world that private apartment, "the holy of the holies," where the high priests entered only once a year. And if he did gain that lofty vantage ground he made no secret of it. He did not, like Moses, pass a death sentence on either man or beast that should come near to touch the mount. He does not preach for tithes, but the theologians are jealous because he can make an honest living by telling the truth, and thereby shake to atoms the doctrins of mystery, miracle, and prophecy.

C. J. A. knew no better than to assert that Father Lambert's little pamphlet, "Notes on Ingersoll," ground him into an impalpable powder. I hav read the pamphlet, and a ten-year-old school boy could digest it before breakfast.

It certainly grinds you to a powder to know that you and all your theological host hav never been able to stagger him or shake his understanding.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Sleepy Man.

When the sleepy man comes with the dust on his eyes,
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)
He shuts up the earth, and he opens the skies.
(So hush-a-by, weary, my Dearie!)

He smiles through his fingers, and shuts up the sun;
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)
The stars that he loves he lets out one by one.
(So hush-a-by, weary, my Dearie!)

He comes from the castles of Drowsy-hoy Town;
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)
At the touch of his hand the tired eyelids fall down.
(So hush-a-by, weary, my Dearie!)

He comes with a murmur of dream in his wings,
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)
And whispers of mermaids and wonderful things.
(So hush-a-by. weary, my Dearie!)

Then the top is a hurden, the hugle a bane,
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)
When one would he faring down Dream-a-way Lane.
(So hush-a-by, weary, my Dearie!)

When one would he wending in Lullaby Wherry
(Oh, weary, my Dearie, so weary!)

After the Shower.

The gav little flowerets
Are sparkling with fun,
They seem to look up
And make love to the sun;
He smiles softly down
From the cloud-curtained sky,
And they open their wings,
As if ready to fly.

The birds e'en rejoice
That the shower is o'er,
Their music sounds sweeter
Than ever before;
They fly to their haunts
In the emerald hower
And warhle in harmony
"After the shower."

Secular Education.

[Mr. Louis Levine sends us the following, one of the National Secular Society's tracts, London, England. It embodies our own views in relation to the education of children, and should be read and pondered by all Liberals.—ED. C. C.]

Now that the struggle between Christianity and Freethought, Religion and Reason, is becoming every day more accentuated, every day, every hour more bitter, it is of the highest importance that we should arm our children to meet the foe, and nowhere shall we find a more efficient weapon than in Secular education. Everyone who sends his child to school and allows it there to receive Bible teaching is doing that child and the Freethought movement an infinit amount of harm. I know it is said: "If we withdraw our children from religious instruction they are shunned by their schoolfellows, taunted, scoffed at, and their little lives made miserable." Unfortunately this is in a great measure true. but not to the extent that we might at first imagin; for if the child, having at home the example of honest, upright parents, be himself honest and upright, he soon livs down all such unpleasantness and is respected and honored by the whole school. It is not merely that a certain portion of the child's day is employed uselessly when he might be learning how to make his own life, and the lives of others, better, happier, and more beautiful, or when he might be in the fields gathering in a store of health. It is far worse than this; the time occupied in Bible teaching in school is time employed for the child's lasting injury, for from the Bible he learns that to trick, to lie, to cheat, has been conduct not only passed without blame, but followed by actual reward. It is not a negativ harm he receives but a positiv moral poison.

If we wish our children to be honest we must not let them hear the Bible read in school, lest they hear how Jacob lied to his blind father Isaac and thus stole his brother's blessing, a theft indorsed by God. To teach them that mere repentance covers the sin of theft is a direct encouragement to dishonesty. To instill into the young mind that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance, is a strong incitement to vice and crime. If we want our children not to lie, we must be careful no one holds before them the example of Peter, who thrice denied his master, and yet was given by that master the keys of heaven; nor must we teach them the story of Ananias and Sapphira, because when once they hav proved by personal experience that a lie does not mean sudden death, they will not only cease to believe in the punishment, but in the wrongness of the lie itself. Let us rather teach them to be honest, not to lie, nor steal; that dishonesty, lying, and theft are evil because one lie breeds many, and a liar is never to be trusted, but is despised and feared wherever he goes, always carrying with him suspicion and hate.

If we wish our children to be brave we must beware how they are taught that when one cheek is smitten they must turn the other; we must be careful how they hear that when Jesus was in sore distress all his disciples "forsook him and fled—" disciples held before children as examples and models. To giv them moral courage enforce upon them that a pure concience is as an armor of proof. To make children physically brave we must first hav them physically healthy. Next we must explain to them dangers they are likely to meet with, neither exaggerating nor depreciating their gravity. If we exaggerate we make the children fearful and timid; if we depreciate they go insufficiently prepared to meet the danger and get trodden under in the fight. We must bid them be wary of defiance, but stout of defense.

If we tell our little ones how men hav suffered and died for their opinions, let us rather point to Spinoza and Giordano Bruno than to Jesus Christ.

Do we want our children industrious? Then we must not teach them to follow the example of the lilies of the field. Do we want our children just and generous? Then we must not let them hear how Jacob bargained with Esau before he consented to relieve the pangs of his brother's hunger, or how Christ cursed and blighted a fig tree because it had no fruit upon it when he happened to pass by. Do we want our children sober? Then we must guard them from such teaching as this: "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more." If we wish our children to hav a clear and distinct idea of right and wrong we must avoid putting into their hands a book which contains such contradictory moral teaching as the Bible.

In school the child's education should be secular; but yet I would not hav him grow up without teaching upon the subject of religion.

A child goes to a board [public] school and hears for the first time the word "god." Perhaps a favorit playmate says to your astonished little one: "My mother says that your father is a very wicked man, he doesn't believe in God, and I am not to play with you any more." The child wonders, comes home, and asks: "What's God, father? Don't you believe in God?" Perhaps you answer, "Little children should not ask questions," or something to that effect. The child goes away unsatisfied and uneasy. To avoid that I would hav you yourselvs in your leisure hours teach your children about all religions. Tell them that in the world there are many religions which hav all grown out of ignorance. How religions hav appeared and disappeared; how when man did not understand the running water there was a water god; when he did not understand the natural causes which brought about good and bad seasons then the deity who had charge of agricultural operations was pleased or angry. Tell how, even long after a cause has been removed, its ill effects unhappily remain, and although the world is rapidly growing less and less ignorant it cannot escape from the toils of its manifold superstitions with equal rapidity.

I would hav parents talk to their little ones of Thor, Woden, and Freia, worshiped by our Saxon ancestors, explain to them that that was a worship belonging to a barbarous age, and that there are not many people who believe in the Thunder God to-day. Tell the children, too, of the beautiful fancies of the Greeks, of Zeus, of Pallas, and the host of gods and goddesses. Neither omit the Jewish God Jahveh; explain that, lacking as this superstition is in beauty or high moral teaching, nevertheless thousands of their brothers and sisters are still in its toils. Tell of Brahma, of Buddha, of Allah, of Krishna, of Christ, of Mohammed, and their millions of worshipers. Moreover, never lose an opportunity of making comparisons between these different beliefs, and note to your little student how all hav grown out of the hydra-headed dragon, Ignorance. Let the children be shown the temples frequented by Protestants and Roman Catholics; take them inside and point out the images and idols. Then show them pictures of Buddhist and Mohammedan temples, or take them into a museum and show them models. Let them there look at the scores of idols worshiped by different peoples, and having shown the Madonna and child in the Catholic temple, point out Isis and Horus in the museum. Put all these legends and myths on the same footing to the child and then when he hears the word "god," he will not be cast into a state of uneasy wonderment as to whether his father really is wicked, but will hav a feeling of tender pity toward his little friend that he too has not a father or mother to explain to him that his god is but one of many, and all created out of man's ignorance.

When the child is old enough to think and judge a little for himself, then the Bible should be put into his hands. He will find it a very curious, interesting, and in some parts beautiful, piece of literature; but his brain will then be trained to distinguish between the good and bad in it, and he will be prepared to study, not to worship it. HYPATIA BRADLAUGH.

Ideas of God.

From LUCY W. PHELPS, West Sutton, Mass., aged seventeen:

What are my ideas of God, and what should God represent to the future Freethinker? God is an appellation which has been and is used to represent something that is indiscernible, and ever will be. It is merely an imaginary idol which those people who hav not broken the gyves that bind them to superstition, those who hav not progressed with the age in which they liv, worship, as their creator. That God's origin was caused through ignorance of ancient people is ostensible. Thus God is unavailable to the future Freethinker. He should base his structure upon truths, not myths; on knowledge, not ignorance. God can represent only a stumbling-block in the future Freethinker's path.

RIGHT LIVING. By Susan H. Wixon. Pp. 292; price, $1. For sale by the Truth Seeker Co.

This is a bright, cheerful, happy-making book that brings a blessing wherever it goes. Therefore, where ought it not to go? There is nothing dull, stupid, or preachy about it; it merely samples out and pictures the best ways to liv. We are "in it" and hav no choice but to liv, Colonel Ingersoll on suicide to the contrary notwithstanding, so we had better make the best of it and liv as comfortably, pleasantly, usefully, happily, and blessedly as we can. This book was written by one of the Angels to show us how. It is happy-making because it drops so much so easily. If most of us had tried to write a book about "living" we would hav fallen into religions or philosophies or sociologies or at least ethics or morals, and so hav sunk out of sight—at least common sight. The author illustrates life—self and social life—hopeful, healthful, and enjoyable, by showing its phases in chapters.

She starts out with old Goethe; he, and not Solomon, was the wisest man; that is, Goethe when he was old, and had sobered out of his younger pranks, though he could never hav held a candle for Solomon as to them, but he finally summed up the wisdom of the world in three words, "Remember to liv!" (Gedenke zu leben.) That is the sum, if not the motto, of this book, and its sixty chapters are pictures, descriptions, and "tips" as to how it is to be done. The chief end of man and life is life itself—not to "glorify" some god or shy some devil. The proof of the book is, that such a life is what we and everybody out of the lunatic asylum want or ought to want, and so what the world wants. Without boasted learning or casuistry we hav a healthy, free-growing life pictured in its sixty various aspects, and by looking them over we can always find by contrast what we want to help us out, so that we may be good and useful and even agreeable. Will our friends who will use rum and tobacco and compel us to catch their breaths please read the chapters on Temperance, Tobacco, Habit, Cleanliness, and Politeness and Best Society? Except for a kiss every face should keep at least two yards off from every other?

But there is no authority or censorship in the book—no lessons from Censor Anthony Comstock. Its cure for the bad is not repression or repulsion, but contrast, assimilativ and healthy growth, which soon rejects or transforms the bad into the good. To do this we hav only to step out of the old rotten authority—God and devil, heaven and hell "morals" of fear, hate, envy, punishment, and celestial bribery—into the clear light of science, social attractions and motivs, to find that, as the author and the Wise Man say, "Living will teach you how to liv, better than preacher or book." Yes, but it is right good to learn a great deal of life by the unlucky and unfortunate experiences of others instead of our own. In that lies the great practical value and attraction of works of this kind. George Eliot sought to illustate a similar idea in her "Theophrastus Such," following the "Characters" of good old Theophrastus, the famed successor of Aristotle. But their pictures were gross and of special vices personified, such as "the Miser," "the Glutton," etc. Our author quite otherwise, and in a way modern and original, givs us the good aspects of healthy characteristics upon which modern evolution throws the emphasis of our age. She drops every word of the old lingo, theological or philosophical. Her keynotes are like these:

"Humanity is a unit—a body. We are parts of the whole. · · · Therefore we shun those acts that hold the sting of pain and regret."

"Nothing that we hav seen or known is more wonderful and beautiful than the mind [life] of man. To aid its process of growth and development, its highest unfoldment, is the object of this book."

"When the eyes of ignorance are opened evil will disappear."

"Right living is human helpfulness—that is, wisdom."

"Anything that tends to the elevation of humanity is moral."

"The result is to be: My life a profit and a delight."

The temptation is to keep on gathering these pearls by which the quality of goodness described in each chapter is adorned, but that won't do for us. We must for that turn the book over to the reader. It will be a permanent delight, a ray of sunshine and of goodness in every household, school-house, or lonely room in which it may enter; a constant friend, "As though a sister's voice reproved," and yet reproved by example and persuasion rather than by command. T. B. WAKEMAN.

"Dynamic Theory," by James B. Alexander—"An attempt to show that organic beings are both constructed and operated by the dynamic agencies of their respectiv environments"—is a recent octavo volume of 1,065 pages and 400 illustrations by a Minneapolis scientific author. Mr. Alexander is a writer of the Darwin and Spencer school, and in his volume works out in detail a theory which is in harmony with that on which Darwin's works were based. Commencing with embryology, the author traces the development of the human being along all lines, and draws evidence from every department of science. Nine chapters are devoted to the testimony of geology. Botany and zoölogy are exhaustivly drawn upon. Even physics and electricity are made to bear witness, while physiology and anatomy are made the subject of a score or more chapters. In the chapters on the ego or personality, Mr. Alexander argues that the "feeling of personality" is a union of sensations. He says that ego is a true case of e pluribus unum. When Tommy wants a drink, the various organs and functions speak through Tommy's mouth. Mr. Alexander admits that his theory subverts the theory of the immortality of the soul. If the mind is an aggregate of phenomena, it ceases or dies, he says, when the body which maintains it ceases existence. The union of sensations ceases when the sensations fail. This is true, he thinks, whether the soul be considered material or immaterial. When the body and brain go, the machinery for the production of mind is destroyed. The continuation of our identity, he concludes, is to be accomplished, if at all, by the continuation or reconstruction of our bodies, that is, by a resurrection. The work is suggestiv of thought, and will prove interesting even to those who may radically differ with its conclusions. The style is clear and the arrangement of arguments is synthetical and easy to follow. The work is well worth perusal.—[Spectator, Minneapolis.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreadful disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A MAIDEN lady of Penzance owned a parrot, which somehow acquired the disagreeable habit of observing, at frequent intervals: "I wish the old lady would die." This annoyed the bird's owner, who spoke to her curate about it. "I think we can rectify the matter," replied the good man. "I also hav a parrot and he is a righteous bird, having been brought up in the way he should go. I will lend you my parrot, and I trust his influence will reform that depraved bird of yours." The curate's parrot was placed in the same room with the wicked one, and as soon as the two had become accustomed to each other the bad bird remarked: "I wish the old lady would die." Whereupon the clergyman's bird rolled up his eyes and, in solemn accents, added: "We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord?" The story got out in the parish, and for several Sundays it was necessary to omit the Litany at the church services.—London Freethinker.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. R. P. FELLOWS,

Say where you saw this advr. Vineland, N J

☞ I wish to say that I am an out-and-out LIBERAL, and I trust the Freethinkers of the land will give me their patronage and not waste their time and money on Christian doctors.—Dr. Fellows.

Gems of Thought.

MY reason rises to proclaim
Against your Bible. Shall I be Held guilty? Speak! Who gave to me
The reason that rejects the same?
—Kenneth Lamar.

BUT if there be in glory aught of good,
It may by means far different be attained,
Without ambition, war, or violence;
By deeds of peace, by wisdom eminent,
By patience, temperance.
—John Milton.

DO NOT get between the four walls of a denomination, and close all the windows and ventilators, and lock the doors, and die from all human use to the chant of priests. Do not fear that your freedom will betray you or your courage will suffer ignoble decrease in hours of crises.—Horace L. Traubel.

WITH family governments as with political ones, a harsh despotism itself generates a great part of the crimes it has to repress; while on the other hand a mild and liberal rule both avoids many causes of dissension, and so ameliorates the tone of feeling as to diminish the tendency to transgression.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is true that we find ourselvs less able than our ancestors to mete out pains and penalties to those who share the same human nature as ourselvs. It is true that "rigor and vigor" are less in vogue in our ethical practice, as they are in our critical methods. But is it true that our new attitude toward crime and sin is due to a lower ethical tone? Is it the case that we hav really gone backward, and that we are retrograding to a past moral type?—London Chronicle.

IT is our duty to make ourselvs acquainted, so far as we can, with the universe around us, and every part of it; to know what is known of sun, moon, and stars, planet, comet, and nebula; of beast, bird, and fish, tree, herb, and fungus; of human origins and human life; of institutions and laws, the right and wrong of them. It is our duty to search and probe into all these things; taking nothing for granted, accepting nothing on authority, testing all we are told by teacher or preacher, by priest or savant, by moralist or schoolmaster.—Grant Allen.

THE world has grown tired of preachers and sermons; to-day it asks for facts. It has grown tired of fairies and angels, and asks for flesh and blood. It looks on life as it exists to-day—both its beauty and its horror, its joy and its sorrow. It wishes to see all; not only the prince and the millionaire, but the laborer and the beggar, the master and the slave. We see the beautiful and the ugly, and know what the world is and what it ought to be, and the true picture which the author saw and painted stirs the heart to holier feelings and to grander thoughts. It is from the realities of life that the highest idealities are born.—C. S. Darrow.

OUR literature should be the clear and faithful mirror of our whole world of life, but at present there are vast realms of thought and imagination and passion and action, of which it is not allowed to giv any reflex at all or is allowed only to giv a reflex so obscure and distorted as to be worse than none. But, it may be objected, suppose Satyrs come leering into your mirror and Bacchantes whirl before it? I answer that the business of a mirror is clear reflection; if it does not faithfully image the Satyr, how can it faithfully image Hyperion? And do you fear that the Satyr will be preferred to Hyperion, when both stand imaged in clear light before us? It is only when the windows are curtained, when the mirror is a black gulf and its portraitures are vague dark shadows, that the beautiful and the noble can pass undistinguished from the hideous and the vile.—James Thompson (B. V.).

POPULAR Rationalism is that most dreaded by the clergy now—they do not so much object to Rationalism in the philosopher's study or from the professor's chair. They know, however they may affect to despise it, that Freethought is a growing and a living force, progressiv and advanciv with or without organization—a part of the spirit of the time. Their own relaxing grasp of dogma, its less and less prominence in their preaching, are manifest signs of the age. They show that the final Armageddon will be between Rome and Rationalism; because Rome is changeless, and Rationalism must absorb all that will not fuse with Rome. When that day comes, who can doubt the issue? In the conflict between light and darkness, between good and evil, in the grapple between truth and falsehood, only one result is possible—the victory of Civilization and Rationalism over Barbarism and Benightedness. Adown the far vista of the future, then, we gaze, and we behold it fair and full of promis.—Alvin Blake, in Bradford Truth Seeker.

A MONOTONOUS REHASH OF PROPHETICAL NONSENSE.—Amos i, 3, 6, 9, 11, 12; ii, 1, 4, 6.

News of the Week.

THE Republicans of Connecticut hav nominated C. Vincent Coffin for governor.

BY the burning of a mattress factory in Washington on Sep. 17 four lives were lost.

A DESTRUCTIV cloudburst occurred in Carroll county, Ark., on Sept. 22. Two lives, at least, were lost.

THE apple crop this year is in excess of that of 1891, although the quality is below the average, except in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa.

JEAN BAPTISTE DE ROSSI, the distinguished Italian epigraphist and archæologist, died in Rome on Sept. 20. He was born on Feb. 23, 1822.

EX-VICE PRESIDENT LEVI P. MORTON received the Republican nomination for governor of New York on the first ballot. Charles T. Saxton was selected for lieutenant-governor.

DURING the last week there hav been tornadoes in the Indian Territory, in northern Iowa, and in Minnesota, destroying much property, and sacrificing about seventy-five lives. Leroy, Minn., was very badly damaged.

THE South Carolina Democratic convention indorsed both the Ocala (Populist) and Chicago platforms and nominated John Gary Evans for governor. The coinage of silver at 16 to 1 was demanded, and the national administration was not mentioned.

INVESTIGATION shows that in the lower wards of this city many of the schoolhouses lack air, light, and sunshine. In a large number of rooms the gas has to be kept constantly burning, the play rooms are very small and often foul-smelling, and really good ventilation is impossible.

THE New York Republicans, in state convention assembled, refused to put themselvs on record against the spirit of the A. P. A., although begged to do so by prominent Catholic Republicans. This party, like all others, though in a greater degree, is between a cross fire of Catholic and Orange votes.

APPOMATTOX Court House, where Lee capitulated, has been changed to Surrender by the post office department, the old and new Court Houses of Appomattox county being a constant source of confusion to the postal officials. Many of the prominent Confederate veterans are protesting against the new name.

THE official canvass of the votes cast at the Democratic primaries in the Ashland district of Kentucky shows that W. C. Owens received 8,074, W. C. P. Breckinridge7, 819, and—Seattle 3,405, thus giving Owens a plurality of 255. Colonel Breckinridge says that he will not contest the decision of the central committee.

PROFESSOR ELY, of the state university of Wisconsin, was tried for sociological heresy on charges preferred by State Superintendent Wells. He was acquitted, the trial committee finding that his writings are not socialistic, and that he had not aided strikes and boycotts, either generally or in specific instances.

THE water supply of Jersey City comes from the Passaic river, and has long been of the poorest, the river being contaminated with almost all kinds of filth. At last the citizens, efficiently assisted by some of the New York papers, hav succeeded in getting the authorities to act, and the prospect is now good for pure water.

THE Ohio Democrats nominated Milton Turner for secretary of state. Senator Brice was present and succeeded in preventing a vote of censure for his antitariff reform action at Washington, but could not get an indorsement. He was very severely scored in the convention by John H. Clarke. Tom L. Johnson got a plank into the platform demanding the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. The platform indorses the administration except as regards the silver issue, free and unlimited coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 being demanded.

UP to Tuesday of this week Democratic state conventions hav been held in twenty-three states and Republican in twenty-two. Of the Democratic, these hav declared for free coinage or its equivalent: Ohio, Arkansas, Michigan, Oregon, North Carolina, Idaho, Nevada, and Wyoming. Among the Republicans free coinage is favored in Idaho, Nevada, Wyming, and California; in Ohio, the latform, though different from the Democratic in form, is essentially the same; in Alabama the Republicans supported the Knolb party, which action placed them practically on the free silver platform; in Kansas they advocated the coinage of the American product and the imposition of a tax on imported silver.

ON September 17th a great battle between the Japanese and Chinese fleets was fought at the mouth of the Yalu river, resulting in a decisiv victory for the Japanese. Four Chinese ships were sunk, and three others caught fire, while still others were severely damaged. Three Japanese war vessels were badly torn, but only one had to put back to Japan for repairs, the artificers on board the others being able to restore them to fighting trim. The Chinese fleet was convoying transports carrying troops to reinforce the army in Corea. The soldiers were disembarked, which appears, under the circumstances, equivalent to their surrender to the Japanese. A large additional force has been landed by the latter nation at Seoul. The Japanese war loan of $30,000,000 was very promptly taken at home.

THE new general army order issued by Secretary Lamont makes many important changes in the disposition of the federal army. Nine posts are abandoned: Fort Wood, on Bedlow's Island; Fort Ontario, Newport Barracks, Kentucky; Mount Vernon Barracks, Alabama; Fort Mackinac, Michigan; Camp Pilot Butte, Wyoming; Fort Bowie, Arizona; Fort Marcy, and Fort Supply. The Third and Sixth cavalry and the Thirteenth and Seventeenth infantry will come east, in whole, or in part, while the Twentieth infantry takes station at Fort Leavenworth. The Department of the East will gain 19 companies, while the Platte loses 7, Colorado 4, and Dakota 8. The East will now hav 119 companies at 31 posts, and there will remain west of the Mississippi 245 companies at 49 posts. There are also 7 Indian companies in the West. Indian scouts will be discharged and enlisted men take their places. These changes will materially reduce expenses.

Agents Wanted!
We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 40 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, October 6, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year

THE OLD HYPOCRITE OF THE VATICAN.—NONE SO BLIND AS THOSE WHO WILL NOT SEE.

All agree and there can be no question whatever that some remedy must be found for the misery and wretchedness which press so heavily at this moment on the large majority of the very poor. · · · The concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals, so that a small number of very rich men hav been able to lay upon the masses of the poor a yoke little better than slavery itself.—Leo's XIII's Encyclical on Labor.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Bruno to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificen work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

Religious Teaching is Sectarian Teaching.

We hav shown repeatedly that the word "sectarian" means one thing in the mouth of the Freethinker and quite another on the lips of the Christian. We must always be understood to mean that any and all religious teaching in the public schools is "sectarian" teaching, within the only proper definition of the word, when used in this connection. The Christian, on the contrary, when he protests against "sectarian" instruction has in mind only the inculcation of the distinctiv tenets of the subdivisions of the Christian church. He does not believe that the repeating of the Lord's prayer, the singing of hymns, and the reading of the Bible come under the head of "sectarian" teaching. He denies, explicitly or by implication, that to tell the child that there is a God, that Jesus is the savior of the world, that the soul is immortal, that the Bible is God's word, and that our moral system came from heaven, is to teach "sectarian" dogmas. He does not use "sectarian" and "religious" synonymously. Until this fact is accepted as a matter of course by all Freethinkers they are sure to be deceived by the vociferations of Christians who claim to be opposed to all "sectarian" instruction, and who misleadingly assert that they favor the total separation of church and state. It is the failure to see this which is responsible for the mistakes made in regard to the animus and purposes of our latter-day "patriots." In whatever we read bearing on this phase of the educational question we observe this inaccurate and confusing use of the word "sectarian." For instance, in one of the last discussions of the educational amendment in the Constitutional Convention Mr. McKinstry said that he believed "no harm resulted from the reading of the Bible in the schools so long as sectarianism was not taught." This seemingly utter inability of the Christian to comprehend the fact that the reading of the Bible in the schools is itself the teaching of sectarianism should bring home to the mind of every Freethinker the conviction that there must be no entangling alliances with men and parties whose only conception of the secular state is of a a government in whose laws Protestantism and fundamental Christianity are supremely enthroned. It is such a state that the National Reformers, the Sabbatarians, and the self-styled "patriots" are making a practically united effort to establish.

"Freethought and Liberalism" — and Mr. Green.

The communication from Mr. H. L. Green which we print in another column is a remarkable article —and a characteristic one. In it the Freethinkers of the United States are invited to turn their backs on a fellow-Liberal who has incurred the displeasure of a minister, and has, by the initiativ of that minister, been caught in the meshes of an unconstitutional federal law, under the operation of which he may be sent to prison for more years than if he had been convicted of wrecking a savings bank and defrauding hundreds of widows, orphans, and poor men out of all they had laid by for a time of stress. Nay, this is not the worst—not only are Liberals asked to desert J. B. Wise in his time of need, but they are invited to join forces with his prosecutors and giv their moral influence and contribute their money to help in his undoing. Unless we are very much mistaken as to the temper of the Liberal men and women of this country, Mr. Green has said the word that will open the pocketbooks of the friends of justice from Maine to California, from Washington to Florida, and pour a generous stream of free-will offerings into the treasury of the Wise Defense Fund. This will be the best possible answer to the sophistical arguments of Mr. Green in advocacy of desertion in the face of the enemy.

Mr. Green does J. B. Wise gross injustice in his assertions and insinuations. He declares that Mr. Wise knew that the passage which he transcribed was obscene, and that there was no point in sending the card to Mr. Vennum if the passage was not obscene. On the contrary, Mr. Wise wished to bring home to the consciousness of the preacher the conviction that the Bible is a human production, marked with the imperfections inseparable from all the works of man. We very much doubt if he even thought that he was violating any law. If he believed that the quotation was obscene, he was as poorly informed as is Mr. Green regarding what constitutes obscenity. It is readily admitted that it is coarse, that it is vulgar, measured by the standards of to-day, although one of the two words in it most commonly objected to is still in use in works dealing with agricultural operations, but it is not obscene within the proper meaning and the common meaning of that word. Obscenity has to do with the anatomy and physiology of sex and with sexual relations. Common vulgarity and coarseness are not obscenity. Webster givs these as the synonyms of obscene: "Impure," "immodest," "indecent," "unchaste," "lewd." There are secondary definitions, which might giv a slight justification for the use of the word obscene as Mr. Green has employed it, but we think that it cannot be disputed that common usage requires us to limit it as we hav indicated. There is neither sense nor justice in magnifying the offense of Mr. Wise, if he has committed an offense. Let the truth be told. The Bible is obscene if Shakspere is, if Smollet, and Fielding, and other classical works are. That it is coarse and unfit for children to peruse, we all know who hav read it, for when the Bible was written, and when the King James translation was made, the standards of literary refinement were different from what they are to-day, but there is no evidence to show that there was any intention to raise obscene images in the mind of the reader, or that the contemporaries of the writers thought them lacking in delicacy; and this is the only really fair test of an author's purity, as an author. The Freethinker points out to the Christian numberless parts of the scriptures which are not in harmony with the literary taste and the moral requirements of the age, and he asks him why, on the supposition that a perfect God wrote the Bible, or inspired the writing of it, these things are in it. He wishes him to explain how it is that infinit wisdom could not prepare a code of moral law that would not in a few years become offensiv in much of its phraseology to those even who accept the work as a whole as God's testament to them. The Freethinker asks the Christian why it is that he is not willing to condemn the Bible in its entirety for the offense of certain parts, while he is so eager to forbid the privileges of the mails to reformatory and physiological works which contain only a few passages or words which even approach the Bible in directness of expression. But Freethinkers, as a class, are not prepared to surrender one of themselvs to the tender mercies of Christian prosecutors because he has asked a minister these legitimate questions. They are not ready to help punish Mr. Wise for doing with an infinitesimal part of the Bible what Christians do with perfect impunity with the whole. Nevertheless they will continue to strongly insist that, if we are to hav a censorship of the press and mails on alleged moral grounds, the Bible shall not be exempt from its rules of exclusion. If the jury convict Mr. Wise they must convict the Bible. If they do not convict him they must let the other classical works alone. That is the point we are striving to impress upon biased minds. But this insistence on the impartial enforcement of a bad law does not put the Liberals (Mr. Green designates them as "so-called" Liberals) under a moral obligation to join in a man-hunt with a crippled Freethinker as the object to be destroyed.

Our critic says that Freethinkers hav always maintained that certain parts of the Bible are obscene, but now that we hav an excellent opportunity to demonstrate the fact in a court of justice and send the offender to prison, we are found raising funds for his defense. Let Mr. Green speak for himself, but not for all other Freethinkers. Our position has always been that the Bible is obscene and indecent if any work in circulation is, if "Cupid's Yokes," for mailing which Mr. Bennett was imprisoned, is; but this is not tantamount to a declaration that obscenity is an offense of which the national government should take cognizance and in the attempt to detect and punish it set a gang of illiterate and impure-minded mousers at the task of ransacking our mail bags for the purpose of confiscating whatever they, in the profundity of their ignorance, think is unfit for their betters to read. The United States had no business to interfere in this dispute between Mr. Wise and Mr. Vennum at all, and it is not our intention to hav the old man out in Kansas sacrificed for the glory of these Christian spies and robbers, or that a minister may win in a theological dispute, if we can help it.

There is something more to be said: From the tenor of the letter of H. L. Green we get the impression that he thinks that Freethinkers should, if they had the power, suppress the circulation of the Bible, on the ground that it is an obscene book. He says that in mailing one verse of it Mr. Wise has certainly violated United States law, and that if we join in the prosecution of the gentleman we can, in all probability, establish a precedent that will enable us to bring a successful action against the Bible society. We could understand that there might possibly be something gained by such a course of action if the purpose was to secure thereby the modification or repeal of the Comstock statute. But it is very probable that Mr. Green would find that the first effect of an adverse decision of a suit involving the mailability of the Bible would be an amendment exempting it from the operation of the statutes against obscene literature. It would be affirmed that, although primitivly plain in its phraseology, in some parts, it must not be defined as obscene within the meaning of the statute.

As Mr. Green appears to approve the Comstock law as it stands, and as he unreservedly affirms that the Bible is obscene, we are driven to the conclusion that he would be disappointed if the success of the suit against Mr. Wise should result in lessening the rigor of the law or in its abrogation, and that he is prepared to advocate the exclusion of that volume from the mails if it is once adjudged obscene by any federal court. We do not believe that any considerable number of American Freethinkers are willing to join in such a crusade. We do not believe that after working for years for the repeal of the Comstock law they are now in favor of it and its enforcement. We do not believe that they even favor the interdiction of the circulation of the so-called sacred book of their opponents, though it certainly should be suppressed if "Cupid's Yokes" should.

It is the duty of Freethinkers to defend freedom of expression and to stand by comrades put in peril for exercising their constitutional rights as American citizens.

We are sorry that Mr. Green has joined Comstock's crowd, but we hav been through this fight once before, when Mr. Green was "shifty," and, as we said in the beginning, this letter of his is characteristic.

A Hint for the Sunday "Rest" People.

It has been our pleasant task to point out to the Sunday law advocates the absurdities of their claims for their pet hobby. When they hav said that it is plainly decreed by nature that man must rest one day in seven whether he does or does not wish to do so, and that Sunday is the day, we hav demonstrated that nature far more distinctly indicates that man should sleep at night and work in the daytime than that he should work six days and rest the seventh, and that therefore the law, if it has properly anything to do with aggressivly regulating the hours of labor and of leisure, should forbid night work, which is unquestionably more injurious than Sunday toil. Of course the theocrats hav not made, or attempted to make, any reply to this, for they realize that to consider the question even thoroughly exposes the hypocrisy of their talk about "rest" and the "poor oppressed laboring man." But now comes a distinguished writer with the suggestion, seriously made, that the state should legislate for the prevention of night work. Of such labor, Bjornsterne Bjornson says in the Revue des Revues:

"It ruins men's health, perverts their tastes, and is as effectiv in lowering the standard of intellect as the abuse of alcohol. The state ought to legislate in the matter. If state employees and the schools were made to begin work at sunrise and to cease work at mid-day (or two hours later if necessary), this reform would soon lead to others. Noon would again be noon, and all shops would be closed early in the afternoon; evening would once more be evening as in former times. The theaters would be open from four to seven, or from five to eight, and between nine and ten everything would be closed and all lights would be out, as at present in the country, where people hav not yet ceased to work during the day and sleep at night. Such a reversion to 'elders' hours' would do much to alleviate the evils from which society is at present suffering."

Will the National Reformers take hold of this suggestion and make it one of their demands? If they will and can carry it through, they will lay out one of their most cordially detested enemies. The morning newspaper necessitates night work, and a law forbidding night work would seriously cripple the Sunday paper, if it did not kill it outright. However, it occurs to us on second thought that it would be just like the worldly publishers to make the Saturday editions so fascinating that the people would remain at home on Sunday to read them instead of going to church, which reprehensible conduct is precisely what makes the real pious people hate the Sunday morning sheet so intensely, as the cause of this wholesale neglect of the "means of grace."

From all the facts and speculations of geology and their analogies, a reasonable presumption is made out that the earth as a planet existed for an indefinit and very long period prior to the appearance of man. The time has forever passed when the crude speculations of former years concerning the age of the earth, based on a chronology whose sole purpose was to exhibit the succession of events in the special history of man as related to God's revelation, will be required as a test of orthodoxy. · · · We believe that 'in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' Between that and the subsequent transactions, culminating in the earth's becoming habitable by man and his appearance, there is a possible if capacious enough to include longer periods than any geologist has ever supposed.—Christian Advocate.

The attempt to read the results of scientific investigation into the Bible will deceive only those who are disposed to take the say-so of their self-constituted leaders, instead of carefully studying the scripture story for themselvs. Science had to fight its way through and over the fiercely resisting armies of theologians before it could secure respectful attention, saying nothing of acceptance, for its message, and it was not until that message could no longer be doubted or rejected that it was discovered in the Bible! But not in its entirety; only bit by bit was it found there; not one scientific truth was "harmonized" with the Bible so long as there was the ghost of a chance to doubt it, ridicule it into obscurity, or terrorize its discoverers and propagators. The reason that the scientific explanation of the origin and development of the earth and its inhabitants was not earlier found in the Bible was that it was not there, is not there. Had the book never been handicapped with the load of alleged divine inspiration no sane man or woman would ever hav thought of asserting that it was anything greater than the more or less accurate record of the beliefs and acts of a barbarous people who were almost wholly ignorant of the facts and laws of the world in which they lived—who did not even know the shape of the earth, or that there could be no day or night were it not for the sun. But the Christian found himself in a terrible dilemma—he had been taught to believe that the Bible was the perfect work of a perfect God, and when the patient student of nature asked him to accept as true theories that were flatly contradicted by that sacred work and facts of which it knew nothing, he was horrified and enraged. He rejected the theories and disputed the facts as long as he could, but when the evidence became absolutely irresistible he set himself to the desperate task of saving his beloved book by "harmonizing" it with science. The work of "reconciliation" has been going on for a very long time, and every reconciler has done as Dr. Buckley does, that is, he has attempted to make the Bible harmonize with science, for not the most reckless of them ventured to attempt the reverse process.

The Christian Advocate asserts that between that "beginning" in which God is said to hav "created the heaven and the earth," and "the subsequent transactions culminating in the earth's becoming habitable by man and his appearance," there is all possible room for the longest geological periods. What then becomes of the "six days" of creation? If the writer of Genesis did not intend the first verse of the first chapter of that book to be an introductory summary of the detailed description which follows it, the Christian is estopped from maintaining that the work of creation occupied but six days, and that God rested on the seventh day, thus instituting the Sabbath. In Ex. xx, 11, we read:

"For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

That seems to include the entire work of creation. Turn now to Genesis, and, beginning with the second verse of the first chapter, read the description of the successiv steps of world- and man-making, and you will see at once that the "six days" were entirely consumed in what Dr. Buckley calls the "subsequent transactions." Not a moment is left for that creation of "heaven and the earth" "in the beginning," and therefore the conclusion is inevitable that God occupied more than six days in the creation of the earth and "heaven." He occupied six days in "subsequent transactions," which included the making of "heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is"—plus the unknown time that he devoted in the "beginning" to the creation of "the heaven and the earth." If the Christian Advocate is right, God made "heaven and earth" twice. Such is the ridiculous outcome of the latest attempt of a noted Christian to reconcile the irreconcilable. The entire "plan of salvation" hangs upon a wholly inadmissible construction of those ten poor little words which constitute the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis. How low hav the mighty fallen!

"About Books."

THE TRUTH SEEKER recently announced the publication of two new books written by men who hav not previously appeared as authors. One is "Religion and the Bible," by F. D. Cummings of Maine. It is a work that should at once win the writer a good place among contributors to Freethought literature. The other new book is "The Better World," containing Dr. E. B. Southwick's thoughts on religion and civilization, set forth in a very readable manner. Along with this announcement THE TRUTH SEEKER had a suggestion to make to the substantial men of Freethought to whom we put the question, Why not write a book? and we argued as follows: In view of the disputes that arise concerning every prominent man's religious belief, after he is dead, a record over his own hand has become a necessity—almost a duty. If his family or immediate friends do not agree with him, they are likely, at his death, to accord him religious burial, deny all truthful accounts of his actual convictions, and destroy whatever newspaper articles or private writing from his pen might prove him to hav been a Freethinker; while his obituary, tombstone, and epitaph will perpetuate the falsehood that he has "fallen asleep in Jesus." The course we hav suggested—the publication of a book, if no more than an autobiography, to be a part of his last will and testament—will render such a fate impossible. And there are other advantages of authorship, which will readily suggest themselvs. In further elaboration of this subject we stated that the Truth Seeker Company is in the printing and publishing business, and possesses all the facilities for turning out first-class work. Any faults of composition due to an author's unfamiliarity with literary labors are corrected by competent revision. This Company's imprint upon a publication insures it a home in the book world, while our advantages for securing it circulation among the class it is intended to reach are not enjoyed by any other house. We believe that the Truth Seeker Company's claim to be the headquarters for all Liberal literature is conceded. Our terms are as low as those of any other house that does good work and pays standard wages.

The question, then, Why not write a book? is still a proper one to ask, and in connection with it we are glad to refer to the communication of Mr. W. C. Sturoc, of Sunapee, N. H., printed this week among the Letters of Friends.

Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, is of altogether too "materialistic" a mind to preach acceptably for those of his brethren who hav a large development of spirituality. Some of his observations must positivly shock them. He commented recently on the changed attitude of a once noted lecturer who has modified his former Materialistic views and accepted belief in future existence. Dr. Buckley quoted the lecturer as saying that, "while the view is not to be sustained by positiv proof, there is sufficient evidence to justify the belief." Then the preacher adds:

"None ever denied that Mr. —— is an able man. But there is little advantage, over Materialism, to be derived from 'modern Spiritualism.' Indeed, if one had to choose between Agnosticism or even Materialism, and accepting the rubbish predicated of 'our friends that hav left the form,' if we took the trouble to choose, it would not be 'modern Spiritualism.'"

We do not see how Dr. Buckley can look upon the phenomena of Spiritualism as inherently improbable so long as he believes in the continued existence of the soul. Granted that it is a fact that man livs after the cessation of his visible bodily activities, it should not be difficult to conceive of his remaining in communication with his old associates or of his forming new friendships among those who yet liv "in the body." We are afraid that Dr. Buckley is not always perfectly frank with himself or with the world.

Capt. Silas Latham dropped in the other day and left a ten dollar bill for the Utah Fund. He wants to see a state out there in the mountains with a constitution which guarantees the equal rights of all without regard to their opinions on the subject of religion.

That advertisment under the cartoon tells its own story and so we do not need to say much here about the long-delayed but no less welcome "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Those who hav subscribed for the volume will know all about it, while those who hav not will never know how valuable it is until they hav followed the wise example of the pioneers. The books will be mailed as rapidly as possible, but it will take some days to wrap and ship the eleven hundred copies already ordered.

Archdeacon Farrar says that perhaps the mass of men would hav greater belief in the worth and goodness of sermons if "they could see more marked difference between the lives of professing Christians and those of ordinary men." Christianity set up an anti-natural and irrational standard for the guidance of conduct, and now her teachers wonder that the resulting hypocrisy has driven her disciples to an extreme which is equally irrational and which is also anti-social.

Some time since the Sun told of the drilling and camp life at Long Beach of sixty boys of the "Boys' Baptist Brigade." This organization was formed about a year and a half ago at the suggestion of Rev. M. R. Deming of the New York City Baptist Mission Society. We are told that it "is a means of interesting the boys in their Sunday-school work." They range in age from nine to seventeen years. No doubt the training these young gentlemen are receiving will be invaluable to them when they are under the necessity of turning the left cheek to their foes after the right has been smitten. We should imagin that the first and most important command issued by their Christian officers would be, "Love your enemies."

"A sect in Gwalior hav petitioned the Indian government to allow them to convert an image into a 'real God,' they being at the present time without a God since their deity was destroyed by some Brahmin zealots. Without such a God, it is declared, the marriage ceremony cannot be performed, and their daughters are growing up unmarried."—Tit Bits.

We hope that no Christian will be so inconsistent as to laugh at these poor Indians. The oldest and largest Christian church holds that no marriage is possible unless the ceremony is performed by one of the priests of its god, and all Christians believe that marriage was first ordained by this god. Neither is it strange that the Gwaliors' god was destroyed by the Brahmins; the Christians' god was killed by the Jews.

The presumptuous Freethinker is often properly rebuked because he dares to preach his godless doctrin while he has nothing to offer to the poor Christian to compensate him for the loss of belief in the consoling dogma of eternal hell-fire punishment. Down in Tennessee (where they send Adventist farmers to jail for plowing in their fields on Sunday) the wife of Frank Emert, a Seville county farmer, apparently died after a few days' sickness with fever. Just before the funeral procession started for the grave she gave faint signs of life, and prompt medical attention soon restored her to consciousness. Within a few hours she was able to walk about.

"She declared she had been perfectly cured in the 'great beyond,' and told the most wonderful stories of both heaven and hell, and said she met in one or other of those places nearly every dead person she had ever known. She told where the departed ones were located, and as most of them, according to her story, are now in the less desirable place, much grief abounds in many families. Her detailed descriptions of the joys of the upper, and the agonies of the lower, world hav caused great religious excitement, and her sister has gone violently insane."

What are the good ministers going to giv that poor girl in place of her reason?

Our New Orleans friends, Erwin Auffurth and S. S. Bryan, are doing good work in that city. They make themselvs heard through the papers in a most creditable manner. This is one of the best ways in which to set our views before the people who are not acquainted with Freethought. Mr. Bryan recently told the readers of that excellent newspaper, the Times-Democrat, about the prosecution of J. B. Wise, and he incorporated in his letter a long extract from Mr. Wise's statement of his own case as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 28th, and also gave the substance of the decision of Assistant Attorney General Tyner on the question of mailing the Bible and a book made up of selections therefrom. All this is timely work and we hope that many of our readers will go and do likewise.

"The morals of the nation are highest when tithes are most willingly paid," said the dean of Norwich, England, in a sermon lately delivered. That is always the keynote of the theocrat's song; he is sure that the man who pays him the most money and pays it with the most subservient alacrity is the best man in the country. If the citizen will not willingly support religion he must be made to do so, and that state is the most "moral" which secures the largest sum from him. This explains the anxiety of the National Reformers and the others to retain religious instruction in the schools at public expense; to keep church property exempt from taxation; to enact Sunday laws to handicap the ministers' rivals; to get a state-paid chaplain into every place where it is possible to wedge one in on any plea, and to dictate in the press-room and at the altar.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents. This is something new, timely, and thought-inviting.

Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost, of London, preached in this city recently, and he said, referring to some modern views of the Bible:

"Better the old-time views of John Wesley as to the source of the Bible, who said: 'The Bible was written by either good or bad men. Bad men could not and would not. Good men must hav written the book.'"

Had Wesley not been under the spell of the inspiration idea he could easily hav seen that the Bible testifies that men of varying degrees of goodness and badness were concerned in its production. There is no hard and fast line between "bad" men and "good" men—the belief that there is is a delusion born of the dogma of the "fall" of man, according to which, man in his "fallen" state is bad, and after he is "born again" he is good. It is theological humbug. If Wesley had dared to fearlessly analyze the Bible he would hav found that some parts are very bad and some are very good, while the remainder occupies the intermediate ground. But even if it were admitted that all its books were written by "good" men, its alleged divine origin would not be established. We hav any number of books the authors of which we hav the best of reasons for believing were "good" men, in the sense that they wrote with a sincere desire to instruct and elevate their fellows. But that fact does not prove that they were inspired by a god. So long as the Bible is believed to be the perfect work of an impeccable God it is a curse to humanity; when it is accepted as an expression of man's thought it can be studied with profit.

Mayor Blee, of Cleveland, appears to hav some backbone, greatly to the surprise and indignation of the Sundayites of that city. Among other good things he says that he will not help in the prosecution of one class of people because they do not believe as another class does. One of the causes of the present agitation of the turbid waters of bigotry is the Ferris wheel, which has been set up in Cleveland. Probably it keeps some young folks away from church on Sunday. Director Herbert said that while there was crime to unearth and punish, he thought the police should devote their attention to that, and then they would hav little time left for watching the people's instruments of recreation. That was a center shot, but the theocrats are invulnerable to all such projectils—they know that it is the business of the police to prevent crime and apprehend criminals, but bless your soul, Director Herbert, they are positivly sure that the crime of crimes is "Sabbath breaking," and that the worst criminal to be found is the man who willingly works or who frequents a place of amusement on Sunday. They make tenfold more fuss about these manufactured offenses than they do about all the crimes forbidden by the penal statutes, and the reason they do so is this: They claim that "Sabbath breaking" is primarily an offense against the majesty of God, i. e., the prerogativs of the priesthood, and they assert that this act of lèse majesté is the prolific parent of other crimes and is the surest provoker of the dire judgments of heaven. It is impossible to reason with people who once get thoroughly infected with this delusion, but our temporal salvation depends upon making the insanity of the notion apparent to the more reasonable of our countrymen.

We print on another page a lengthy excerpt from a letter of the New York Tribune's Pittsburg correspondent. It reads like a chapter from the early history of Puritan New England. When we observe the comparativly rational and liberal attitude of the churches whose membership is most largely "foreign," we get a clue to a very great part of the clerical and "patriotic" opposition to continental immigration. As the late A. J. Grover very ably and clearly demonstrated several years ago, we owe nearly all of our remaining Sunday liberty to our fellow citizens of foreign birth and traditions. Had it not been for them a Sabbatarian pall, such as that which now hangs over Pittsburg and Tennessee, would envelop the whole land. A word to the wise should be sufficient. Perhaps the most discouraging feature of this Sunday law business is the short-sighted policy adopted by such associations as the National Barbers' Union. These men ought to know by this time that they can, by adopting common sense business methods and withdrawing their support from the bigots, easily arrange matters so that they can all secure their weekly rest day without closing the shops on Sunday. There is not the slightest excuse for playing into the hands of the clerical party, which is working only for its own interests. There is no need whatever for subjecting the hundreds of thousands of men who desire to be shaved or hav their hair cut on Sunday to the inconvenience of doing without these attentions. There would always be barbers to do the work were it not for such antiquated statutes as the Pennsylvania law of 1794. These barbers are simply throwing away good money. Large numbers of men will shave themselvs on Sunday in preference to losing time on Saturday or Monday, and when they get into the habit of shaving on Sunday they are quite likely to help themselvs on other days, if they wish to be shaved more than once a week.

THE CHRISTIAN ONSLAUGHT ON THE BIBLE.

Such Is the Prosecution of J. B. Wise.

What a Few Editors and Correspondents Hav to Say About It.

Rev. Mr. Vennum Mistaken for his Infidel Victim.

Editorial Comments.

From the Topeka Journal.

J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, was recently released from the Leavenworth jail, where he had been confined for a month on the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails.

The strange part of his story is that his crime consisted in quoting a verse from the Bible on a postal card and sending it through the mail.

Wise is an aged one-armed man who livs in a cabin and makes a very doubtful living canvassing for books. He is a Freethinker and some of his books were of that nature. Rev. H. B. Vennum, of Industry, was well acquainted with Wise, and he set about converting him to Christianity. A long friendly controversy by letter took place, in which quotations from the Bible were freely used. Finally, Wise, in reply to a quotation by Rev. Vennum, wrote the 12th verse of the 36th chapter of Isaiah on a postal card and sent it to the preacher. This angered the reverend gentleman and the arrest of Wise, on the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails, followed.

Like some of his predecessors in church history, the Rev. Mr. Vennum, if he couldn't convert a man to his views, could at least put him in jail. It is pretty hard to tell whether Mr. Vennum was moved by righteous indignation or merely by common worldly spite.

At any rate, when the neighbors of old man Wise found out where he was, they secured a bond for him and he was released. His trial was set for October 8th. It will then be determined whether certain parts of the Bible are to be regarded as obscene literature and not to be allowed to go through the mails or not.

[The above was copied into the Clay Center Times and the Clay Center Dispatch.]

From the Little Freethinker.

Now it seems probable that the United States government is going to legally abolish the Bible. In its courts, in various states and in numerous cases, it has decided that one obscene word in a paper or book rendered the entire publication obscene.

Living in Clay Center, Kan., was Mr. J. B. Wise, He is a Freethinker, and a terrible pester to the cheap preachers and the Christians of that priest-ridden vicinity, for he asks questions that they cannot conveniently answer and makes statements that they cannot refute.

Recently he wrote on a postal card and sent to the Rev. Mr. Vennum, of Industry, Kan., a quoted verse from the Bible, and for this the sky-pilot had him arrested for sending obscene literature through the mails. He was held in bonds, and in default he was jailed at Leavenworth. However, wealthy Freethinkers hav bailed him, able counsel has been engaged, and a prompt trial is desired.

From the Freethinkers' Magazine.

J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan., has been arrested and locked up in prison, and is shortly to be tried for the crime of sending obscene matter through the mails. We think he is guilty, and if anyone is to be punished for that crime Wise ought to be. But there are some very singular particulars about this case. The prosecutor is an orthodox minister who contends that every word of the Bible, from the first verse of Genesis to the last verse of Revelation, is the inspired word of God, but notwithstanding this, he is prosecuting this Mr. Wise for sending one verse of "God's Word" through the mails on a postal card. If Wise is convicted for circulating this passage, how will it reflect on the character of the God who inspired it? "Great is the mystery of Godliness."

From Foote's Health Monthly.

Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan., was engaged in religious controversy with a Rev. Mr. Vennum, each trying to convert the other, and quoting scripture in the effort. Mr. Wise, possibly ignorant of the law, and evidently forgetful that clergymen may be mean and spiteful, was unwise enough to send by mail a quotation from Isa. xxxvi, 12, and Mr. Vennum was venomous enough to put the matter in the hands of United States District Attorney Perry, and thus cause the arrest of Mr. Wise on the charge of sending obscene literature by mail. Mr. Wise is jailed at Leavenworth, Kan., awaiting trial. What the result will be we cannot predict, but this is the last, not by any means the worst or most outrageous, of the cases brought under the "Comstock Mail Law."

From the Advertisers' Guide.

A funny blunder has been made in the application of the Comstock law. Mr. Jacob B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, has been arrested for mailing obscene matter. His offense consists in having written Isaiah xxxvi, 12, on a postal card, which he mailed. In doing this he brought to a ridiculous conclusion a long theological discussion which he had been carrying on by mail with Rev. H. B. Vennum, an evangelical preacher, of Industry, Kansas, to whom the postal card was directed. The fact that a layman could get the best of the argument seems to hav incensed this alleged follower of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and he proceeded promptly to "hav the law" on his irreverent antagonist. Mr. Wise after boarding at public expense for about a month has been bailed out, $300 worth, and must answer for his hideous crime at the next term of the Federal court which convenes in October.

Unless somebody has gumption enough to sidetrack this case and prevent the threatened trial in October, a laughable dilemma will confront the principal actors. If Mr. Wise is convicted it will practically amount to a judicial determination that the Holy Bible contains an obscene passage, which won't do at all. If he is acquitted it will prove that this precious law is not effectual for dealing with all kinds of offensiv publications impartially, which is about as bad. The Freethinkers in Kansas are a large and influential element and they are lying low and waiting for October, when they expect to see some fun. It will no doubt be an interesting experience for Brother Vennum, whose indiscretion has precipitated this grotesque situation.

Meanwhile, Mr. Wise, wishing to know exactly what language was upon this famous postal card, wrote to obtain an accurate copy of it, and the district attorney politely mailed him a copy, thereby doing the same thing which he claims is a violation of the law on the part of Mr. Wise. So that if Mr. Wise is convicted the district attorney must of a logical necessity prosecute and convict himself, or else all legal and moral sanctions will fail, for it is preposterous that an official, bound to maintain the law, should with impunity commit the same offense for which he procures the conviction and imprisonment of another.

Such cases as this make it all the more manifest that the law itself is a mere fake the purpose of which is to enable unscrupulous persons to get money out of the credulous and gullible under pretense of suppressing obscenity, and the absurdities of the law will never cease until we get a Congress honest and cleanly enough to repeal it altogether.

W. S. Bell in Lucifer.

The Rev. H. B. Vennum, of Industry, Kansas, who had Mr. J. B. Wise arrested for sending him a postal card through the mails with a scripture text quoted on it, now says that he is sorry that Wise was sent to jail, and that he had no intention of having him sent there. But this is hardly probable; since he sent the postal card to the postal officials, it must hav been with the purpose of having Mr. Wise pay some penality for his lack of respect for the Bible, and his temerity in thus addressing the preacher; for this sort of quotation is too much like throwing rotten eggs at the cloth. It was especially provoking to the dealer in antiquated eggs to find himself bespattered with some of them, and know that his neighbors were jeering at him, because he had offered to sell the very same eggs, and warrant them sound and fresh. "Curses, like chickens, come home to roost."

Mr. Wise has many friends in Industry, for the citizens of that place are liberally minded. Many of them are persons of intelligence and large experience, and do not sympathize with methods of persecution. They hav seen the folly and fatuity of intolerance, and we believe they will not suffer such outrages to be persisted in without calling to account some of their rulers.

James Pontius in Washington (Kansas) Post.

Is it not a libel on the Bible, an outrage on our liberty and equal rights for all, and an injustice to J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan., to be arrested for sending through the mail Isa. xxxvi, 12, as long as the Bible, millions of lesson leaves, and the like are allowed to pass through the mail undisturbed? Mr. Wise is an old teacher; he lost his right arm in a threshing machine; he tries to earn an honest living. He and Rev. H. B. Vennum of Industry, having been carrying on a controversy on the Bible during the winter and spring, finally got to sending passages from the Bible through the mail to one another for explanation. The reverend asked Mr. Wise for some good reason why he did not believe in the Bible; in return Mr. Wise sent to the reverend the passage for which the reverend had Mr. Wise arrested for sending obscene literature through the mail. Mr. Wise was taken to Leavenworth jail, but was released on bail, and now awaits his trial in October. Mr. Wise is put to a great deal of trouble and expense for merely sending one passage of the Bible, while another class of citizens are sending Bibles by the millions through the mail. It seems to me the public press should expose such persecutions and all lovers of liberty. equity, and justice should array themselvs against such tyranny. How can the Rev Mr. Vennum admit to the public that the Bible is obscene literature and still call it the word of God? If the United States court releases Mr. Wise there certainly is nothing too obscene to be sent by mail, and if the court convicts Mr. Wise, the Bible then stands as obscene literature, and should be forever kept out of the mail and our public schools.

W. S. Bell Again in Lucifer.

Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan., has been having some controversy with Rev. Mr. Vennum, of Industry, Kan., upon the merits of the Bible. In a most natural way Mr. Wise asked the reverend gentleman questions which he thought the minister could not answer. On one occasion he sent the preacher a postal card quoting Isa. xxxvi, 12. Some time afterwards a postal inspector called on Mr. Wise and asked him if he wrote the postal card in question. The officer went his way and nothing was said or done in the matter by the postal authorities until the 15th of June, when an officer came to Clay Center, and took him to Leavenworth jail, where he now is. [was].

Here is a case that will expose the obscenity hunters to shame and defeat. The obscene quotation is from the inspired word of God. It matters not which way this case is decided, as it is like a double-edged sword that cuts both ways. If this scripture quotation is decided by the federal courts to be obscene, then the United States government will hav set its foot upon the Bible. The Bible will be ever after a condemned book; or if the court decides that the quotation is not obscene, then J. B. Wise walks out of prison, and the work of holding up in the sunlight of science and humanity the barbarous language and customs of the past goes on unhindered, and Comstockism will thereby be rebuked. Mr. Wise will be released from confinement. Meantime the discussion of liberty and authority will go on. This controversy will not be a fruitful subject for the anti-vice society. It will not only expose the rottenness of the book from which the passage was taken, but also the unspeakable meanness of the methods of these saints of purity. It is hard for Mr. Wise to languish in prison, but his case will create light in dark places as did the incarceration of D M. Bennett, Moses Harman, Ezra H. Heywood, E. C. Walker, Lillian Harman, and others. We owe much to these heralds and heroes of freedom. The discussions growing out of Comstockism hav been fuitful. The Anti-Vice Society has managed to gain sufficient pelf to sustain itself from year to year; but the reformers hav gained the new ideas and the modern spirit.

Putting a man in jail is to the Comstockians a genuin success, but throwing a good citizen into prison is an eye-opener. Eighteen years of prosecution and persecution hav been hard upom many good people, but while they hav been years of pain to many, they hav been the dawning years of a new epoch—the era of man.

Mr. J. B. Wise is a poor, one-armed man, depending upon his own exertions for his support. He is a man worthy of sympathy for his own sake, as well as for the cause he represents. Here is a case where those who hav the means can, without question, do a genuin deed of charity. I know some readers of Lucifer who will take pleasure in coming to J. B. Wise's rescue.

From the Leavenworth Standard.

WHO IS H. B VENNUM?

The police are trying to find out who the Rev. H. B. Vennum is. This morning a newspaper, postmarked in Germany, was received at the police station. It bears this address: "Rev. H. B. Vennum, care of governor of Leavenworth Jail, Kansas, United States of America." A postal card bearing the same address has also been received at headquarters. It speaks of the man Vennum as a "Freethinker" and says he is confined in the Leavenworth jail for an improper quotation from the scriptures. The police do not know anything about Vennum's whereabouts, but think they had him in jail some months ago.

MR. VENNUM IS FOUND.—A "STANDARD" READER WHO SEEMS TO KNOW ALL ABOUT HIM AND OTHERS.

In reply to your inquiry about Rev. H. B. Vennum permit me to say: It seems that the editor of a church paper in London had read in the Freethinker of that city the statement that a man named Wise was suffering imprisonment in Leavenworth for merely writing a verse of the Bible on a postal card and sending it to a preacher named Vennum.

Deeming the story as incredible as some of the tales of Russian barbarities, he wrote over here to know what foundation, if any, there was for the report. Our English cousins, it seems, hav little realization of the actual status of human liberty in this puritan-cursed country.

J. B. Wise is a harmless, kindly disposed little old man who livs alone in a cabin at Clay Center. His right sleeve is empty clear to the shoulder, and being very poor, he keeps soul and body together by canvassing for publications, some of which are Freethought. The Rev. Vennum, of Industry, being well acquainted with Wise, undertook to convert him and wrote him several letters, quoting scripture to warn him of his fate. Not to be outdone in the courtesies of the season, Wise good naturedly quoted Bible back to him, asking him to explain it, and finally run on to a passage (Isa. xxxvi, 12) which made the preacher mad. Wise was arrested as though he had committed a murder and thrown into the Leavenworth jail, where he lay a month before his neighbors found out what had happened and bailed him out. His trial is set for October 8th.

This case is one that concerns the Christian and Jewish religions about as much as it does Mr. Wise. The Bible is really on trial, charged to all intents and purposes by Reverend Vennum with being indecent and obscene and unfit for transmission through the mails.

As the courts hav held that one line or even one word of obscenity renders a whole newspaper or book unmailable, the conviction of Wise practically decides the Bible to be obscene in the eyes of the law and its sending through the mails a crime.

It is more than likely that Judge Foster, who sent Harman up for five years for mailing his paper containing a Latin word, will feel constrained to maintain a reputation for consistency and impartiality and giv Wise an equal dose. If so, prosecutions will be brought against the American Bible society and others who offend against this puritanical law. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

George Francis Train was once arrested and thrown into the Tombs for printing texts of scripture in his paper. Realizing their blunder the case was gotten rid of in some way, but Train refused to leave the prison and demanded a trial. He was finally inveigled outside by a ruse and the door locked against him. He tried to break in but failed and so had to submit to the inevitable.

Letters to Mr. Wise.

From J. D. Shaw, Editor of the Independent Pulpit.

DEAR MR. WISE: Referring again to your trouble with the post office officials, there is one thing about it that may be an advantage to Liberals. If they convict you it will giv a black eye to the Bible. You will hav shown in the courts that it is an obscene book. But everybody knows that, and I regret to see you sacrificed for so small an advantage.

Very truly, J. D. SHAW.

From C. B. Hoffman, of Enterprise, Kan.

J. B. WISE, My Dear Sir and Brother: I note with indignation the news of your arrest and imprisonment at the instigation of some Jesuitical hypocrit—some pretended follower of the Nazarene, who was not ashamed to fraternize with the public women of his day. What a contemptible, cowardly thing the average "preacher" is anyway! Living on the charity of society, he begs for a living and when some one refuses to deliver he attempts to call in the state, and generally with success, to crush the opponent. Well, what are you doing to defend yourself? Let me hear from you. I hav $10, or more if necessary, for your defense.

Yours, C. B. HOFFMAN.

Officials Hav Become Cautious.

Letter to the Postmaster at Industry, Kan

ISAAC GIBBS, ESQ., Postmaster, Dear Sir: Your letter of the 6th received asking for an exact copy of the postal card written by Wise. We do not feel that it is proper for this office to mail copies of that card from place to place. If anyone is sufficiently interested he can come to this office and see it or get a copy. We would probably be guilty of the same offense in sending it to you that Mr. Wise is. Very respectfully, RANKIN MASON,

Assistant U. S. Attorney, Topeka, Kan.

Freethought and Liberalism—J. B. Wise and Obscene Literature.

There are no two grander words in the English language than Freethought and Liberalism. And if they could be divested of everything but their legitimate or natural meaning, thousands of people, yes, tens of thousands would willingly and gladly adopt them as their religious shibboleth. But the truth is, and it is always safe to speak the truth, so many wild, unreasonable cranks hav assumed that they are the representativs of Freethought and Liberalism that many honest people who are really genuin Liberals refuse to be known as such. Here is an instance of how these zealous, self-styled Freethinkers bring disgrace upon the cause of progressiv thought. The other day Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, in a discussion with an orthodox minister, selected from the Bible one of the most obscene and disgusting passages in that book, writes it out on a postal card, and sends it through the mail to the clergyman. The passage is so abomniably obscene that we will not soil our pages by giving the number, chapter, and verse and book from which it is taken, for fear some innocent child might look it up and be contaminated by it. Now, as a lawyer, I giv it as my legal opinion that this was a plain, clear violation of the United States law against sending obscene matter through the mails. Any judge presiding at the trial of Mr. Wise would be compelled to charge the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: There is no question that under this statute the writing on the postal card in question is obscene matter, and, gentlemen, if you find that the prisoner mailed the said card as charged in the indictment, then you must find him guilty."

I am sure that ninety-nine lawyers out of everv one hundred will agree to what I hav here stated. There could be no clearer case than this. Now what do we see? So called Liberal journals and Liberal people calling on the Liberal public to contribute money to defend Mr. Wise on his trial. Here is a man calling himself a Freethinker and a Liberal, who has plainly violated a United States law—the law against sending obscene matter through the mails—and Liberals rush to his defense. What is the result and consequence. The general public say with good reason that Freethinkers and Liberals are in favor of sending obscene matter through the mails and that they stand by anyone who violates the law. The general public is justified in saying that, and in saying it, it seems to us they are telling the truth as to the Liberals who take that course.

This case furnished a very good opportunity to hav given superstition a heavy blow in a vital point. The Liberals hav always contended that portions of the Bible are obscene—too obscene to be read by decent people. Mr. Wise selected one of the most obscene passages and sent it through the mails, and the Christian people, or their minister, brings an action against Mr. Wise for circulating obscene literature. In this instance every Freethinker and Liberal in the country should hav said: "For once the Christians are right. They hav got onto a real genuin case of mailing obscene literature and we will stand by them," and they should hav further said to our Christian friends, "We will stand by you when you are in the right, and if you need money call on us and we will contribute to aid in the prosecution of this man Wise. He has sent but one verse of your holy inspired book through the mails, but it is so dirty and obscene that he ought to go to prison and be heavily fined for so doing. Go ahead, Christians, and show the world what a smutty book this Bible is, and we will aid you all in our power." That would hav been the correct position for Liberals to hav taken in this case, and by so doing they would hav acted consistent with their professions, and, as the politicians say, they would hav put the orthodox people in a hole. Then after the court had thus decided that certain portions of the Bible were obscene and they had this precedent established, the proper thing would hav been to hav prosecuted the Bible Society for sending the Bible through the mails.

Some will say that this would hav been hard on Mr. Wise. But Mr. Wise is no fool. He knew that the passage he wrote on the postal card was obscene, and that is the reason he sent it to the preacher. If it was not obscene there was no point in his sending it. Mr. Wise knew he was violating a United States law when he mailed this card, and he should hav been willing to incur the penalty for the sake of vindicating the claim that he made that the Bible was obscene. The "insane" George Francis Train was more consistent. He selected certain smutty passages from the Bible, sent them through the mail, and when arrested and called on to plead to the indictment, said: "Yes, I am guilty. The Bible is an obscene book and I hav sent it through the mail, now I will take the punishment." The Christians were in a dilemma at once. To convict Train convicted their holy book. They found they had an elephant on their hands and they had to tear down the prison to get rid of the elephant.

H. L. GREEN.

Christianity and the Common Law.

How did Christianity come to be a part of the common law? By judicial legerdemain. In 1458 Chief Justice Prisot gave an opinion in these words:

"To such laws as the Holy Church hav of the ancient scripture it behooves us to giv credence, for it is that common law upon which all kinds of law are founded. And therefore we are bound to know their law of Holy Church, and in like manner they are obliged to know our laws. And if it should appear now to us that the bishop had done what we ordinarily do in a like case, then we should adjudge it good, and not otherwise."

The first quotation of the above opinion was by Finch in 1513, who mistranslated the Norman French and mangled it thus: "To such laws of the church as hav warrant in holy scripture our laws giv credence."

In 1658 Wingate erected this false translation into a maxim of the common law.

In 1675 Sheppard copied the same, quoting Finch and Wingate.

Sir Matthew Hale also, about the same time, but without quoting any authority, said: "Christianity is parcel of the law of England."

By these echoings and re-echoings from one to another, it became so established that in 1723, in the case of King vs. Woolston, the court would not suffer it to be debated whether to write against Christianity was punishable in the temporal court of common law; and Wood ventured to vary the phrase by saying that "all blasphemy and profaneness are offenses by common law."

Then in 1773 Blackstone repeats the words of Hale, that "Christianity is a part of the law of England," and in 1767 Mansfield, on his own authority, says that "the essential principles of revealed religion are parts of the common law."

Thus we hav a chain of authorities, hanging link by link, one upon another, and all ultimately on one and the same hook, and that a mistranslation of the Norman French word "anciens," making "ancient scripture" mean "holy scripture."

It was Thomas Jefferson who adduced the above facts. I hav only slightly changed and condensed his phraseology.

W. H. BURR.

Will some friend in each of the states of California, Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Wisconsin send to Judge Hector W. Haight, of Farmington, Utah, a copy of the constitution of his or her state or giv him the address of the Secretary of State? The Freethinkers of Utah are very anxious to draft a perfect constitution for the coming state, and they want to see just what has been done in other commonwealths. If any Freethinker in any of the states named, or in any other, knows of a particularly good provision in the organic law of his state, it will be well to transcribe it and forward to Judge Haight. That earnest Freethinker will be very thankful for any information that will help him and his co-workers to bring about the desired result—the establishment of a free state for a free people.

Mr. H. H. Johnston, who knows as much about the Boers and their habits and character as most men, speaks of their religion as being fiercely Calvinistic. "Their form of Christianity," he says, "is harsher than the harshest Presbyterianism; they are great Sabbatarians, and their religious services are gloomy beyond belief, consisting of dreary prayers, lengthy psalms sung to dreary chants, interminable sermons, and readings from the sternest portions of scripture. The Boers simply worship the Old Testament, the study of which has become almost a craze among them, to such an extent that they identify themselvs with the children of Israel, and in their treks through the wilderness imagin themselvs to be repeating the wanderings of the chosen people. This is why, on the older maps of Southern Africa, there are so many 'Moses' Fontein,' 'Nilstrom,' 'Mounts Pisgah,' and 'Sinai.' The nativs whom they encountered and dispossessed were compared to the Amalekites and the Canaanites, and their extermination was demanded from the pulpit in the words of Deuteronomy xx, 10–14. Slavery has always been a tenet of the Boer faith, and has been justified by the same references to the Old Testament as were formerly in vogue among the ministers of religion in the Southern states of America."—Morning.

Every man has a right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience in this country, I take it. He can go to church if he chooses and remain away if he likes. I believe in liberty, just as much liberty of action as possible, and I believe that a man should be allowed to enjoy himself on Sunday, or any other day, so long as he does not interfere with the rights or liberty of any other person. There are many people in Cleveland who hav just one day in the week for recreation. They work from daylight until dark for their families and on Sunday they visit the parks, attend picnics, participate in harmless amusements, and go home refreshed and happy. Their children hav no other opportunity for an outing. They may patronize the Ferris wheel for aught I know, they may even ride in the haunted swing, but in doing so they harm no one, interfere with the liberty of no person, and I believe are better citizens for the day of recreation. I believe in law and order and shall endeavor to maintain the same, but I will not take part in prosecuting one class of people because they do not believe as another class does. If it is wrong to ride in the wheel it is also wrong to ride on the street cars for pleasure. In fact it is difficult to say where the line should be drawn.—Mayor Blee, of Cleveland.

News and Notes.

Last Sunday evening, September 23d, Mrs. M. A. Freeman gave her lecture on "Science and Superstition" to a crowded house. Science and superstition were certainly arrayed in their true colors in this brilliant address. The interest in our Sunday meetings is now constantly advancing, and every day increases the prospects of a grand gathering in October. Professor Copeland, formerly of Texas, lectures next Sunday evening on "Freethought Views of Sin and Crime." On the first Sunday in October will be the Trumbull Memorial meeting, at which a large gathering is expected. Many of the old comrades of this veteran leader will be present and speak in honor of his memory.

October 11th I shall lecture on "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought." October 21st, Franklin Steiner will lecture on "The Bible in the Light of Modern Criticism." A goodly array of speakers are here preparing for the Congress. Besides Judge Waite, Mrs. Freeman, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and myself, who are already on the ground, we shall hav among the first and foremost always in the battle of religious liberty, the Rev. Alonzo T. Jones, of the American Sentinel, a right good "Reverend," indeed, not by apostolic succession, but by vigorous and noble service. He will giv an address Sunday afternoon, October 28th, on "The Judicial Basis for a Religious Tyranny in the United States." It will repay anyone to come to the Congress just to hear this one great lecture. No one is so thoroughly posted on this subject as Mr. Jones. He has mastered it, and is keen as a diamond in his illustrations of judicial usurpations. He is one of the ablest, most far-seeing, and eloquent debaters on our side of the question. He stands squarely on the platform of the Demands of Liberalism. He is author of the book, "The Two Republics," a book freighted with the facts and lessons of human history, which every American citizen should read. We shall hav another broad and Freethinking "Reverend" with us, W. W. Chunn, of the radical Unitarians of the West. Dr. Paul Carus, of the Open Court, we expect, will be with us; also Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, whose pioneer work is well known; John E. Remsburg, who has traveled more and lectured more, I guess, than any other Freethinker in the country; Franklin Steiner, who has the golden promis of youth; Mrs. Ella Roberts, who has received the encomiums of the Chicago press for her eloquence in behalf of industrial reform; Leon Lewis will giv us "Bruno;" Mrs. Sarah E. Ames, Mrs. L. D. White, and Mrs. Lizzie M. Holmes will contribute their share. We certainly hav an array of talent which will prove quite attractiv, besides others who we hope and expect will come at the last moment—Wakeman, Washburn, Adams, etc.

We hav arranged to make the headquarters of the Congress at the Gault House, a first-class hotel on West Madison street, corner of Clinton, within two blocks of Madison Hall, where the Congress meets. The proprietor has made favorable terms for those who attend the Congress: $1.50 per day, room and board, which is nearly half rates. This is a pleasant and convenient place to locate, and it will add much to the social interest of the Congress for us to gather here.

We purpose to send five thousand programs and invitations to the Congress all over the country, and I hope that friends will send a list of names of Liberals in their vicinity to whom the invitations can be sent. We can thus arouse an extensiv interest in Freethought. Address 234 South Water street, Chicago.

I was glad this week to hear from my old friend, M. S. Palmer, of California, who is always ready to do his share. For over half a century he has been in the harness. He says:

> Inclosed you will find two dollars to help you along a little, and I wish you success in your undertaking. I must add that my eyesight is failing so fast that I cannot see to read print or write, and I shall hav to giv up my beloved TRUTH SEEKER. Yours as ever,
> M. S. PALMER.

Our friend has the deepest sympathies of his Freethought comrades throughout the country. No shadows of orthodoxy will ever linger upon his mental vision. The sun of reason will shine. Robert Gunther and H. F. Ebers also of California send their good word and contributions.

C. V. Williams of Kansas writes:

> When I came to this place, which is now my home, in 1893, but few dared to express their honest thoughts; now a religious discussion may be heard on the streets almost every day. I hav succeeded in converting a United Brethren preacher. I delivered two lectures here last winter. The Methodists had a revival immediately after, but caught no converts. I intend to start a Freehought society here as soon as possible. I will try to raise some money for the Congress, and will add my little and forward it. I hope for your success. It will help us all.

Miss Lottie Wolf of Kansas, a young Freethinker, sends contribution and quite a list of Freethinkers in her vicinity. I hope others will do the same. We would like to hav thousands of names of Liberals, in order that we can mail documents. Our young friend writes:

> I hope the coming Congress will do great things in abolishing the oppression of the human mind. I am ready to do whatever I can.

The Sabbath question is coming to the front here in Chicago. The Civic Federation is preparing for the enforcement of Puritanic laws. Mayor Hopkins says if they want a Puritanic Sabbath they shall hav it. Postmaster Hesing arranged for a carrier's parade on Sunday. Of course the churches made a protest. That wouldn't do, to hav a parade of any of Uncle Sam's officials on Sunday. The postmaster called together the carriers and gave notice that if any one had conscientious scruples against marching on Sunday, he could be excused. Not one carrier availed himself of the privilege. In spite of the churches, therefore, the Sunday parade will go on. The carriers are all in it, and the preachers are not. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Ingersoll on Brockway.

From the New York World.

In my judgment no human being was ever made better, nobler, by being whipped or clubbed.

Mr. Brockway, according to his own testimony, is simply a savage. He belongs to the Dark Ages—to the Inquisition, to the torture-chamber—and he needs reforming more than any prisoner under his control. To put any man within his power is in itself a crime. Mr. Brockway is a believer in cruelty—an apostle of brutality. He beats and bruises flesh to satisfy his conscience—his sense of duty. He wields the club himself because he enjoys the agony he inflicts.

When a poor wretch, having reached the limit of endurance, submits or becomes unconscious, he is regarded as reformed. During the remainder of his term he trembles and obeys. But he is not reformed. In his heart is the flame of hatred, the desire for revenge; and he returns to society far worse than when he entered the prison.

Mr. Brockway should be either removed or locked up, and the Elmira Reformatory should be superintended by some civilized man—some man with brain enough to know, and heart enough to feel.

I do not believe that one brute, by whipping, beating, and lacerating the flesh of another, can reform him. The lash will neither develop the brain nor cultivate the heart. There should be no bruising, no scarring of the body, in families, in schools, in reformatories, or prisons. A civilized man does not believe in the methods of savagery. Brutality has been tried for thousands of years, and through all these years it has been a failure.

Criminals hav been flogged, mutilated, and maimed, tortured in a thousand ways, and the only effect was to demoralize, harden, and degrade society and increase the number of crimes. In the army and navy soldiers and sailors were flogged to death, and everywhere by church and state the torture of the helpless was practiced and upheld.

Only a few years ago there were two hundred and twenty-three offenses punished with death in England. Those who wished to reform this savage code were denounced as the enemies of morality and law. They were regarded as weak and sentimental.

At last the English code was reformed through the efforts of men who had brain and heart. But it is a significant fact that no bishop of the Episcopal church sitting in the House of Lords ever voted for the repeal of one of those savage laws. Possibly this fact throws light on the recent poetic and Christian declaration by Bishop Potter to the effect that "there are certain criminals who can only be made to realize through their hides the fact that the state has laws to which the individual must be obedient."

This orthodox remark has the true apostolic ring and is in perfect accord with the history of the church. But it does not accord with the intelligence and philanthropy of our time. Let us develop the brain by education, the heart by kindness. Let us remember that criminals are produced by conditions, and let us do what we can to change the conditions and to reform the criminals.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Long Island Business College, South 8th street, between Bedford and Driggs avenues. Program for October, 1894:

October 7th—Mr. Henry Rowley, subject: "What we Stand for." Vocal and instrumental music.

October 14th—Rev. F. E. Mason, subject (by request): "The Science of Life."

Observations.

We hav it upon the authority of the clergymen and the politicians that both religion and government rest upon laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath. Wherein is discovered an explanation of the fact that both church and state are rotten at the butt.

Reports from agricultural districts show that the people who prayed for rain during the summer's drouth hav now got enough of it to either spoil their crops or to prevent the harvesting of such produce as the dry weather permitted them to raise. If this is the result of the praying that was done, the warning against monkeying with the weather is sufficiently impressiv for the longest forgetory to remember.

TWO OF A KIND.

If join a church you feel you must,
Don't hesitate a minute,
But, Catholic or Protestant—
Whichever's first—get in it;
The difference between the two
Won't pay a moment's bother—
It's incense you will find in one,
And nonsense in the other.

Inspector Byrnes of the New York police holds it to be according to law to dress his men in citizens' clothes and to set them as spies upon the actions of merchants suspected of violating the Sunday law. President Martin of the Police Board holds to the contrary, and some of the police justices hav refused to entertain charges or to hold prisoners under the spy system. Mr. Byrnes, I think, may safely go ahead with his inquisition, for so far as my imagination can be exercised it can conceive of no depth of meanness, no violation of rights, nothing either outrageous or despicable, that is not justified by law—the Sunday law in particular. If anything under the head of either has been overlooked, Inspector Byrnes may rest assured that the Sabbatarians will call attention to the omission and that the legislature will hasten to supply it.

A religious journal called the Churchman, which has come duly to hand, has a department headed "Ladies' Column." If the perusal of that department relieves the ladies of the burden of reading the rest of the paper, the female subscribers of the Churchman are let off easily; otherwise it is invidious, as indicating that the feminin mind is limited to the capacity of grasping a few very unimportant subjects. The column merely tells the women what are the latest freaks in coats, capes, tea jackets and skirts, and informs them how to make guava salad and to pickle nasturtiums. If I differed in sex I think I would attach myself to some journal in an editorial capacity and start a "Gentlemen's Column." If ladies are to hav their mental pabulum bitten off and mummed for them by male grannies, why may not the female turn editorial nurse and do a little chewing for us? I hear no reply. Let some angel rush in where fool man has trod for so extended a period of time. I hav never seen a gentlemen's column in any of the papers edited by women. Hav they no suggestions to offer about our clothes? At this time of the year we would like to know, for example, how to restore the sizing to our last winter's derby; how to revive the symmetry of our pants; whether round or square patches are to be worn this season by gentlemen of sedentary habits, and whether the verge of the affected part is to be darned down by Dame Fashion or tucked under. Are there signs of a return to the barndoor of our forefathers? Will it be en regle or outre to walk on our upper shoe-leather this fall? Does a gentleman amble on the off side or the near side of his female escort until further notice? Having a quart of milk in one hand and a jug of molasses in the other, with which is it de rigueur to raise the hat upon meeting a lady friend who carries a salt codfish in her pocket and a spool of thread on her arm? Again, will the young man who goes to church with his girl follow her inside and take his medicin, or will it be deemed better form if he plays fifteen-ball pool until meeting is out? Will the attendant upon divine service take his own umbrella on leaving the sanctuary, or the best one in sight, as heretofore? Will St. Augustine or San Diego be the favored winter resort of upper-circle Sunday school treasurers and Y. M. C. A. members who hav made their grab? Those of us who are preachers of the gospel desire to know what prevailing taste dictates that we should do in order to escape the criticism of unconventionality. Is it to be defendant in a heresy trial or corespondent in a divorce suit? We would that the cup of unbelief might pass from us, but thanks be to God, we are qualified for the responding business.

So long as the ladies receive from mankind instruction in the matter of guava salad and pickled nasturtiums, they ought to be willing to giv us something for tuition—something practical, for example, in family matters, and about that portion of domestic work which falls to the head of the household; whether long or short stovewood is the more economical; whether it really takes a bushel of corn to fatten a pig's tail, and if something else could not be fed for the development of the tail, and the corn applied to the ribs. What makes the best saw greaser? Having twelve hens and fifteen nests, what will prevent all the hens from trying to get on one nest at the same time? I might multiply these examples, but I trust the ladies will see the necessities of the case without further illustration. True, the questions may seem trivial, but I hold that they are just as important as those which newspaper editors discuss for the edification of their female readers; and if men had a department devoted to them, we might soon be as restricted in our information as some women who do not want their sex to vote.

In the midst of free nature it is only the free—why should we not say it—the nude, beautiful human form that is suitable; all drapery is subject to fashion and change; and human form, as it comes from the hand of nature, is alone fitting to stand in the presence of everlasting nature.—Berthold Auerbach.

The Martin woman, who is superintendent of the Purity in Literature and Art Department of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which is the female member of Comstock's society, has broken out again. Of course she wants to suppress something else than herself, and has appealed to Superintendent Byrnes of the police to abolish the living pictures shown in the theaters, and also the theatrical posters "portraying actors and actresses in tights." Taking the ground that one humbug justifies another, she argues: "If Secretary Carlisle can prevent the casting of a medal because of St. Gaudens' representation on it of a man's nude form, why shall we not say that our form shall not be exposed?" Indeed, why not? Mrs. Martin's form is her own; she is at liberty to drape it, and the person who would hav it otherwise should swing. Whatever the beauty of her chaste outlines, no one may contemplate them, without her consent, save the one favored man who has purchased from some other man a license to gaze. To be sure, the persons who exhibit the living pictures hav bought a license to show them, and the men and women who spectate pay for the privilege; but as the freedom to look once does not carry with it the compulsion to look always and never elsewhere, perhaps the cases are not parallel.

It is astonishing, as Carlyle pointed out in his "Sartor Resartus," how much depends upon clothes; and not only upon clothes, but upon the fit of them. Perfect-fitting garments, it appears, are immodest, although the deity, of whose image Mrs. Martin is ashamed, and before whose handiwork she makes an indecent exposure of her mind, has decreed that we shall be created without any at all. By the way, how does she expect to find him appareled when, as a reward for libeling that which he has made, she is ushered into his presence? Do his clothes fit him? Has she ever thought how she herself will be dressed on that interesting occasion? Does she imagin that, as an author, God is pleased with her assurance that his works, especially his likeness, are obscene? Will she inaugurate a Purity in Nature crusade over there, and suggest to the almighty that henceforth the children of earth be born headed up in a barrel to be opened in the dark? According to her contention, providence clothes the human form with lewdness only, and it is left to others similarly debauched to make it presentable. In some way the fountain must be compelled to squirt water higher than its source. Indecency concealed becomes purity, while purity revealed becomes indecent. I fail to make it out in that way. I hav seen the theatrical posters and the living pictures which Mrs. Martin defames. The former are about as pornographic as the Chinese drawings on a teachest. The living pictures are the draped figures of men, women, and children posed in a handsome gilt frame, with lights and surroundings which make them appear like works of art. You hav to go back of the phenomena to discover the lewd, if anything of the kind exists. The prospect pleases; only the man or woman is vile who sees more than appears. If one person touches that which is naturally clean, and imparts no stain to it, and if another—Mrs. Martin, for example—touches it and leaves a smutch, then which is the source of the impurity, the object touched or Mrs. Martin's fingers? The answer is in the question, and the warning is, Hands off unless they are clean.

Incidentally with this crusade the police of Chicago hav committed an outrage that comes under Herr Most's heading of Propaganda by Deed. These policemen hav invaded private property, and not only disfigured bill boards, but torn down the boards upon which the bills were posted. Such an act would rightly subject a private citizen to fine or imprisonment. What makes it worse, the authorities knew they were committing a felony, and like other criminals chose the night for it. Then they hav the impudence to ask citizens to respect the law.

Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation and the Secular Union.

CALL OF THE FREETHOUGHT FEDERATION OF AMERICA.

To the Liberals of America and Members of the Freethought Federation:

The Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation of America will be held in Chicago, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th, in conjunction with the Annual Congress of the American Secular Union. The importance of this Congress is great. The encroachments of the church are becoming more bold and dangerous. The attempts to amend the constitution so as to place our government on a Christian basis, and to pass a national Sabbath law, are indications of the attitude of the church. It has been and is today the enemy of freedom; and we must be constantly prepared to meet its conspiracies. We can not do this as an unorganized mass. We must join forces, otherwise we shall be defeated. We need a common impulse. There must be association. Let the gathering at Chicago be the greatest yet held in America. Think of past achievements as an inspiration to something better in the future. Freethought is growing. The necessity for political action is more apparent than ever. The means of action are improving. Freethought cannot go backward; it must step forward. Now is the opportunity for union and strength. This Congress is for work. Let there be an enthusiastic rally.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

It is hoped that friends will not fail to send in a list of names of Liberals in their vicinity. This will be a great help. It is necessary to arouse Liberals to action. This Congress is for work, and to arrange plans to meet hereafter the aggressions of the church. A large attendance is expected. We report encouraging contributions for this week, but hope that more will pour in, for we need the funds. We purpose to send out 5,000 invitations, stating the objects of Congress, the principles of Liberalism, etc. Our aim is to reach those who are indifferent, or who do not yet understand the value of our work. We must gain recruits.

In Sabbatarian Pennsylvania.

The Sunday sale of soda-water, ice cream, candy, and cigars is illegal, and numerous crusades hav resulted in the payment of thousands of dollars in fines, but there is really no trouble in getting any of the articles named, and the police department has notified the druggists that, despite the state laws, they may sell soda water in consideration of the fact that they keep open all day to fill prescriptions. Still, the police department could render no assistance whatever if any society or citizen decided to prosecute, and fear of popular ridicule and indignation alone prevents the prosecution. The crusades during several seasons were so hot that arrests on Monday were made by the wholesale, and there were appeals to the supreme court, which decided that while it might unofficially approve a repeal of the obnoxious statutes, or, at least, their modification, they must interpret the law to mean that the only recourse is the legislature, so the issue has been brought into the state campaign, Walter Lyon, the Republican candidate for lieutenant-governor, being opposed in circulars by some clergymen, who were prompted by his disposition while state senator to work and vote for a repeal of the laws, or, at least, their modification. Mr. Lyon will be elected by an enormous majority, and not even the antagonistic clergymen will question this claim.

The sale of Sunday newspapers is forbidden, too, and the proprietors also went to the Supreme Court on a futil quest for relief. They hav paid hundreds of fines, and at the last session of the legislature they secured the passage of a bill to repeal the special act of 1858, and to make the fine here the same as in the remaining sixty-three counties of the state. Governor Pattison, Democrat, vetoed it after the legislature had adjoured. It is expected that the bill will pass next winter and will be signed by Daniel H. Hastings, the Republican governor-to-be.

The Dispatch, the Post, the Press, and the Leader hav made a strong fight for the legalizing of the Sunday sale of such harmless commodities as soda water and ice-cream, because on hot summer days the Allegheny river water, coated with petroleum, is nauseating, and the Press went so far one season as to place at the principal street corners barrels of ice-water, free to all comers. Those morning papers not having Sunday editions hav been compelled either to side with the Sunday press or to remain neutral, or stand prosecution for the Sunday work necessary to a Monday morning issue.

It is impossible for a stranger to get a shave here on Sunday, because the journeymen barbers make the prosecutions themselvs, and the resident's only way to get a Sunday "scrape" is to arrange with the "boss" barber to hav him visit his residence. The Philadelphia barbers want the law repealed, but George W. Miller, the supreme organizer, who livs in Pittsburg, says the National Barbers' Association will oppose a change.

The Catholics, German-Lutherans, and Episcopalians, clergy and laymen, hav all along sided with the Sunday newspapers and the movement to modify the century-old laws. The Pittsburg park concerts occur regularly on Sunday evenings, but when the Allegheny concerts were stopped, Bishop White, head of the Protestant Episcopal diocese, said: "The Episcopal church does not consider Sunday as the Sabbath or day that is to be given up solely to rest, such as was originally intended to be done with the day we call Saturday. Therefore, we feel that the demands of the church hav been fulfilled when the morning services hav been attended. I do not mean that people are to put in the balance of the day in a way that would do discredit to themselvs or be offensiv to their neighbors. Anything that takes them out on God's hills under God's trees and God's sky has my approbation. It is far better for them to be in the park listening to music and incidentally drinking in health than herding together in crowded tenements, where fresh air is even scarcer than money."—Pittsburg Correspondence of New York Tribune.

THE program of exercises for the Sixth Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union is being rapidly arranged. One of the special features of the Convention will be the singing of the Forest Grove and Portland Secular church choirs. Invitations to address the Convention hav been extended to S. D. Adams, of Salem; Rabbi Bloch and Reverend Elliott, of Portland; Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, Annie E. Barker, Virgil S. Smith, Nettie A. Olds, D. W. Smith, Judge T. B. Handly, and others. The main feature, however, will be the work of completing the system of organization adopted two years ago by the Union, and the examination of the Secular Sunday-school lessons, copies of all of which will be submitted to the executiv committee. The Secular Teacher's and Director's Bureau is already making its influence felt. Letters from teachers in Southern states indicate that Secularism is not firmly rooted there. Letters from admirers of the Secular Sunday-school lessons suggest the advisability of publishing a Secular Sunday-school paper, which shall contain regular reports of all Secular Sunday-schools. The executiv committee will consider this matter at the Convention. A great deal of interest is being manifested in the proposed Secular college at New Era, where the Oregon Secular Park is located. Conservativ Secularists who believe in putting their money into work directly affecting the rising generation, write that they are willing and anxious to help such an institution. Since last report the following donations hav been received: M. A. Booth and B. M. Booth, McMinnville, each fifty cents; I. C. Robison, $2.50; Mrs. Lily Wink, $1; W. C. Carlton, $3; Joseph Bucher, twenty-five cents; Annie E. Barker, fifty cents; Dr. and Mrs. A. K. Olds, $5.

Three Who Are on the Watch.

BALLSTON, OR., Sept. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The self-sacrificing work now being performed for the Oregon Secular Union by its able officers is beyond all praise and must surely meet with its reward here, or on the other side of Jordan. The vacation allowed from their Portland duties has been put in in spreading the light in the rural districts. The writer had the pleasure of hearing Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union, lecture at Amity on "Special Providences," and her logical presentation of the Secular view drew forth enthusiastic applause from an audience of whom few had before heard that side of the question. Mrs. Smith is an exceedingly able speaker. The objects of the Secular Union were set forth tersely and clearly by D. W. Smith, a very pleasant speaker and third vice-president of the Oregon State Secular Union. Miss Nettie Olds gave a very clear explanation of the methods of Sunday-school teaching in the First Secular Church of Portland, of which school she is superintendent; while her charming elocution and violin solos were highly appreciated by the audience. Miss Olds is a new beginner on the rostrum, but bids fair to become a fine orator. These speakers hav adopted as a rule that moderate tone which convinces without antagonizing. WALLACE YATES.

Only a Few Will Work.

CADMUS, KAN., Sept. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1.25, for which send books named on inclosed list. This will make about $3 we hav sent from here, and I think the leaven is working. I think that is a grand thought of yours. It seems as though we the people who hav the light ought to fill the United States full of Paine's "Age of Reason." But there are so many professed unbelievers, who will not do anything. They will look at you with a kind of sickly expression, if you ask them to chip in a few cents for the good cause. It always has been that a few hav to fight the battles, to pave the way for a higher civilization. I don't want to discourage lecturers, but I find we, of this part of the vineyard, cannot get the ones to attend that we want to hav hear the truth. Our lecturers charge about $10, which is little enough, but I think we can beat it for the money by putting it into books and sending them broadcast over the land, and I believe your proposition is the best.

John Peck, of Naples, knows what he is talking about when he talks finance or anything else. There are a lot of fellows on THE TRUTH SEEKER I should like to shake hands with, and not the least among them Eugene and his brother George. For the good cause, ASA SMITH.

Some Flat Disobedience.

MR. EDITOR: Being kind enough to print two items I write you a third. The church members preach hell to me; I tell them they worship Jehovah, the God of the Jews. He says: "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath." The Christian makes and enforces laws to compel people to make holy observance on Sunday, contrary to the command of the God they worship. Again: David in his last two Psalms commands us to praise the Lord with stringed instruments and with the dance; the church member does all he can to prevent the dance, thereby thwarting the will of God; the youth and maiden do what they can to obey God in this case. Again: Jesus commands us not to pray in public—read the sixth chapter of Matthew—but at every church they fall on their knees and say, "O Lord, thou knowest I hav done many things I ought not to hav done, and left many things undone that I ought to hav done," and instead of mending their ways they go on sinning against God; so if you want a through ticket to hell fire and brimstone all you hav to do is to join the church and do as you are told to do, misuse and mislead the young and rising generation, and in the language of Robert Burns:

"Be to the poor like any whinstone,
And haud their noses to the grindstone,
Ply every art of legal thieving,
No matter, stick to sound believing."

H. B. ALLEN.

Facts and Inquiries.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Can a man reason logically who has attended a Sunday-school in early years? Will not his best ideas soon assume the character of folly and madness? He will abandon the light of consistency for the shrouded mysteries of religion. Prejudice the mind of a child, and you distort and ruin his reasoning powers, leaving him hoodooed for life.

Does common sense suggest the idea of a God, or is it a crazy error taken from the musty archives of heathenism? Are body and spirit combined parts of the order of nature? What can be proved conclusivly by presumptiv reasoning or evidence? Two things are necessary to life: The action of positiv and negativ forces reduced to a system, with sensitivness, also heat. Why does a man turn cold when he is dead?

Solomon and Machiavelli united church and state, bathing both in blood; they murdered pretenders to the throne. Such men could save your soul, but not your money. Christ was not good enough for the Pharisees, who rule the world now. What is the creed of the true Christian? Bull-dog principles hunt down all, especially the poor. Thumbscrews are useful—they might take you to heaven.

I ommitted something from the Bible which we should never forget: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." ALHAZA.

"About Books."

SUNAPEE, N. H., Sept. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I was pleased to see in last week's issue of your paper an opportune article under the above caption. The sentiment you there expressed that "in view of the disputes that arise concerning every prominent man's religious belief, after he is dead, a record over his own hand has become a necessity—almost a duty"—I completely indorse. But as I do not claim to be a "prominent" man, although a very decided and uncompromising Freethinker, yet I hav many times expressed to my literary friends the same idea. My own efforts hav as yet only taken the shape of communications for the newspaper press; and as no acquaintance or friend of mine has any cause to doubt my firm convictions on theological, or what are commonly called religious opinions, there might be no very apparent necessity in my special case of giving my speculativ opinions shape in book form. But I hav recently been seriously thinking of embodying my deliberate and well-settled views in that convenient shape, at least for publication after I hav been laid away.

I hav written sufficiently for the press to know that it is of great importance to make a good selection of a caption for an article: and the same rule holds in regard to an appropriate and attractiv title for a book. I hav tried to decide on the title of my volume, and as yet hav got nothing better than "A Materialist's Legacy." When the matter which may constitute its contents is finally arranged, a more suitable name may be found.

I like the clear-cut brevity of Thomas Jefferson's confession to his friend William Short, in April, 1820, when he said tersely, "I am a Materialist." No intelligent and honest man need hesitate to make that confession, for all that any human being ever knew or knows now is bounded by "matter" and its inevitable motions—all the rest that has been written and printed is simply wandering conjecture busked in mere words.

But I did not intend in this brief note to do more than to thoroughly approve of your suggestion referred to, and to express a hope that the able Freethinkers of this country will act on your advice. I am yours truly, W. C. STUROC.

Business Correspondence as to Advertising.

Sept. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been seriously considering the question of newspaper advertising in religious papers. We hav principally confined ourselvs to papers representing certain denominations, believing they represented the religious thought of the community and also the men who had homes and means with which to purchase goods. We hav been laboring under the supposition, whether correct or not, that the man who subscribes for a religious paper, who has a definit creed, and is a member of some church is the religious man of the community. We hav received a number of communications from various persons conducting denominational and undenominational papers, with arguments pro and con as to the relativ merits of the two classes of religious papers. Hav you anything to say on the subject? We would be glad to hav your opinion and would consider it very seriously. Is it true or not, judging from your experience, that the man who reads an undenominational paper is a floating commodity in the religious world and has no abiding place? Yours truly, THE——WOVEN WIRE FENCE CO.

NEW YORK, Sept. 14, 1894.

THE——WOVEN WIRE FENCE CO., Gentlemen: Your letter and circulars at hand. It certainly is a momentous question, which is the more stable and dependable citizen, the denominational or the undenominational Christian. But we fancy you are more interested in selling woven wire fence than in the subtleties—which we acknowledge—of the denominational or undenominational strife to buy woven wire fence. To be or not to be has ever been a mooted question. That being the case, we can cordially recommend you to advertise in THE TRUTH SEEKER, a solid and stanch Freethought journal, the national organ of the Freethinkers, who are not torn by denominational strife. The Freethinker is the real solid citizen, who has his abiding place here on earth, believes in his home here, and makes as good a one and as permanent as he can. Naturally he has to fence it to keep the preachers out, and if your woven wire fence is high and strong enough I don't see why he shouldn't use that to protect his women folks and chickens. There is a great field for you here, and we charge nothing for the idea, beyond our regular advertising rates, which we inclose.

Anything that the denominational editor will sav about the unbranded scribe will be born of jealousy and a desire for advertising. Take our advice and place your advertising where the Freethinkers will see it. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER all hav abiding places, and though they are corraled in no church they can buy fence wire from the best Christian in the country. —ED. T. S.

Not in an Argumentativ Spirit.

BERWICK, N. S., Sept. 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I come, not in an argumentativ spirit, but humbly seeking information. There hav been many discussions in your paper of late between Spiritualists and Materialists. I hav never been fortunate enough to hav any intercourse with disembodied spirits through mediums or any other way and, while affirming or denying nothing, I am rather skeptical. I should like to ask some Spiritualist how the knuckles, or whatever it may be, of an airy nothing can produce audible raps on a table. Sound can be produced only by the vibration of material substance; the more substantial the material the more decided is the tone. A hammer clashing on an anvil produces a very definit tone; but substitute for the hammer a rubber ball or a dry sponge, and then note the difference in sound. Again, substitute for the sponge an ethereal nonentity lighter than air, a ghostly nothing, and then explain these spirit rappings, the ghoulish punchings and fumblings on substantial flesh that can be affected only by material substance.

Now, do not let any Spiritualist brother wax indignant and declare that I am only exposing my ignorance, because that is just what I set out to do in the beginning. If, as some affirm, the spirit is really material, thin and ethereal, but none the less real, I see nothing to hinder a good western cyclone from scattering the ghost of Thomas Paine all over the American continent.

Matter can be affected only by matter, and that through the action of force and energy. Not one of the five senses of man can be reached in any other way, and if he has any other senses they are yet to be discovered. No doubt there are many things in so-called spirit phenomena difficult to explain, but where will you turn and not find mystery? Are there not a thousand and one tricks of legerdemain fully as mysterious to the uninitiated? Is hypnotism or mesmerism any less inexplicable? Are there not mysteries even in the word of God from Genesis to Revelation, from Cain's cattle-brand to the white lightning conversion of Saul of Tarsus? Even in the tariff protection theory there are certain points hard to explain, and shall we expect to find less in the blind workings of nature, particularly when aided by the skilful manipulation of man?

As I said before, I am not arguing, but merely inquiring. It is easy to be too credulous, but not easy to be too skeptical. As poverty is the mother of invention, so is doubt the grandmother of discovery through her noble daughter, investigation. Moreover, if disembodied spirits are privileged to knock furniture about at will, what is to hinder any evil-minded ghost from knocking a man's brains out with the wash-stand while he is sleeping peacefully in his bed? Ough! it makes me think of the nightmares of my infancy.

Enough, good sir, but when any of your Spiritualist correspondents are disposed to answer my inquiries, I am disposed to hear them. W. P. LAWRENCE.

The Tariff Views of Mr. Hays.

QUINIAULT, WASH., Sept. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been considerably interested in the tariff articles by Mr. Peck and Mr. Hays and others, and being a free trader desire to furnish the latter gentleman with a fact which he asks for in your issue of August 25th. I bought a sack of sugar (100 pounds) a few days ago, just about the time the Wilson bill was passed, and was told by the dealer that the reason sugar was higher was because the said bill was sure to pass and the duty had been added. Everybody please make his own comment.

Again, there are two nail factories on the Pacific coast. One of them advertised awhile ago, "Thirty thousand kegs of nails for sale on a basis of $2.75 per keg. If for foreign shipment sixty cents per keg off" Make your own comments, gentlemen.

Once more. The Post-Blakely Mill Company sold 47,755,075 feet of lumber in foreign markets, in direct competition with the "cheap" labor of Canada and elsewhere. Did it make enough off the home trade to make up for the loss (?) sustained by relinquishing the benefit of the tariff on the foreign? (Seattle paper.)

Yet again. The Gray's Harbor Commercial Company has received two large orders for shipment to eastern Canada. It is a sufficient answer to all the argument against free lumber. (Aberdeen Herald, Wash.)

And I can furnish Mr. Hays with several more facts if he wants them. But I want to say his statement concerning steel rails is a very one-sided affair. The fact is, the first steel rails shipped to this country were made by an old process, and cost of manufacture was greater. They were shipped about the close of the civil war and sold at war price.

Mr. Hays does not tell us that American coal is practically on the surface; that vast deposits of iron ore hav been discovered that are above the track, and he neglects to inform his readers that by the Bessemer-Siemens process of converting cast iron into steel, steel rails can be made to-day cheaper than cast iron could be thirty years ago. But this neglect is one that can always be noticed in protectiv argument. Hon. Tom Johnson, M. C., from Ohio, says his mill makes one-thirteenth of all the steel rails produced in the United States, and that all he gets above $17.60 a ton (I quote from memory) is clear gain. In this instance the tariff is not all added. But who pays the extra $10? If Mr. Hays will carefully look up the date on which "manufacturers began to put out their fires," he will find that it was not "from the day of Cleveland's election," but that it began about two years before that, and the remainder of his statement is true, but is not due to the tariff. Neither will the high protectiv Wilson bill ruin the country as he says it will. I hav "marked his prediction." Mr. Hays hurts my American pride when he insinuates that Yankee machinery is second to any. I hav seen much of it and handled some. It is my choice. I will admit that probably he can set a hen better than I can, but on the tariff and Yankee notions he is unreliable. J. N. LOCKE.

Some Work in Washington.

ROSBURG, WASH., Aug. 11, E. M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: We hav organized the Secularists here, and hoping others will follow our example, we will giv an ouline of our methods and experience I came here from Portland, Or., the latter part of April, in response to a demand for a genuin Liberal school teacher, "one not ashamed to be called an Infidel—one who knows where the Bible belongs." "Veni, vidi, vici!" H. P. Andresen, a well-known Freethinker, is the controlling member of the school board here, holds the balance of power between Methodists and Catholics. He wrote to C. B. Reynolds, secretary of the Washington Secular Union, to furnish a teacher, and as the Washington Secular Union had no bureau of Secular teachers and directors, the application was referred to Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon Secular Union. She offered the billet to me, and I hav been teaching here more than three months. All Secular teachers should register with Katie Kehm Smith. Although this is away back in the country, on Gray's river, twenty miles from Astoria by water, with steamer three times a week, almost inaccessible by land, with no passable roads, everyone traveling in boats instead of buggies, we hav organized the Gray's River Union as an auxiliary of the Oregon State Secular Union, with over thirty activ members, and the following officers: W. C. Kessell, president; P. C. Neilsen, vice-president; John O'Brien, treasurer; Orville C. Lee, secretary; H. P. Andresen, chairman executiv committee; Mesdames M. Feustel and E. Pemberton, members. We hav also organized a Secular Sunday school. We use the same lessons they do in Portland Secular Sunday Schools and in other towns in Oregon and Washington. The lessons are type written, and furnished by Katie Kehm Smith.

For particulars address her at Oregon City, Or. We hav been teaching the children about metals, fishes, the human body, plants, and animals. We try to fill their minds with the simple truths of science instead of having them crammed with superstition at the Methodist Episcopal Sunday school. We hope to see a Secular Sunday school in every school-house in the United States.

We had a Secular revival in August. Katie Kehm Smith and D. W. Smith, accompanied by Nettie A. Olds, conducted the meetings. Katie K. Smith lectured here Aug. 5, at 2 P.M.; subject: "The Fiction of the Christian Easter Day;" at 7:30 on "What Secularism has Done for Woman." At both meetings, Miss Olds delighted the audience with her violin solos and recitations. She is a fine violinist and elocutionist. On Monday evening Miss Olds delivered a lecture on "The Free Moral Agency of Man," which was a masterly effort, after which Mrs. Smith recited. Miss Olds promises to become a bright star in our increasing constellation of Secular orators. They remained with us ten days. On the 12th of August, at 2 P.M., Katie K. Smith lectured on the "American Protectiv Association." On Sunday evening her subject was "Special Providence." On Monday night her subject was "The Secularist's Hope," showing what Secularism offers in the place of the Christian dogmas. The lectures were highly appreciated. We had large and attentiv audiences, and the revival was a complete success. We gave a dance for the benefit of the Oregon State Secular Union. It was more successful, financially, than we anticipated. The Behnke Bros. volunteered their assistance in furnishing the music, Nettie A. Olds alternately playing on the violin and dancing. They will be long remembered on Gray's river by all. Of course the Methodists had to start a few scandalous libels about them after they left. Freethought lecturers expect the Christians to lie about them. That is the Christian method of replying to the logic of Secular lectures. They hav no argument with which they can reply to our public speakers, so they start slanders about them. Well, they hav lied about Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, et al. There is some consolation—they cannot burn us at the stake as they did Bruno and Servetus. But they show the same Christian spirit; they would like to muzzle us. Our trio, the Smith-Olds troupe, went from here to Astoria, O., thence to Tillamook county, Or. We will let them tell of their own adventures in Oregon. We wish them success in spreading the truths of Secularism wherever they may go, and bespeak for them the coöperation of all Freethinkers. We hope to attend the Oregon State Secular Union Congress at Forest Grove, Or., Oct. 5, 6, and 7, then go to Chicago to attend the convention of the American Secular Union as delegates from Oregon and Washington. O. C. LEE.

Calls Attention to Some Mysteries.

LIME GROVE, IND., Sept. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Even though I, individually, am unable to advance the cause of Liberalism in a financial way, it is quite a consolation to me to see the advance of Liberal ideas, and to note the change in the people's mode of thought and action. It is plainly visible without getting a microscope with a double compound lens. It is easily seen by observing the daily walk and talk of our most enterprising and thoughtful citizens. Oh, may the time soon come when the Bible, Jesus Christ, God & Co. will be obliterated from the minds of the people, and common sense, reason, and fidelity be so firmly ingrafted in their minds that ignorance, superstition, and credulity never again will make an appearance among mankind.

It has often come to me in my musings that nine-tenths of our more professedly religious beings do not read the Bible—that is, do not notice particulars. In the first chapter of Genesis there are particulars enough to cause the most radical Bibleite to put on his thinking-cap (meager as most of them are) and consider seriously the veracity of the inspired scriptures:

1. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Is is a well-established fact that matter can be neither manufactured nor destroyed, and the establishment of this fact makes the first verse of the Bible an utter absurdity.

2. "And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

Can anyone who is sane, or who has as much sense as "God gave a last year's bird's nest," imagin an object that is composed of land and water to be without form? I will admit for argument's sake that the earth was without form, but darkness was upon the face of the earth, and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters Can we imagin a thing without form to hav a face? Face meaning surface, can an object without form hav a surface? Undoubtedly not. In verses 3, 4, and 5 light was made, and divided from darkness, and day and night were ordained.

What was between the waters above and the waters below before God made the firmament? Nothing—another absurdity; and just think, it took him all the second day (a few thousand years, as some pious Christians proclaim) to create a space between the clouds and the sea. Well, the third day he had a more difficult task, as we will all hav to admit—that of dividing the land and water, and forming what are known in modern times as seas and continents. In my opinion, he (God) had better hav done this on the morning of the first day; then he would not hav been obliged to swim for the first two days—ah, thousands upon thousands of years! Evolution is in its infancy at this time; he (God) has gone through the process, and has changed from a water-dog to an herbivorous quadruped, and we next hav him recorded as a gardener, overseeing his vegetables and fruits. In the fourth day we find that he has another job on hand—that of making the sun, moon, and stars to giv us light by day and by night. It has often been a query to me as to what furnished light from the first to the fourth day, and, some will assert that a day in those times was something like a thousand years of modern time, a greater mystery still to be unfolded to me is how the grass, the fruit, and the vegetables planted on the third day could grow and produce every kind after its kind without the influence that we in modern times know that the sun exerts upon the plant world.

In the sixteenth verse we find it recorded that he (God) made two great lights, the greater (meaning the sun) to shine by day, the lesser (the moon) to giv us light by night. Now, to all observers of the action of the moon it is known that the moon does not always giv us light by night on account of its slower movement than the sun. God is perfect; but we see that his perfection is not without a flaw, and the moon does not at all times perform the function intended by the all-wise creator. We find that on the fifth day he created the animals and fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and gave them good advice; he did not giv them a chance to eat of the forbidden fruit, but told them to multiply and replenish the sea and the earth. Not so with the cattle and beasts of the earth which he made on the sixth day; he neither placed a tree of forbidden fruit before them nor told them to multiply. No doubt they could not understand good Hebrew Latin at that time; but they simply understood the instincts of nature, and soon they transgressed God's law, for it is presumed that that which was commanded by God you should do, but that which was not commanded you should not do.

Now we come to where God was ready to make man, and he made him out of the dust of the ground, and blew into his nostrils in order to giv him life. God made woman out of a rib of Adam. Does not this show the subordination of woman? How can people of the present day advocate woman suffrage and yet declare the scriptures to be divinely inspired?

In Gen. i, 26, God says, "Let us make man in our image." Is the word God plural? Was God married? If so, who was his wife? Was there more than one God? If so, what relation are they? These are nuts that I cannot crack.

Yours, etc., GEO. C. ANDERSON.

Answers to Nineteen Questions.

CASTANA, IA., Sept. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 15th, Mr. D. Webster Groh challenges myself and three other correspondents to answer his nineteen questions. My consistent and harmonious reply is as follows:

1. If Mr. Groh will examin the factory statistics he will find that various articles hav decreased in price while the producer's wages were increasing.

2. Carnegie is not a protectionist. Previous to the election of 1892 he became a full-fledged tariff reformer, thereby joining the camp of his plutocratic brethren He now livs in a castle in Scotland and writes magazine articles in favor of reuniting the United States with the United Kingdom.

3. Nearly all protectionists are opposed to unrestricted immigration. The American laborer should be protected.

4. No kind of a tariff on a product necessarily cheapens it.

5. Prices of what? It is not the object of any tariff to fix the market price of goods.

6. See answer to fourth question.

7. Nobody ever said the tariff was not a tax.

8 The only reason why the bounty on sugar was given was to encourage the producers to try to manufacture all the sugar consumed in the Union. No patriotic citizen can oppose that object.

9. "Cheaper exchangeable equivalent" be hanged. In a few years—provided this nation does not go clear daft over a foolish theory—all the tin plate consumed in America will be made in the factories of this country. Then we will rejoice!

10. Who said they could?

11. All trade is not now and never has been "mutually beneficial." If the benefit was really mutual there would be no tariff racket. The commercial nations all take advantage of any country, whenever they get a chance.

12. "Inexpensiv delusiv nothingness" is as funny as a circus. As a matter of fact imports hav, to some extent, displaced American labor.

13 Water and fire are good, but that is no reason why we should drown or burn ourselvs.

14. International trade is not necessarily impoverishing, nor interstate trade hurtful.

15. Foreign trade may or may not be injurious, according to circumstances. As for subsidies, inquire of our British cousins. Americans hav small experience in that line.

16. "Blockade" must be a near relation to that imaginary "Chinese Wall" which makes the perennial campaign lie so lurid.

17. The trust method of doing business was imported from Great Britain, that country being much afflicted by them. We hav not only imported that odious method, fostered by free trade, but also the Englishmen who hav thereby gained the greatest amount of trust wealth. All trust men on both sides of the water are free trade tariff reformers.

18 Aside from all tariffs there are good reasons why the continental nations hav not, as yet, equaled the wages of the United Kingdom. It would take too much space to fully consider this subject, which has no direct bearing on American affairs. A tariff duty is only one of many items which go to the making up of market prices and the rate of wages. It should be remembered that the United Kingdom bas all the accumulated wealth and power—all the signal advantage of four hundred years of protection. The English tariff reformers hav kicked over the ladder by which their nation climbed to be the "sovereign of the seas," and the most important factor of the world's commerce. But the ladder was there! And then, strictly speaking, the United Kingdom is not a free trade country. She raises nearly $100,000,000 of revenue from customs duties. Some of those duties bear heavily on the breakfast table of the poor. One of them taxes American manufactured tobacco more than 1500 per cent. Finally she protects her foreign shipping by paying large sums of money in subsidies. Surely John Peck would not consid r England a genuin free trade country.

19. Because the game is not worth the candle.

REMARKS.

It is gratifying to learn that the father of Mr. Groh was an outspoken abolitionist. If he was not a "mechanical" abolitionist he strenuously opposed the dangerous political heresies of those arch-enemies of free labor, J. C. Calhoun and Jefferson Davis. He must also hav resented the influence of Wm. E Gladstone, a sympathizer with the Southern Confederacy who, in behalf of the capitalists and aristocrats of Great Britain, would hav been more than pleased to see our blessed Union broken up. Free trade was next to the chief corner-stone of the pro-slavery confederate constitution. To-day the "solid South" is the hub of the wheel of tariff reform. The common people hav not complained of federal taxation; they hav not demanded free trade. The enormous influence pushing the tariff reform crusade comes from aliens, foreign capitalists, trust men, importers, shippers, and landlords. These all hanker after cheap labor, and cheap labor they are bound to hav if they can delude the laboring poor with the deceptiv slogan of tariff reform. The ancient Trojan said, "I fear these Greeks bearing gifts." As an abolitionist and the son, grandson, and nephew of three abolitionists, I cannot follow the lead of the tariff reform plutocrats; they are the logical enemies of free labor.

Trusting that my harmonious and altogether lovely answers to the nineteen questions hav forever relieved me from the horrid imputation of being "presumptuous," I remain the humble servant of Freethought, PRESTON DAY.

Kick up your heels and run, boys,
Keep out in the air and sun, boys,
Make chase to each other—hav fun boys.

Be hopeful and jolly and glad, boys,
Better be thus than sad, boys,
Should you be sad don't be mad, boys,
Don't run into mischief, like bad boys.

To all others do as you should, boys,
And be to your parents real good, boys,
Since for you they've done all they could, boys,
And furnished you clothing and food, boys.

If you do not mean to be fool-boys,
You must make it your practice and rule, boys,
To be prompt and punctual at school, boys.
There, don't all rush at once, but keep cool, boys.

The Inquirendo Club.

V.

"Our club is progressing," remarked Florence, at the next meeting. "I hav here an interesting letter from Aunt Kate, who, it seems, has taken an activ interest in our society, for, after generalities, she asks:

"'Can any member of the Inquirendo Club describe Carthage to me? I would like very much to hav information upon this subject, especially as I recall one of Ernestine's poems, beginning something after this fashion:

Carthage's founder, royal queen!
Methinks I view thy strife
With Pygmalion, unnatural one,
Who sought a sister's life.

With treasures rare and goodly friends,
To sail the briny blue,
And seek on Afric's barren shore
A trusty kingdom new,

We greet thee, powerful Dido,
Fair queen of royal state;
Founder of an empire grand—
Carthage, rich and great!

Immortal city! on whose shores
The Mediterranean dashes;
Many and great were the victories won—
Peace be to thy ashes!

"'I do not know if I hav quoted all, but believe it to be verbatim, as far as written. I hav many more queries, but will hav to leave them until next time. Remember me to all, etc.'"

"The idea," exclaimed Ernestine, with seeming chagrin, as Florence ceased reading, "of her quoting those verses! They were written a long while ago, when I was studying Virgil. She did not quote them all, either, but it doesn't matter," she added hastily, while Aunt Margaret said: "Carthage was one of the greatest cities of antiquity, situated on the northern coast of Africa, in the state of Tunis, on a peninsula extending into a small bay of the Mediterranean sea. It was supposed to hav been founded by Dido, a Phœnician queen, who fled from Tyre after the murder of her husband and uncle, and a priest of Hercules called Sichæus, by Virgil. Pygmalion, Dido's brother, who caused the slaughter, endeavored to gain possession of the riches, but Dido outwitted him, and escaped with Tyrians, who accompanied her, to Africa. There, according to the legend, she founded Carthage. But what seems more probable, it originated for some trading purpose the colonial merchants of Utica and the capitalists of Tyre used it for, because of its convenience as a mercantil seaport. Of Carthage proper little is known. Modern information of it begins only after it became a great commercial city, and the accounts of it, even then, are scanty. It had also a very stormy history. The Carthagenians were seldom at peace. The city was overthrown B.C. 146, and a new city was organized, which did not, however, prosper. Augustus, carrying out the intention of his great uncle, restored the city, and the new Carthage had become, in the second and third centuries of the Christian era, one of the finest cities in the Roman empire. It was oligarchical in form of government, and the religion was the same as that of the Phœnicians—a worship of stars and of fire."

Aunt Margaret ceased speaking, and Ernestine asked: "In what year occurred the siege of Calais?"

"During the ninth century," answered Florence. "In King Edward's reign, Calais was then but a small fishing village, and belonged to the French. But the king of England captured it after a long siege, and held it from the French people, who in the meantime were suffering greatly. Their stores of provisions were nearly gone, and starvation stared these loyal people in the face. Still they refused to consider King Edward's harsh terms, until in despair six old men, with white beards and heroic natures, suggested offering themselvs as a ransom for their country. Perplexed and saddened at the terrible situation, the people reluctantly consented.

Then forth there stept with gallant bearing,
Six brave men whose noble daring
Was to save the city there
From the doom of slow despair,

As Nora Perry very prettily expresses it, and who were saved by Queen Phillippa's gracious intercession:

"For my sake" she sweetly said,
Lifting up her drooping head.

"And for her sake," this "soldier, conqueror, and king," granted the tardy pardon. Calais is now a flourishing seaport town of France. It was held by the English until 1558, when it was captured by the Duke of Guise, since which time it has been made under the French dominion, excepting the two years of 1596-98, when the Spanish held possession. Louis XVIII lived there in 1814, after his exile."

"May I," said Lillie rather timidly, "ask who Margaret Fuller was?" "Most certainly," was the response. "Margaret Fuller, Marchioness D'Ossoli, was one of the most remarkable women of her time. She was born at Cambridgeport, Mass., May 23, 1810. Her father, Timothy Fuller, was an advocate and gave his daughter an excellent education and nurtured her with great care. She grew up to be an earnest, self supporting, self-reliant woman. Her favorit studies were philosophy, history, and esthetics. She wrote Latin verses at the age of eight, and was familiar with the German writers Tieck, Schelling, and Novalis. After her father's death she assisted the family by private teaching, until in 1839 she founded a society for ladies where she herself delivered several lectures. In compliance with a request from Horace Greeley, she proceeded to New York, and contributed a great deal to the New York Tribune. She married Marquis D'Ossoli in December, 1847, whom she met in Rome. During a tour through Paris she became acquainted with Madam Dudevant, known by the nom de plume of 'George Sand.' In 1849, during the siege of Rome, Margaret took the charge of a hospital, and viewed with feelings of pain the downfall of the Roman republic. In 1850 she set out on her return to America with her husband and little infant, but just as they came in sight of New York, a hurricane dashed upon the ship and the three perished in the waves. Her untimely and tragical death saddened many hearts. Emerson and Channing published her memoirs in 1852 (London edition) under the title of 'Memoirs of Margaret Fuller; Marchesa Ossoli.'"

Just as Florence ceased speaking the drawing-room clock rang out the hour of four, and promptly at the cessation the club adjourned.

That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Gems of Thought.

No institution will be better than the institutor.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

GENERALLY speaking, the less a man knows about a subject, the more he wants to talk about it.—F. Van Dorn.

As we hold that a theft is a theft whether the amount stolen be a pound or a penny, so we must hold that an aggression is an aggression whether it be great or small.—Herbert Spencer.

EVERY unit of gain in the æsthetic sense, every diffusion of a wider taste for poetry, for art, for music, for decoration, is to the good for humanity. What measures our distance above the beasts that perish consists in these three things—ethics, intellect, the sense of beauty.—Grant Allen.

THAT the Hexateuch in its known form is of a comparativly very recent orgin is fully borne out by the fact that the prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries B C. know nothing of a Mosaic code. Jeremiah is the first prophet who has reference to a code, and his quotations are taken from Deuteronomy.—Dr. E. Reich.

UNHAPPILY, there are many men who are not born, but damned into the world. It may not be the best theology, but it is the soundest sense, to admit that some—by inherited defects and taints of blood, by mental, physical, and moral peculiarities, by surroundings and training and circumstances—hav no fair chances of being anything but bad.—Rev. Osborne Jay.

O, PITY the Puritan friar and nun,
Who crucify sense for the soul;
Who tread upon thistles while under the sun,
And quaff the bitterest bowl.

O, pity the martyrs, wherever they are,
Who sacrifice happiness here;
Who boast of the pleasures they mangle and mar
In their wrath on the altars they rear
—Kenneth Lamar.

To those who are strangers to the study of the heavenly bodies, although frequently masters of the other parts of natural philosophy, astronomy has still the reputation of being an eminently religious science, as if the famous verse, The heavens declare the glory of God, still preserved all its value. To minds early familiarized with true philosophical astronomy, the heavens declare no other glory than that of Hipparchus, of Kepler, of Newton, and of all those who hav aided in establishing their laws.—Auguste Comte.

UNDER the cover of religion, men, perhaps, more frequently indulge the bitterness of passion, without compunction, than in any other situation. The wretch who wantonly, and without some salve to his conscience, attacks private character, feels self-condemned. But the sour, sanctimonious, grace-hardened bigot embarks all his pride, gratifies all his revenge, and empties his corroded bosom of its gall, and, smoothing over the distorted features of his countenance, says, and half believes, that "he has done God service!"—Rev. President Knott.

I VERILY believe that the great good which has been effected by Christianity has been largely counteracted by the pestilential doctrin on which all the churches hav united, that honest disbelief in their more or less astonishing creeds is a moral offense—indeed, a sin of the deepest dye, deserving and inviting the same future retribution as murder and robbery. If we could only see, in our view, the torrent of hypocrisy and cruelty, the lies, the slaughter, the violation of every obligation of humanity, which hav flowed from this sewer along the course of the history of Christian nations, our worst imaginations of hell would pale beside the vision. —Professor Huxley.

I WRITE on a sweet evening in May. The heaven is blue, and the earth is green. Far away on the horizon the sky touches the hill, the bridegroom kisses the bride, and the bride blushes crimson from the vesper salute. The air is slumbrous with the hum of wild-bees, and the white of the gamboling lambs contrasts with the golden flush of the dandelion blooms amid which they play. On the meadow there is a moving shadow, the shadow of the slow trail of an evening cloud, lined with silver and fringed with crimson filigree. On the hill top the lips of heaven, the bridegroom, are still pressed to the cheek of earth, the bride, which blushes with the wild-rose's faint and tender glow. Heaven and earth are reconciled. Suggest not to me the pain and horror that are involved in "the shedding of blood." Avaunt with the barbaric vulgarity! The beech spreads over my head, dense with spring's young leaves—away with the stain of gore. The white daisies prink the green sward at my feet—begone with the shuddering ideal that would link them with gouts of blood rather than drops of dew!—Suladin.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreadful disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

THE Deacon (to the cowboy, who has just dropped in to see what a revival was like): "Young man, hav you made your peace with your creator?" The Cowboy: "I ain't never had no trouble with him." —Life.

THE PESSIMIST: "Do you really think the world will ever be Christianized?" The Optimist: "You bet I do. And at the rate the heathen are being wiped out by these machine guns nowadays it won't be long, either.—Indianapolis Journal."

"Do you want to see your little baby-brother?" asked a Lawndale mother of her five-year-old, the morning after he had been sent into the city to stay over night at grandma's. "Yes. Hav I got one?" "Certainly. Come and see him." "What! that?" "Of course. Don't you think he is lovely?" "N-not exactly. Where did you get him?" "The doctor brought him." "Where did the doctor get him?" "An angel brought him from heaven." "From heaven?" "Yes." "Are you sure?" "Certainly. Why do you ask?" "Oh, nothing; only I thought he might hav got him from the other place by mistake. You see, mother, a real hot fire always makes my face look just as red and wrinkled as that." "Oh!" And the poor mother came near going into hysterics.

A RELIGIOUS congregation in England wanted to procure new hymn books, but they were very poor and could not afford to pay for them at the ordinary prices. They understood, however, that a certain great advertising house, a business house that made patent medicins, was willing to furnish them hymn books at a penny each if they would allow some advertisments to be inserted in the books. They thought that would be no special harm, that they might hav a few pages of advertisments bound up with Watts and Doddridge. They agreed to the proposition. The books came duly printed, and they got down to the church on the 24th of December. On Christmas morning the model Christians, who had no thought of anything but religion, got up to sing. Their pastor gave out by the first liue a very familiar hymn. Immediately the congregation arose to their feet, and in a few seconds were aghast to find themselvs singing:

> Hark! the herald angels sing
> Beecham's pills are just the thing.
> Peace on earth and mercy mild;
> Two for man and one for child.

I MOVE, Mr. Editor, that, pursuant to the idea implied in the resolution which Mr. Morse (of the House) and Mr. Frye (of the Senate) are fathering, we all turn Christians, no matter what our belief may in fact be; that for the purpose of carrying out the spirit of that resolution we resolve ourselvs into a committee and procure synods of the representativs of the different creeds of Christendom, each to formulate their own tenets and these teuets to be enforced for all time to come as the only and unalterable inspiration which the people of the United States are entitled to believe hereafter; or that, failing the proper harmony in view, each creed may employ such force or agency to compel agreement with its tenets as it sees fit, for this purpose using persuasion, arms, dynamite, and the torch, if necessary; or that, after such methods hav been tried as effectually as may be, the said Morse or Frye if they be living at said time, be invested with the pontifical power of fixing the tenets for universal belief in the United States, and that to the end that their religious aspirations may not prove a dead letter they be likewise invested with plenary powers to enforce their Ex Cathedra views for all time to come; that a high and insurmountable wall be built on the boundaries of the United States, of sufficient strength and durability to outlast the crack of doom, to keep out of its domain any disturbing agency from other parts of the habitable world, and that no resident thereof be permitted to depart therefrom, whether with a view to return or otherwise, so that the possibility of outside disturbing factors be excluded; that the present fathers and mothers, who hav the interest of their offspring at heart, inculcate the lesson of total abstinence from future race reproduction so that the sorrow and misery, death and desolation, of fanatical religious bigotry may hav nothing to feed on in the course of ages; that the United States be then exposed to the possibility of a national desert and graveyard; and that no scientific or other doctrin be hereafter taught in any school, or other occupation be followed, which nearly or remotely, in the course of events, may conflict with such tenets so fixed (?) in their logical and strictest application. And I move further that Messrs. Morse and Frye be awarded the crown for the splendid exhibition of intellectual greatness they hav made in offering the said resolution for serious consideration.—Morris M. Cohn, in American Israelite.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed A lecture by the Rev Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not mary. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

THE Republican-Populist fusion in North Carolina is not a complete success. some conspicuous members of both parties refusing to support the ticket.

THREE Mississippi white-caps hav been sentenced to prison—two for five years each and the other for two years. Their offense was the whipping of two women.

GUSTAVE AMÉDÉE HUMBERT, French Republican Senator, died in Paris on September 25th. He was born June 28, 1822. He wrote works on law, finance, and Roman antiquities.

BY the death of Emma Fursch-Madi, which occurred a few days ago in New Jersey, the operatic stage loses one of its finest dramatic singers. She was born in France forty-seven years ago.

THE Connecticut Democrats nomiuated Ernest Cady for governor. The platform indorses Presideut Cleveland and the new tariff, so far as it goes, demands the abolition of the differential duties on sugar, and condemns in scathing language all religious tests of fitness for public office.

THOMAS SAIR CUMMINGS, the miniature painter and Dean of the Founders of the National Academy of Design, died at Hackensack, N. J., on September 24th. He was born in England in 1804.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has by proclamation granted amnesty and pardon to all violators of the special Congressional laws against polygamy who hav complied with the conditions prescribed in President Harrison's proclamation of Jan. 4, 1893.

CONGRESSMAN MICHAEL D. HARTER of Ohio is reluctant to take any part in the general campaign in his state because of the adoption of the 16 to 1 silver plank by the Democratic convention. But he may work for the election of Congressmen representing the opposing monetary principle.

A GOVERNMENT crisis in England seems to be near. All parties are anxiously awaiting a declaration by the ministry for the abrogation of the veto power of the Lords. The cabinet has not discussed the question, a disruption being feared as a result of the probable divergence of opinion.

IN 1880 Louisiana was the sixth state from the bottom of the list as regards illiteracy; in 1890 it reached the bottom. In 1880 18.4 per cent of the white adult population were unable to read and write; in 1890 the percentage had risen to 20.1. The white illiterate adults had increased from 58,951 to 80,913 During this time the negroes show a small percentage of gain. The New Orleans Times-Democrat brings out these facts.

DR. CHARLES A. BRIGGS says that denominationalism is the curse of Protestantism. He points out that while the average number of communicants to each Catholic priest in this country is 685 and 709 to each church building, the Protestauts hav an average of only 142 communicants to each minister and 105 to each building. He adds that the Protestants could do their work better with fifty thousand less ministers.

NEILL'S estimate of the cotton crop this year is 10,300,000 bales, with an allowance of 700,000 in the event of an early frost. This would still leave the crop the largest on record, the heaviest previous output having been the 9,035,000 bales of 1891-2. On October 26th, in view of the probable glut, October options declined to 6.03 cents per pound, November to 6.10 cents, December to 6.15 cents, and January to 6.21 cents. These are the lowest prices ever known. The lowest for any other year had been 6.28 cents for March, in 1892.

A STATE convention of the Jeffersonian and People's party of Alabama has been called to meet in Montgomery on November 12th, the day before the state legislature will assemble. It is thought by some that it is for the purpose of electing a United States Senator by a legislature which they will set up, and that they will then adjourn until Congress meets, and if the Republicans control the national law-making body, they will contest for the admission of their Senator and Representatives.

THE W. C. T. U. women are just now making themselvs very activ against the living pictures and theatrical show bills. Mrs. Pritchard, state superintendent of the department for the Promotion of Purity in Literature and Art, revealed herself when she said that no modest woman can be an artist's model. These people are much encouraged by the rejection by Carlisle of the St. Gauden's medal. Mrs. Pritchard says that the social evil is fed and kept alive by the living pictures.

THE secretary of the London Painters' Trade Society complained to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts that she had permitted her stablemen at Brookfield to paint the stables instead of having it done by union painters. The baroness replied that the stables are owned by her husband, and added that the "monstrous and intolerable oppression that the union claims to hav the right to practice, would deprive every workingman of the right to work out his own advancement by his own energy and rob him of his birthright of personal liberty." She has been much interested in the well-being of the workingmen, as she has returned a good part of her fortune to them for their benefit.

THE New York Democrats nominated Senator David B. Hill for governor and Judge William J. Gaynor for judge of the Court of Appeals. The administration was indorsed and the income tax regretted. The convention refused to giv any representation to the State Democracy and other independent elements. There is much dissatisfaction with this and the nomination of Hill. The Evening Post will not support the ticket and neither will the Times, from present appearances. The World probably will, although it very sharply criticises the selection for the head of the ticket. Outside the state, the independent papers which usually support the Democratic party denounce the action of the convention. Inasmuch as the presidential election of 1896 in all likelihood depends on the result in New York this year, these facts are important.

HOW THE SACREDNESS OR VENERATION FOR A PERSON VANISHES WITH THE STYLE OF HIS CLOTHES.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Bruno to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam.

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as ell as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Evasion and Mockery.

Such a terrible loss of life as is reported from the forest settlements in Minnesota is something to lament, something to arouse sympathy and to call for aid; but it calls for no special blame and can offer no particular warning. The order of nature and no will of man is responsible for the drouth which made such a conflagration possible. Men must press forward into new settlements, and they must run the risk of these extraordinary disasters; or else they must withdraw every ship from an ocean on which there may be a storm, and must move away from every acre upon which there may burst a thunderbolt. We are sure that tender hearts will offer sympathy and willing hands will yield help. The deaths are part of the tribute which civilization exacts from man.—New York Independent.

That is—one or two considerations aside—a common sense way of looking at the terrible disaster, but it is evasion and mockery when coming from the lips of a Christian, of a Theist. If there is an omnipotent God the awful calamity does call for "special blame," and it is nothing less than cowardly for believers in such a God to ignore the theological bearings of this disaster, as the Independent does. Most Christians are afraid to frankly deal with the moral implications of the God idea, and they hav never made a more pitiable exhibition of their timidity than when referring to the Minnesota horror. Yes, "tender hearts" did "offer sympathy," and "willing hands" did "yield help," and they were earthly hearts and earthly hands. Do not forget this when priests talk to you of the "oversoul." But when "God" is eliminated from the problem we find that man is responsible for many of these forest fires. He cuts down trees and leaves the tops to dry on the ground, where they are nearly as dangerous as so much powder when a drouth comes, and the drouth itself is aggravated if not caused by man's folly in denuding the earth's surface of its forests, which operate to prevent both floods and drouths. Then it also appears that incendiaries are to be charged with many of these conflagrations. Such are some of the secondary causes, but if an infinit God exists he is the primary cause, and it was his purpose to make use of the instrumentalities we hav named. If it was not his purpose then he is less than omnipotent. If it was his purpose he is morally imperfect. Man's folly cannot exculpate God, for man's folly is of God.

A Remarkable Defense of God.

Orthodox logic is something wonderful. No doubt our readers hav all made a note of the fact. Then sometimes apparently Liberal people are guilty of queer actions. What follows illustrates both truths. It will be remembered that the terrible forest fires in the Northwest called out from us an editorial on "God's Loving Providence." Well, that article reappears in the Daily Republican, of Fargo, North Dakota, over the signature of "A Writer." Of course "A Writer" knew where the article came from, and it is quite possible that the editor did also. Certainly the editor knew that it is a rule of newspaper ethics that all articles whose source is known should be credited to the original publication, and it would seem that "A Writer" should hav been equally conversant with this law of meum et tuum. Perhaps the editor approved the thoughts expressed in the article, but did not like to take the responsibility of reprinting it as a selection and so conceived the idea of fathering it on an anonymous correspondent—"A Writer." However, notwithstanding this irregularity we are glad that our remarks touching the untenability of the divine providence idea found their way into the Dakota paper, if for no other reason than that they brought out one of the most original defenses of the god superstition that we hav ever seen. A correspondent of the Republican enters the lists to refute the arguments of "A Writer," and we are sure that our readers will be interested in seeing how he takes hold of the task. He writes over the signature of L. J. Anderson, and we judge from his style that he is a clergyman. Passing over his opening sentences, which hav the genuin clerical tone and are couched in the usual pulpit phraseology, we will first quote this paragraph:

"Now, as for the suffering of these victims of the recent fire, it does seem that if God directed it he must be cruel, but if we stop to follow up 'A Writer's' idea of nature, I do not see that we are helped any, for certainly to be compelled either to submit to an untimely death like the cases mentioned, or to drag out a miserable existence to a feeble old age, and then to go down to a grave without any hope of a better life beyond, seems to me to be even worse than the case in hand, providing that God had a much better place in store for the innocent ones whose earthly lives were cut short."

No intelligent Freethinker has thought of claiming, much less has anyone claimed, that pain is other than pain, whether inflicted by "nature" or by "God." But while the charge of deliberate cruelty cannot lie against non-personal nature it can and must lie against a personal, all-knowing, all-powerful God. If the God postulated by Christian Theism exists he intended that those people in Minnesota and Michigan and Wisconsin should die in the torture of fire, and he put them in the flames and burned them to death. What folly, then, to pray to such a God to avert catastrophes which he designed to occur and which never could occur if he had not designed that they should! Can the immutable change? It was our purpose to show how utterly without foundation is the theory of a loving divine providence, not to make any excuses for or attempt to explain away the blood on every leaf and rock of nature. The blood is there, whether God does or does not exist, but if "he" does exist the blood is there because he intended it to be and because he wished the suffering which its presence implies and proclaims.

The best that Mr. Anderson can do for his God is to suppose that if that God has provided a "better place" for "the innocent ones" they had a "hope" in the hour of death agony. But where was the "hope" for those who were not "innocent" and who, if they believed in the orthodox creed, expected in that horrible hour to plunge from the hades of the burning woods into the inextinguishable fires of hell? And what would we say of the earthly father who, after subjecting his child to indescribable torture for some hours, should apologize by saying that his victim would be "compensated" for its present suffering in "better, brighter," years to come? Yet even this does not tell the whole story, for the man has the excuse of his earthly limitations, while the God of orthodoxy is as unlimited in his responsibility as he is in his might. Infinit intelligent power does not need to burn us here in order to save us from burning hereafter. For such a being to burn us either here or in some other world is for him to be guilty of wanton, inexcusable fiendishness. Again the critic:

"They struggled with the monster death from one to a few hours and gave up for a better, brighter world beyond, according to God's own book, the Bible, while those of responsible age without a shadow of a doubt hav had many opportunities of salvation in Christ offered them and as many of them as had accepted of it were a thousand, yea, a million fold better off than if they had remained here to the age of eighty, which 'A Writer' seems to intimate would be the hight of bliss."

Now we will not pause here to dispute the assumption that the Bible is "God's own book," although the critic should know better than to put forward such an assumption in support of the primary assumption of the existence and goodness of his god. So long as the existence of that God is questioned it will not do to take it for granted that he wrote a book. That remains to be proved. Now to the question at issue: If those who died "saved" in the Minnesota fires are a "million fold better off than if they had remained here to the age of eighty," what kind of a monster was it who put them here in the first place? And what of those who are not "saved" and who were consequently a million fold worse off than if they had stayed here a few or many years longer and "repented" in time to "make their calling and election sure"? Why were they denied that opportunity and why were the innocent little children roasted to death? Was it to save them from the risk of the furnaces of hell should they grow to manhood and womanhood? If so, would it not hav been a mercy if they had never been created? If God may rightfully burn to death a child to prevent it running the risk of falling into his hell, why may not its mother, fearing for it the same awful fate if it should liv to the years of accountability, kill it in some painless way in the days of its sinlessness, or, better still, prevent its appearance at all in this world where human fuel is grown to feed the flames of eternal hell? Still the Bible commands us to "increase and multiply" and the prevention of the initiation of the unfit is a "crime" forbidden by Comstock and Congress. Once more the clergyman:

"Does not the acorn that falls to the ground rise in the stalwart oak? Does not the kernel of wheat dropped into the soil bring forth fruit of its kind?"

According to this analogy man is immortal only in his children, as the old oak is in the young oaks and last year's wheat is in the harvests that are to come. Analogy is a dangerous weapon for the theologian to attempt to wield to his antagonist's hurt; he almost invariably cuts himself instead, as the critic has done in this instance. But now how does the gentleman prove that God cared for his children in the Northwestern forests? This is the way:

"But back to what 'A Writer' calls 'God superstition' and his care for his children. Did he not preserve the three Hebrew children whom Nebuchadnezzar had thrown into the burning furnace? Did he not stand by Joseph in Egypt? Did he not deliver the Israelites out of the hand of the king of Egypt? Did he not even break the bonds of death and raise his only begotten son from the tomb? Did he not deliver Paul and Silas out of a locked and guarded prison?"

Even if it were true that those alleged miracles were performed as asserted, what would that demonstration hav to do with God's appalling failure to "care for his children" in the Northwestern woods? If he had the power to do and did do as narrated in the Munchausen stories which are cited by the critic, so much the greater is the load of obloquy that must rest upon his name because of his neglect to act beneficently in the emergency under discussion. Nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to prove that there is a watchful divine providence because the Bible says that the operation of the laws of nature was arrested by Yahveh some thousands of years ago in the interest of three young Hebrews. The incredible and unprovable cannot be summoned to establish the miraculous. Those Bible miracles are too old, and they are utterly discredited among well-informed and logically-minded people. We do not care whom God saved in Palestine or Egypt in the days of legend and myth; a revelation is only for those who receive it from its author; all others must take it on human testimony if they take it at all, and the laws of evidence require that we shall accept the less improbable of two explanations of any story. Our experience teaches us that men lie and that men are mistaken, but our experience has not proved to us the occurrence of miracles. If God performed a miracle in ancient times in order to save three boys from the flames, why did he not perform a miracle in Minnesota this year in order to save hundreds of men, women, and children from the flames? Surely miracles are needed in this skeptical age if they ever were. Were it to be demonstrated beyond the shadow of doubt that the God of the Jews preserved three or thirty or three hundred of the "chosen people" from the effect of fire after they were thrown into it, that would not convince us that he was an impartial, a just, or a loving God, or that the God of the Christians is any better. The Jews had no idea that he was impartial, else they would not hav considered themselvs "the chosen people." Cannot the critic see the ridiculousness of his attempt to save his God's reputation by this appeal to the musty legends of a superstitious age? Suppose that a human father has six children and that they are all exposed to sudden and horrible death; he can easily rescue them all, but contents himself with saving one while the others are left to perish miserably. Shall we call him a loving, impartial parent, or a discriminating, cruel despot? This is the position in which the Christian God is placed if it is admitted that every one of the tales of miraculous interposition is true. As a matter of fact, it has not been proved that one of them is true.

It is useless for a man to attempt to make a crime which he has just committed appear venial by claiming that at a time in the remote past he got some one out of a scrape into which he had himself inveigled or forced him And he would simply subject himself to ridicule if he should assert that the deliverance said to hav been then effected was due to his supernatural powers. Imagin a man who had set fire to his house in which his family was confined, or who had seen the first tiny beginning of the conflagration started by the malevolence or carelessness of another (God sees everything, we are told), and who had not lifted a finger to save companion and children from their heartrending fate, striving to mitigate the severity of popular censure and judicial condemnation by telling a story—the witnesses to the truth or falsity of which are all dead—to the effect that at an earlier period in his life and in another country, he had thrown one of his children into a furnace and had then taken it out again before it was harmed! Let our critic picture such a scene and then tell us how much credit the criminal would get for his self-vaunted alleged preservation of his child in circumstances of danger for the existence of which he, the father, was alone responsible.

COLONEL INGERSOLL will lecture at the Star Theater, New York, on the evening of November 11th. Subject, "The Holy Bible." This is his new discourse, and shakes up orthodoxy as only he can do it.

"Is Suicide a Sin?"

This intensely interesting pamphlet takes for its motto these lines from the "Rubaiyat" of Omar Khayyam:

"Why, if the soul can fling the dust aside,
And naked on the air of heaven ride,
Wer't not a shame—wer't not a shame for him
In this clay carcase crippled to abide?

'Tis but a tent where takes his one day's rest
A sultan to the realm of Death addrest;
The sultan rises, and the dark Ferrash
Strikes, and prepares it for another guest."

The first chapter is devoted to the "Great Suicides of History." It begins with an affecting sketch of the life of Baron Jaromir Mundy, the famous philanthropist of Vienna, who the other day was buried in disgrace because, wearied of his long life, he drowned himself in the Prater. The compiler observes that the "greatest poet, the greatest orator, the greatest philosopher, the greatest general, and the two most famous women of ancient times—Homer, Demosthenes, Aristotle, Hannibal, Sappho, and Cleopatra—were all suicides." Among others mentioned are Empedocles, Cleanthes, Aristarchus, Isocrates, Aristides, Zeno, Mithridates, Lycurgus, Samson, Saul, Brutus, Cassius, Antony, Cato the Younger, Terence, Portia, Seneca, Lucretius, and the Emperor Otho. These were in ages of enlightenment. Then came the dark ages when civilization slumbered and superstition reigned. Suicides were few. Following this came the Renaissance, and with it "genius and suicide again took their abode among men." So says the compiler of this pamphlet. Among the later names mentioned are those of Sir John Suckling, Charles Blount, Robert Burton, Thomas Chatterton, Robert Clive, Romilly, Hugh Miller, Richard Realf, and Admiral Fitzroy.

Next comes Colonel Ingersoll's first letter to the World, followed by the adverse criticisms of Father Ducey, Nym Crinkle, Rev. Madison C. Peters, W. Q. Judge, and Anarchist Charles Wilfred Mowbray. After this we find Colonel Ingersoll's reply to his critics, and succeeding this masterpiece of eloquence, logic, and pathos comes "Some Glimpses of the Tragic Life of a Great City," consisting of letters from the very poor and the despairing. The World submitted the question, "Is Suicide a Sin?" to a jury of twelve eminent citizens and their verdict constitutes the next chapter in this unique little book. The jury was composed of Charles W. Brooke, lawyer; Thomas Byrnes, superintendent of police; Cyrus Edson, physician, commissioner of health; John W. Goff, lawyer, counsel to the Lexow Committee; Edward Hogan, police justice; John E. McIntyre, assistant district attorney; Theodore W. Myers, banker, ex-comptroller; Frederick Smythe, recorder; John Philip Sousa, musician; Morris Tekulsky, president of the New York State Liquor Dealers' Association, and member of the Constitutional Convention; Evan Thomas, president of the Produce Exchange; Francis L. Wellman, assistant district attorney. The next part consists of "Some Curious Facts About Suicide," a collection of statistics by John T. Nagle, physician. Schopenhauer's essay on suicide covers six pages and then twenty-seven stanzas of Omar Khayyam's "Rubaiyat," preceded by an introductory note by the compiler, Carl Snyder, fitly brings the volume to a close. Whatever our readers may think of the subject and of the various arguments advanced they cannot fail to be interested in "Is Suicide a Sin?"

Three New Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty-five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also in press, and will be ready soon. The price of each will be twenty-five cents. They will be printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. Every one will want copies of these splendid addresses, and orders may be sent to us at once, and will be filled as soon as we get the books from the publisher.

"God gave it [the Bible] to be believed and obeyed, not to be criticised and interpreted according to variant mood and individual bias.—The Presbyterian.

How do you know that he gave it for any particular purpose or with any specific object in view? How do you know that he gave it at all? How do you know that "he" exists to giv any book for any purpose? Why are you so undiscriminating and weakly credulous?

The Oakland Times, referring to the overloaded condition of the upper floors of the city library, says that to put in any more books "would be tempting providence to send an earthquake or something else as dire." We hav read a prayer, in which man supplicates God not to lead him into temptation, but this is the first time that we hav heard that man could tempt God to make an exhibition of himself, at least by such a piece of mere carelessness as that indicated.

Some of our Christian friends are still determined to know only Christ and him crucified. A correspondent of the Christian Commonwealth of London concluded a contribution with a lengthy quotation from Bryant's "Thanatopsis," a poem with which it would reasonably be supposed that every editor in England as well as in the United States would be more or less familiar, and yet this London editor wants to know if any reader can "trace the authorship" of the lines quoted!

Hamilton, Ontario, is away ahead of Toronto as regards Sunday freedom, but her bigots are determined that she shall be degraded, if it is within their power to accomplish her downfall. At a meeting of the Lord's Day Alliance a resolution was adopted calling the mayor's attention to the fact that the Sunday laws are being disregarded by the street railway, the steamboats, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Incline Railway, and the omnibuses. What a delightful world—for dead people—this would be if these venerable antiques could hav their way in all things!

Dr. James Legge, a noted missionary and Chinese scholar, has something to say in a religious journal about the present Eastern war, and in the course of the interview he remarks: "You might read all the Confucian books from beginning to end in the presence of the most delicate lady without needing to omit a word." It is not probable that Dr. Legge would risk his reputation on a similar statement regarding the Bible. Still, as a Christian minister, he must believe that the Bible was written at the dictation of a God perfect in all his attributes, while the Confucian works are the product of a mere uninspired human being. The theologian is the slave of fictions and absurdities.

At the Chautauqua Missionary Conference a subject discussed was the "Ideal Missionary Society: What Constitutes such Perfection, etc.?" Answers:

"No. 10: 'Prayer for the work.' No. 11: 'Confidence and faith in the prayers.' This was put in the form of an equation: 'Enthusiasm plus information minus self multiplied by activity divided by each member equals an ideal missionary society.' And the delegate writing her report to the Woman's Missionary Advocate of September, 1894, naively adds: 'I am sure a wonderful revolution would follow the adoption and conscientious solution of this problem."

The observant reader will perceive that "confidence and faith in the prayers" exactly equals the amount of the enthusiasm and information of the members, multiplied by their activity. God is entirely left out of the equation, which goes to show that some missionary Christians are getting their eyes open to the fact that it is hard work that counts and that prayer is purely ornamental. There is progress, spite of all our pessimism.

If all courts should take the impartial view of gambling operations that Judge Van Syckel of the Union county (New Jersey) court does, it is possible that our Christian friends would not be so zealous in their legal warfare on gambling, including lotteries. This judge instructed the grand jury that the church practice of holding drawings for prizes is as clearly a violation of the law against lotteries as is race-track pool selling. He read to them the program of a fair held in St. Joseph's church at Plainfield and charged the jurors to investigate it. When the officers of the state cease to regard the church as a sacred institution and its mouthpieces as superior beings, having rights greater than ordinary citizens and a paramount initiativ in law-making, we shall hav fewer and better laws, and consequently less "crime" and surer punishment of real crime, thus giving to all the people greater security and prosperity.

The upper house of the Hungarian Diet passed by three majority the bill granting freedom of religious worship to all beliefs. Cardinal Schlauch, the Servian patriarch, and the Roumanian and orthodox bishops opposed the measure, declaring that the proposals of the government would ruin society and the state. How familiar that sounds! With rare exceptions, the priests are sure that every measure enlarging the bounds of liberty by putting all religions on an equality before the law is going to bring the heavens down with a crash and drop everybody into the bottomless depths of eternal ruin. That is what the Sunday-law people think is going to happen if there are not statutes making it a crime to go anywhere except to church on Sunday. When the hitherto most priest-ridden nations of Europe are coming out into the light shall we go back into the blackness of medievalism at the command of the Presbyterians of Pennsylvania and the Universalist Dr. Miner, of Massachusetts?

President Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard College, writing in the Forum under the head, "Reasons Why the American Republic May Endure," says that the first moral cause of permanence is the principle of religious toleration, put into practice here for the first time on a large scale. He sums up the question in these words: "On one of the ltabest of the watergate at Chicago was written this sentence: 'Toleration in religion the best fruit of the last four centuries.' This statement is no exaggeration, but the literal truth. Toleration in religion is absolutely the best fruit of all the public struggles, labors, and sorrows the nations hav borne during the last four centuries." Assuming that by "toleration" is always meant the condition of freedom to worship or not worship, enjoyed equally by all citizens, and it is no doubt true that President Eliot is right. In view of this fact, what are we to think of the political Christian party, which is doing all it possibly can to destroy this best fruit of the last four centuries? Is it not the enemy of the republic, of morality, of liberty, of humanity? It is.

Criticising the mayor of Waterbury, Connecticut, who received a Catholic dignitary in an official way and took occasion to utter some words in praise of that church, the Christian Advocate observes:

"The reader may say: 'What is there objectionable in all this? Would you object if an eminent Protestant dignitary were to visit a certain city and be received in this way?' Certainly not, if he were not received in his capacity as an envoy from some foreign government, or if the public authorities did not take the opportunity to praise his church, or he did not take the opportunity to aggrandize his church in any way, or appear in the uniform and official robes of a particular religious communion."

That is excellent, so far as it goes, but we do not need to tell our readers that it does not go far enough. Will Dr. Buckley hav the fairness and courage to say to his Christian subscribers that when an official publicly receives a clergyman or church officer he should not take the opportunity to praise Christianity nor should the churchman take the opportunity to aggrandize Christianity or any other religion in any way? We respectfully ask the editor of the Christian Advocate to answer this question in his paper. We wish to know just how far he goes in defense of equal rights in religion.

The Catholic writer who has been criticising "The Policy of the Pope," in contributions to the Contemporary Review, entitles his last article "Theological Book-Keeping by Double Entry," and in it he tells how differently his positions hav been antagonized in England and in other countries. Catholics writing for the English public hav met him with argument, while those abroad writing for Catholics hav denounced him as a blasphemer. He shows that there is a strong undercurrent of antagonism to Bibliolatry in the Catholic church, and he closes his article with an application to Catholicism of the following quotation from Abu l' ala, the Freethinking Arabic poet:

"Its types of men are two: Gifted the one with faith,
But wholly lacking reason;
In judgment rich the other, whose faith
Has vanished into air."

This is equivalent to saying that nominal Catholics who are rich in the capacity for judging accurately hav no faith in the pretensions of the church, while those gifted with faith in its dogmas are unable to reason. We could not hav put it any more strongly than that, although we should hav made the observation more general in its scope. It is not to be wondered at that this gentleman writes anonymously.

Joshua S. Helmer, late president of the Merchants' bank of Lockport, New York, has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment in Auburn prison for bank-wrecking. He was for many years a leading member of the First Presbyterian church of Lockport, and at the time of his conviction was the treasurer of that institution. He was also famous for his long prayers in Sunday-school. He is receiving much sympathy from his wealthy church friends because it has in some way been made known to the public that he and his wife expected that he would receive the full term of ten years and spent in prayer the day before sentence was pronounced. As the hour of sentence approached they announced "that it was all for the best, that the Lord had summoned Joshua to go to prison for his glory." So says the Niagara Falls Cataract. Nothing is said about the probability that it would hav much more redounded to the "glory of God" if he had given Joshua strength enough to be an honest man. Besides, it would hav been better for the bank's depositors, and they would not hav felt impelled to gather in a "hostil mob" at the court-house door. It is not likely that those poor people are fooled by the cant about going to prison for God's glory.

"A people without faith in a God, and indifferent about observance of the moral law, is already rotten to the core and ready for that besom of destruction which will certainly sweep them into the vortex of a dishonored oblivion."—Richmond Times.

Why do you reason that a people without faith in a God is "rotten to the core" when, individually considered, Atheists and Agnostics are, to state it very mildly, as good as their Christian neighbors? Candid Christians themselvs admit that this is so, and as the whole is simply the sum of the parts, what is to prevent a nation composed of those without faith in the ghosts of theology comparing favorably in every respect with Christian or other Theistic nations? When you talk of "the moral law," what moral law do you mean? That of the church? The moral law is an evolution, not a revelation, and it is subject to a continuous although a very slow modification as man's experience widens and his conscience thereby becomes attuned to clearer and nobler harmonies of liberty, justice, and equity. The church has attempted to appropriate as her personal property that which humanity as a whole has gathered in sorrow and pain in the long and devious march upward from the ancestry that was not human. In so far as the church accepts and defends the best results of that interminable struggle, the naturist has no quarrel with her, but when she attempts to make her unprovable theological assumptions a part of the civil law he must and will assail her pretensions and expose her self-seeking schemes.

Senator White of California, in a recent speech at Los Angeles, in protesting against religious intolerance and proscription for opinion's sake, recalled the fact that when Thomas Jefferson approached the sunset shores of life he dictated his own epitaph in these words:

"Here lies Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia."

Senator White added: "Not one word did he suggest indicating that he had ever held any titular honors." This Revolutionary Freethinker was content that posterity should know him as the friend of political liberty, of religious freedom, of education. His labors for these should guarantee him the immortality of enduring fame, but he saw clearly that political notoriety is equivocal and ephemeral. Thomas Jefferson is remembered not because he was president, but because he was a thinker and a champion of equal liberty. Had he been a theocratic Christian, striving to make church and state one, he would now be forgotten or remembered only to be cursed. All that is good in our Constitution and laws, excepting only the amendments eliminating chattel slavery, was put there by the Secularist fathers of the republic, and had Jefferson and Paine been heeded there would hav been no need for those amendments nor for the terrible war that pricked them into the Constitution with bayonet points. If we permit the Christian church to intrench itself in the organic law of the republic it will take a more fearful war than the Civil Conflict to drive it out again. Don't let it in.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

Again we say to friends, Please send in names. Help us to distribute the programs of the Congress, We purpose sending five thousand copies over the country, with the Demands of Liberalism, the principles of American government, etc. We desire, if possible, to make everybody know that there is to be a Freethought Congress. The contributions are coming in generously. Remember we need the "sinews of war" not only for the Congress itself, but for work hereafter. Here in Chicago and elsewhere the churches are making great efforts to enforce a puritanic Sabbath. We must oppose them.

A Pious Falsehood.

From the New York World.

In the World of this morning, in the article about the death of Governor Curtin, is the following:

Mr. Curtin had no patience with anyone who did not believe in the Bible. Once when personally requested by Colonel Ingersoll to sit on the stage during one of the Colonel's lectures he flatly refused to even attend the lecture.

There is not the slightest truth in this statement. I never requested Governor Curtin to sit on the stage during one of my lectures. I never invited him to attend one of my lectures. I never spoke to him about one of my lectures. I never invited a human being to attend one of my lectures. The story is simply a "pious falsehood."

Hav Women a Place in Heaven?

For past ages the silent though common opinion of Christians has certainly obtained that both men and women (i. e., good ones) enter, in the next world, into the same "blessed abode of eternal rest."

Now the Bible, clearly, is the only authentic authority to which we can appeal in proving, either affirmativly or negativly, the question, "Hav women a place in heaven?" For since a knowledge of heaven is made known to us through the scriptures only, it is very evident that the scriptures alone can giv us any well authenticated account of the "future state." Hence to the scriptures we must go. And if the scriptures be true (as all good Christian men must believe them to be), then what they reveal, no matter whether this revelation clashes with the common opinions of men or not, must be true; since what is revealed is the "divine word of God." From the Bible then, we disclose the statement, somewhat startling at first, that women hav no place in that heaven which God has promised to all those good and faithful men that do his will.

In the first place, woman has no place in that heaven which God has promised to man, because the very purpose for which God created her proves this to be true. This purpose was twofold: First, to be a "helpmeet" or "companion" to lonely man; secondly, to be united to him for the grand object of multiplying his seed.

The first purpose of woman's creation is shown in Genesis ii, 18: "And the Lord God said, It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an helpmeet for him."

Now the word "helpmeet" (or helpmate, a corruption of the former) is a compound of the simple terms "help" and "meet," and means, according to the only acceptation of the word, a partner, a companion, or a wife. The term "help" means "aid" or "assistant;" the term "meet" means "to unite" or "join." Hence the literal meaning of the word is one who "meets" or "joins" another to "help" or "assist" him. But it does not mean, as many erroneously suppose, that woman, because she became "a companion" or "a helpmeet" to man, was to share equally with him the rights of swaying dominion over the earth or of glorifying God. The very contrary obtained. For God, in cursing the woman after "the fall," explicitly says to her, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16). Thus was woman first married to man by divine institution.

After "the fall," however, woman was ordained to serve man in a second capacity or purpose. "In sorrow she was to bring forth children" (Gen. iii, 16). Cain and Abel were the first born of womankind, and Eve who bore them now attained the pinnacle of her creation. Woman, thenceforth, was to serve man principally in this second capacity of multiplying his seed. And thus the consummation of her second marriage with man marks out definitly the two great and only purposes of her creation.

Marriage, then, has a double meaning. In the first marriage (i. e., before "the fall") it means "helpmeet" or "aid." In the second (i. e, after "the fall") it means the "bringing forth children." When, then, we employ the word marriage, we mean to assert, always, that in these two senses only can the word be ever interpreted.

Now we know, positivly, that in heaven woman is not given in marriage to man, for in the thirty-fifth verse of the twentieth chapter, according to the gospel of St. Luke, wherein the Sadducees question our Lord about the woman who married seven brethren, we hav in the answer of our Lord the following strong testimony: "And Jesus, answering, said unto them, The children of this world marry and are given in marriage, but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage."

If, then we suppose a woman to hav a place in heaven, the question would naturally arise, For what purpose has she a place there? Is her purpose in heaven to be "an helpmeet" to man? Assuredly not. For this would imply her being married to man. Again, is it for the purpose of bringing forth children to man? Assuredly not. Because this would also imply her being married to man. Lastly, is her purpose in heaven to glorify God? Most dogmatically not, for this right is the exclusiv right of men alone. "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he [and he alone] is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man" (1 Cor. xi, 7).

For what purpose, then, could woman hav a place in heaven? Evidently for none at all. But God, as we all know, does nothing without a purpose (Rom. viii, 28); hence we are unavoidably driven to the one conclusion that the only purpose of woman's creation was an earthly one, and consequently she can hav no place in that heaven which God has promised to all good and faithful men.

Secondly, woman has no place in heaven, because the very fact that she was made of the rib of man is a proof of this. God did not form woman as he did man. Man he made of the dust of the ground, and "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii, 7). But the woman he made of the rib of Adam, "bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh," after he had caused Adam to fall into a deep sleep (Gen. ii, 21).

From this, then, observe two distinguishing circumstances of man's creation: The first is that God made man of the dust of the ground; the second that he breathed into his nostrils "the breath of life." In other words, God imbued man with his (God's) spirit, a thing imperishable.

Consequently, since God made woman of "the rib of man," as we hav already shown, and man of the "dust of the ground," man and woman are truly one in the flesh. But herein lies the dividing line in the creation of man and woman: "God breathed into the nostrils of man the breath of life, and man became a living soul." But we are not told that he so breathed his spirit into the woman. In fact, we are informed just to the contrary that he did not. "A man, indeed, ought not to cover his head forasmuch as he [and he alone] is the image of God" (1 Cor. xi, 7). And here note that the word "image" is equivalent in meaning to the word "spirit," for man is the "image" of God in the spirit only (Gen. i, 26; John iv, 24).

Hence, since woman was made of the rib of man, and since she was not imbued like man with the spirit of God, woman can resemble man in the flesh alone. But as the flesh is earthly—for God said unto man, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return" (Gen. iii, 19)—so is the woman earthly. And as the flesh perishes with the body, so must the woman, also. Consequently, she cannot hav a place in that heaven which God has promised to man, "where neither moth nor rust [i. e., the flesh] doth corrupt, nor where thieves break through and steal" (Matt. vi, 19).

Thirdly and lastly, woman has no place in that heaven which God has promised to man, because no particular mention is made in the Bible of her having a place there. In the scriptures, all passages in which heaven is alluded to are either general in meaning (i. e., the general term "man" is used or understood), or else the mention of heaven is made to some individual man or men. Thus, for instance, we are told in the Old Testament that Enoch was translated into heaven (Gen. v, 24); and that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob by faith were each promised a future place in "the blessed abode" (Heb. xi, 9, 10, 16). But with respect to woman, no such particular mention (or even reference) throughout the Bible is made of her having a place in heaven.

Now an objection, apparent at first sight, at once springs up against this statement. It is that the man includes the woman, or, in other words, that in the use of the word or term "man," we are to understand that a reference to woman is made, because the woman is part of the man, and because sometimes the general term man may be employed to denote woman also. But on more profound thought, we shall clearly see that this objection at most is very weak. Woman, it is true, is part of the man, but only as regards the flesh. In particular cases, then, the term man may include the woman, but only so far as regards matters of this world.

The fact that woman is excluded from taking part at any ceremonies of the church, excludes her from being included in the general term man when reference to such matters is made. "Let your women keep silence in the church; for it is not permitted unto them to speak, but they are commanded to be under obedience as also saith the law" (1 Cor. 14, 34). Again, the fact that woman is told to consider man, not Christ, as her Lord, excludes her from being included in the general term man, when spiritual affairs are alluded to: 'Wives, submit yourselvs unto your husbands as unto the Lord. For the husband is head of the wife, even as Christ is head of the church; and he [i. e., the man] is savior of the body. Therefore, as the church [and here observe that the word "church" is equivalent in meaning to the term "man"] is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be unto their own husbands in everything" (Eph. v, 22). Now, the man being lord, it would be absurd to suppose that what was addressed to him would be understood to be addressed to the woman also. As justly might we say that when God addresses Christ, his son, he addresses man, the servant of Christ. "The servant, surely, is not greater than [nor equal to] his master" (John xiii, 16). Consequently, the objection raised carries with it no weight whatsoever.

Now the proof that woman has no place in heaven because in the Bible no particular mention is made with reference to her having a place there, lies in the fact that, throughout the Bible, in all other points of importance, God makes particular mention (as he always does to man) of that which he wishes woman to clearly understand. Thus, after "the fall," as we hav before quoted, God, in cursing both the man and the woman, addresses each separately, specifying, explicitly, the punishments both are to suffer for their transgressions. (Gen. iii, 16–19). Again, in regard to woman's duties towards man and man's duties towards woman, God addresses both separately, and particularizes his commands to each. (Titus ii)

But when Christ touches upon heavenly things in conversing with the woman of Samaria, as related in the fourth chapter of St. John, the disciples, on finding him thus conversing with a woman at all, express the greatest surprise: "And upon this came his disciples and marveled that he talked with the woman; yet no man said [to the woman] what seekest thou? or [to the Christ] why talkest thou with her?"

Is it, then, not exceedingly significant that God has made no particular mention in the Bible, either affirmativly or negativly, as to whether woman has a place in heaven? Why has he done so on all other subjects of importance, and not on this? Why does he (manifestly on purpose) omit making particular mention of woman's having a place in heaven, if he ordained her to hav a place there?

The Thumbscrew and Rack.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has already introduced its readers to the mediæval torture instruments collected from various nations of Europe and exhibited in the royal castle of Nuremberg, and recently to be seen on Twenty-third street in this city. It is a very impressiv exhibit, and the lecturer informed us that every one of the instruments is original and has done its deadly work. In these torture devices are recorded the social, political, moral, and religious history of the Christian nations of the Old World from the dark ages down to the beginning of the present century. They show what an unlucky thing it was to be born a human being during the early and mediæval period of the Christian era. Every Freethinker, especially the cartoonist, Watson Heston, ought to be able to inspect this collection, as there is in it evidence enough, if properly promulgated, to blow all of the ecclesiastical dross off society.

The hand of God never wrote on tables of stone in characters more easily read than are these iron barbs, thumbscrews, beheading swords, and axes. To see this collection enables one to better appreciate our own times and the effectiv labors of Voltaire and the other mighty Freethinkers who never let humanity or the church rest as long as there were wrongs to be redressed.

Three little holes in the blade of a beheading ax or sword to signify the trinity, or carved pictures of saints on the swords, and inscriptions, reading,

> I stand under God to execute aright,
> Jesus, thou art the Judge and I the servant;

or,

> O God, take this sinner into thy kingdom,
> That he may know happiness, are evidence that has not been perverted by the prejudice of historians or the inclination of the church to hide its wickedness and folly, but speaks to us more plainly of the sufferings of our forefathers through religious delusions, than will the monuments Christian sentiment now erects, telling of the continued potency of God, speak to generations as yet unborn.

As a comet floats into our solar system from the depths of space, so this instructiv collection from the ages of the past, and telling its own story, has come to us. To be at this exhibition and reflect upon the history recorded thereby, is like standing on a mountain peak and looking back over a sea of blood troubled by the cries of the agonized. To know that these instruments exist is to be conscious of what a whirlwind of agony the god of Abraham has sown among the children of men, and what efforts it has been necessary to exert to extricate the human race from supernatural rule and to dispel the delusion of the divine right of kings to govern man's actions.

As with horror, we, who by mere circumstance of time hav escaped actual participation in those scenes of torment, look back upon the dark ages of the past, which was the period of the greatest religious glory of the nations of the Old World, so with feelings of satisfaction do we occasionally catch glimpses, indicated by the finger of science and of humanity, of a century coming when science, reason, and justice will make this life a comfort and joy to all. In those days the fires of the Christian hell will terrify no more and education will make it impossible for a set of intellectually dishonest men, claiming to represent a supreme and supernatural being in the skies, to criminally defraud a large portion of the human family of the comforts and happiness this life affords, by promising them mansions in the skies, providing certain unreasonable conditions be fulfilled on earth. Man becomes civilized and capable of happiness just in proportion as he throws off the supernatural beliefs, which, serpent-like, are entwined about him while yet in the cradle of innocence and helplessness.

Those who seek the truth must credit the church with any good it has done, and not accuse it of crimes of which it is not guilty. I am indebted to the Encyclopædia Britannica for much of the data in the following:

The nations of antiquity before the time of the Christian propaganda practiced some tortures, the scourge and branding-iron probably being the oldest devices, although the pagan nations' sense of mercy never prompted them to devise many of the terrifying instruments of this collection. None but an inspired mind could invent the Iron Maiden, or at least minds in communion with the heartless Jehovah of the Old Testament. Under divine guidance human tortures grew fiercer and of more frequent application. Of European nations, Italy has the reputation of having practiced the most cruel tortures, while Ireland was the most free from them. In Athens slaves and resident aliens were tortured, but not free citizens. In the early part of the fourth century in Rome a person of any rank was tortured for treason or sorcery. A woman who had poisoned her husband could be tortured, but not until all of her slaves were first put through that ordeal. Security had to be given for the value of a slave, unless the torture was sanctioned by his master.

In the year 315 Constantine abolished crucifixion as a punishment, in memory of the death of Christ who was crucified for mankind. I hav often looked at the large picture of Justinian with a slave bowing in his presence, in the Museum of Art in Central Park, and hav now discovered that the reason the Christian perpetuate his memory in art is because he made liable to torture and banishment any person insulting a bishop or priest in a church.

In the fourth century heresy took the place of treason, it being regarded as a kind of treason against God. When one of the clergymen made himself liable to hav his orthodoxy inquired into by barbs of iron, or for any sentence pronounced upon him by a civil tribunal, he was secured immunity from torture. In 1252 Innocent IV. directed the civil powers to torture heretics as murderers and robbers of souls and thieves of the sacraments of God. The church taught its followers that it was no sin for them to inflict torture, although priests might not do so with their own hands.

One Von Halen was tortured in Spain as late as 1817. In the United States a Giles Cory of Salem, in 1692, was tortured because of his refusal to plead when arraigned on the charge of witchcraft. In 1816 a papal bull decreed that torture should cease. At about this time the devil probably held a consultation with God and induced him to repent and promis to soften his harsh methods of securing followers; whereupon a telegram was sent from the celestial throne to the terrestrial, announcing the glad tidings.

The torture chambers of these saintly sinners, as far as real agony was concerned, were in direct line with the Christian idea of a hell of eternal torment, only the instruments of one were the rack; the wheel; the Spanish donkey; thumbscrews; beheading swords and axes; the iron virgin; devices for crushing the bones out of the arms and legs; pincers for pulling out tongues; boots filled with hot water or molten lead; the cradle of unrest, the sides and head-rest of which are filled with barbs; heavy weights for fastening about the neck; the ducking cage for bakers who dealt in short weights; shame masks to be worn at the same time that images of dragons were held in the hands; iron collars set inside and on all sides with spikes; barrels barbed inside, in which the victim was rolled down hill; stocks; shackles; branding irons; the stake; the scourge; cat-o'-nine tails; cages in which people were suspended in the air and left to starve, while mocking images were occasionally sent up on wires to ascertain the victim's condition and his progress toward death; the drunkards' wooden cloak; windlasses for stretching on the rack; the scavenger's daughter, or compressing irons; gauze bags for placing in the mouth and forcing into the stomach by pouring on water; the gallows; weights for fastening to the feet while being suspended by a thumb; hooks for flaying alive; and many others equally cruel, while the torture establishment, presided over by the orthodox devil of one nation or sect which is the god of another, consists of fire, brimstone, and according to Heston, a three-tined pitchfork. Such gentle punishments as the above are not to be wondered at when we call to mind that a portion of the frame work upon which the Christian religion rests, is that of the brutal murder of their own God. To draw the butcher's blade across the throat of an animal is a deed of mercy in comparison with some of these tortures.

We now turn from the tortures of the body to those inflicted upon the mind. It will be found a pleasant diversion from the foregoing. There are many masks in the collection, which, if not put on in a heated condition and not burdensome to carry, would torture the pride more than the body. These masks are iron, and in a variety of forms, many of which are ludicrous. A lazy ne'er-do-well, for the improvement of his ambition, was compelled to wear a mask with an ass's long ears. Scolding was a terrible offense in centuries past, and there are many appliances for dealing with such cases. One is the scold's collar, two feet in diameter, wooden, and a hole in the center for the neck. This was placed on a scold's shoulders and as she was led up and down the streets about two dozen small bells attached to the wooden ruff attracted attention to her. Such a device might hav been welcomed by Rip Van Winkle.

One ingenious plan for placing two scolds who had fallen out with each other on a friendly footing was as follows: They were yoked together. A large wooden soup or stew bowl, holding nearly as much as an ordinary pail, was placed in front of them. Only one spoon was provided for the two. One hand of each was fastened and one was free. As they remained unfriendly and did not eat their hunger increased. When finally they began eating out of the same bowl and spoon, one then the other, it was taken as a sign of returning affection.

If a woman had two or more husbands at the same time, she was led on exhibition through the streets wearing the drunkard's cloak. This cloak resembles a barrel, with straight staves, one end entirely open and in the other end an opening large enough for the neck.

If a couple became too "susceptible," which is a charge the church occasionally prefers against a minister in these days, they were placed side by side in a wooden yoke, like that worn by cattle, and driven through the public streets, or stationed in a market place. This argument supplied what Christianity lacked to make people moral. One yoke in the Nuremberg collection has the ropes still attached. The parents of a child born out of wedlock were yoked together and made to carry water to the top of a hill.

When the noble Freethinkers, Thomas Paine, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and others of that school, were laying the foundation upon which to build a future mighty nation, they without doubt had in mind these terrible torture devices when they wisely inserted in the United States Constitution, "Cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted." And as long as God is kept out of the Constitution it will be possible to keep common sense in, which means the impossibility of ever reinstating the inquisition arguments for making Christians. Is it any wonder that such a God was left out of our Constitution? Christianity in the face of this record should crouch in the dust instead of flaunting its claims upon the descendants of those who suffered and finally compelled religious devotees to somewhat soften their harsh beliefs and methods. The church to day is the product and direct descendant of the church of the Inquisition, and the welfare of humanity demands men of the same principles and attitude on the subject of religion as the Liberals who founded this government, to stand guard over the people's rights, in the council chambers and out, and to direct the destiny of this republic.

Likewise our Constitution declares, "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal proceeding to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The meaning of this provision in our Constitution is well understood when we remember that suspects were tortured by such ingenious devices for the purpose of compelling them to confess their guilt. They were tortured to make them confess, and if they did confess they were tortured as just punishment; hence, there was no escape from divine wrath after a suspect, fleeing, once got a barbed iron collar or ring on the end of a long staff slipped around his neck, and was afterward arraigned before a tribunal of divine justice for the pronouncing of the character and duration of his punishment.

The Magna Charta, year 1214, indicates the possibility of our race, even at that late date, or call it early, if preferred—to emerge from a vicious superstition, when it declares, "We will sell, or deny, or defer right or justice to no man." The final establishment of the jury system, whereby the right to decide upon a person's innocence or guilt was taken away from an arbitrary judge and placed in the hands of a body of everyday citizens, has done much to establish justice and civilize our race. The civilizing influence of the courts to-day is far in excess of that of the church, and one conscientious, able lawyer who interprets our Constitution and laws on the basis of reason and justice, is of far greater benefit to the community than many monks, priests, and popes daily on their knees, repeating their prayers to dead men, whom they call saints.

The lecturer who accompanies this exhibition speaks of the civilizing influence of America in causing the downfall of torture, as follows:

"During the period when torture existed in Europe, many works were written against it. Any person who openly assaulted the customs of the times endangered his life. It was a very difficult thing to get works, when written and translated, printed. Many of the works were brought to America, printed in Philadelphia, and then taken back to Europe and secretly distributed."

After the battle of Waterloo, critics of affairs in England considered republicanism and Atheism crimes of the same degree. Republicanism has triumphed in America, and Atheism, which means only common sense, is sure to triumph in America sooner or later. With no tens of thousands of platforms propagating it, still it is probably growing faster than all religious denominations combined. The spirit of the times in America is to think away from the supernatural beliefs of the church. Those preachers who are the most liberal in their views attract the most attention. If the church wants to perpetuate itself, it must oppose scientific education, as it is a well-known fact that the cultured and educated classes both in America and the foremost nations of Europe hav practically abandoned Christianity. It is only the less prosperous that can be made to believe there is anything to be gained by attachment to the church. Already, we occasionally hear predictions from the pulpit that America is about to enter upon a century of Atheism, and a foremost Christian minister and college professor says we are living in the age of the decline of the Christian church.

If free government should fail in this country, and with no undiscovered continent where men could flee to escape the tyranny of the church, as when the first colonists settled America, and if the church of God should again get the control of education and civil government, then, as rapidly as time would permit, civilization would go back to where it was when the scientists in the early part of the seventeenth century began promulgating their scientific discoveries, and for which theologians, because of their hatred of discoveries which overthrew their ignorant teachings, tortured, imprisoned, and put to death the discoverers. The World's Fair at Chicago shows that man now is rejoicing in scientific progress and Freethought, while these torture devices show how men thought and acted when God controlled man's actions very much more than he does now, and, let us hope, ever will again. History proves that the star of hope of the human race is science and not the star of Bethlehem. The practical application of discoveries in electricity alone has probably done more in the short period of fifty years to civilize man than the church has done in nineteen hundred years.

In conclusion, the solemnity of this exhibition exceeds that of the open grave. When a victim was ready for the grave, his sufferings for the sake of his private opinions and for mankind were ended. We see what a tragic stage our ancestors acted upon. If the drama of life is more human now than in centuries past, it is not because those on the stage now hav brought the improved conditions about, but we are enjoying the liberties paid for by the blood of those who confronted these deadly instruments. Public sentiment now would rebel with one accord against applying any of these tortures to even a dumb brute. Contrast the customs of the present times with those of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and they show as plainly as daylight differs from darknesss that there is something in human nature that impels men onward to a more perfect system of life.

We rejoice at the progress our race has made, but the joy is not unalloyed. If the clouds of superstition were all swept away we could say to generations unborn, "The path is clear, press onward and develop more and more perfect civilizations on the basis of the religion of man." But ah! there is work for Freethinkers still to do before nations will be kept in a state of peace by the love of man for man, instead of by fear of an eternal torture establishment in the skies.

Side by side on Twenty-third street are two buildings. In one are the surviving witnesses of an age of darkness and tyranny; in the other, which is surmounted by a cross, people are taught as true the same faith that made the existence of these torture instruments possible. After viewing these beheading swords and axes, perforated with three small holes to signify the trinity, and inscribed to show that cutting off heads is pleasing to God, it does not giv a humanitarian a pleasant feeling to pass upon the street and see a procession four or five blocks long, of little boys, some of them mere babies, marching after a base-drum lettered, "Mission of the Immaculate Virgin." Those innocents learn early enough in life what a virgin is, without making a specialty of teaching it to them as soon as they get one foot out of the cradle. But as for their understanding what an "immaculate virgin" is, it is enough to dwarf their intelleetual development.

Although the clouds of superstition are still hanging over us, it is satisfactory to know that the people generally of America are better than their Bibles and religious creeds. They hav unconsciously outgrown them. And when the church members awaken to the fact that they are better than the old beheading God of the Hebrews and of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, they will arise in the light of their discovery and break down their old idols and create new ones that are more nearly up to date. The present God would do for the next devil. When priests and preachers finally discover that it is just as possible for men to prephesy now as it was three thousand years ago, and that there are just as inspired writers now as then, it may be possible for them to write a new "Word of God" that will meet all the requirements of the old one now existing, and that will meet all the requirements of the old one now existing, and that will be free from accounts of slaughter, polygamy, and debauchery, and more nearly geologically and historically correct. Man, in his progress out of savagery, has passed through the torture ages founded on the Bible of the God of Abraham. The men who write the Bibles for the future must be the Thomas Jeffersons, Thomas Huxleys, and the Robert G. Ingersolls, for such men know that man becomes civilized and capable of happiness just in proportion as he throws off his superstitious beliefs.

Observations.

The Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., who preaches for the Baptists at Twenty-third street and Lexington avenue, and also for the Young Men's Christian Association on Fourth avenue, went fishing a few weeks ago, and when he got back he gave the reporters an account of his marvelons catch. It was published with illustrations in several journals, and was the cause of some envy among fishermen and other professional liars. The Sunday after his return he met upon the street Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, who drew a newspaper on him and asked if he authorized the statement which it contained. The clergyman said that he did, and inquired whether the doctor doubted it. Said Dr. Caleb S. Weeks: "Before answering your question I should like to know in what capacity you spoke when you related the yarn." "Why so?" pursued the Rev. Mr. Dixon. "For this reason," returned Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, "if you told the story as a fisherman I might possibly giv it credence; but if it rests only on your word as a preacher I am not under obligation to believe it." Whereupon the Rev. Mr. Dixon fared thence buried in deep thought, while Dr. Caleb S. Weeks went on his way rejoicing.

"The name of Ernest Mendum is not unknown to the Liberal public."—Ernest Mendum, Proprietor of the Investigator, in the Investigator.

Unknown? Great Scott! Well, I guess not. Your name
And mine, to be forgotten, Fate forbids;
We are, par excellence, the Freethought kids,
By kindred doomed to an enduring fame.
We had the luck to find a set of skids
For us prepared, and coasted down the same;
The hands were dealt when we sat in the game—
And stranger's bulge relationship outbids.
Full oft I've paused to wonder where we'd be Without the natural odds we bank on yet;
We do not reach our predecessor's knee—
Alone we ne'er had climbed the pyramids.
But when the moon, that shines with borrowed light,
Shall cease to be in evidence at night;
When youths let go who hav a cinch, and when Virtue departs from honored names; why, then,
But not till then, shall men our names forget,
You bet!

That hardened old adversary of truth, Dr. Buckley, editor of the Methodist Advocate, having exhausted his stock of offenses against unbelievers, has taken to repeating them. He is running through his paper a series of articles by the Rev. Joseph Pullman on "George Eliot's Loss of Faith." So far as I hav observed, Dr. Pullman treats the subject without meanness; for which reason Editor Buckley deems it essential to explain that he prints the articles "as the opinion of a student and a luminous writer"—thus implying that their truthfulness is not guaranteed. As a further antidote, and lest by some oversight of his a just idea of George Eliot should be conveyed to the readers of the Advocate, he reprints an editorial from his paper of December, 1880, containing the words: "Mrs. Woodhull's and George Eliot's morals are identical. · · · Genius cannot sanctify lust.

If Dr. Buckley knew nothing about either Victoria Woodhull's morals or the morals of George Eliot, he might be excused for supposing they were the same, but he could not be acquitted of lying in publishing his supposition as a statement of fact; and when, fourteen years later, an opportunity for apology and reparation being offered him, he repeats his offense instead of repenting it, those who had forgiven and forgotten will revive the bad opinion they formed about him at that time. No evidence has been offered that George Eliot entertained the same ideas of marriage that Victoria Woodhull advocated; but that is not material, for the identity of views on marriage is not identity of morals by a considerable percentage. To illustrate, Dr. Buckley and Colonel Breckinridge believe that the church and state hav jurisdiction over the connubial relation; nevertheless I should not be warranted in stating, in the absence of further information with regard to the habits of both, that "Dr. Buckley's and Colonel Breckinridge's morals are identical." That does not follow from the identity of their views of marriage, and it would be an actionable offense to say that it did. Dr. Buckley is alive, while George Eliot is dead.

The world is acquainted with the facts about George Eliot's marriage with George Henry Lewes. I will condense them from the statement of the Rev. Mr. Pullman, without changing any of his words:

Lewes had formerly married at an early age a woman who deserted him for another man. Subsequently the erring wife professed penitence and begged to be restored to her home. He received her back again. Once more she deserted him, and eloped with a worthless paramour. That separated them forever. At that time the laws of England (contrary to the laws of most Christian countries) forbade a divorce from a wife if her offense had been condoned, even though after a reconciliation she had repeated her former wrongdoing. George Eliot was then thirty-three years old and Mr. Lewes thirty-five. An attachment sprang up between them that ripened into love. An absurd law forbade their marriage. They agreed to evade the law, and were united in marriage. Their subsequent life for a quarter of a century proves that the marriage was a true one in all but the legal form.

The Rev. Dr. Buckley's comment, following this, is as repulsiv as rape. Hear him: "Genius cannot sanctify lust!" Who said anything about lust? Who introduced that subject? The account says that their attachment "ripened into love." If the marriage was a true one "in all but the legal form," where did the fault lie—with the marriage or with the form? The Rev. Mr. Pullman says the law which prevented a legal marriage was absurd and "contrary to the laws of most Christian countries." Would Dr. Buckley maintain that there is more sanctity in an absurd law than in a true marriage? In his view, the attachment which ripened into love was lust which genius could not sanctify, and as attachments which ripen into love usually precede marriage, it is to be inferred that he regards in the same light the general inclination to mate. This lust should be sanctified, he holds, and genius not being adequate to the emergency, the minister or the justice must be called in and sanctification effected. The happy result is marriage—i. e, sanctified lust, according to Dr. Buckley.

The religious editor may hav defined Christian marriage more accurately than he intended; still I should hesitate to classify it thus broadly.

That pastor who through years of doubt has held
The pulpit of a Brooklyn sanctuary down,
And from an eager populace compelled
The soubriquet of Tabernacle Clown,
Hath journeyed to antipodean lands—
Through Australasia now his tones resound,
Where, in the bush or midst the blazing sands,
Marsupial quadrupeds in droves abound.
Few are the vaulters that our soil can boast
Whose leaps might conquer, counting hight and length,
The denizen of that world-distant coast,
Whose nervous tail lends advantageous strength;
But, Talmage, all of us are backing you
In competition with the Kangaroo.

Some quite singular correspondence was published not long ago in the Agnostic Journal of London, England. It was between a gentleman signing himself Socialist-Spiritualist and a medium whom he addresses as the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pompar. The S.-S. calls attention to the fact that a dramatic company is touring the provinces and presenting a series of living pictures, or tableaux vivants, to illustrate a poem entitled "Mary, Queen of Scotts." The leading lady of the company impersonates the unfortunate queen and presumably suffers herself to be beheaded in the interests of dramatic effect, and is, as the writer says of the performance, "singularly well executed." Now the professed object of the Countess's correspondent is to find out whether Queen Mary "knows of this performance; whether (if she does) she approves of its being given; what her opinion is upon the representation; whether there is anything in it which, were she here, she might wish to see altered in any way; whether there is any improvement she can suggest, either in their costuming or in the arrangement of the tableaux, etc." He quite ignores the fact that Mary has been dead since 1587, and the countess, apparently not noticing the oversight or recalling the circumstance, replies in a calm and commercial manner that, according to his request, she has inquired of "the queen, M.S.," concerning the dramatic performance alluded to, with this result:

She [Mary, Q.S.] knew nothing whatever about it. I asked her if she could go to England? "Yes." To Scotland? "Yes." I then inquired if she could see the performance and report her opinion of it. She replied she could not, although she could visit other cities (besides Paris); but that to see what was passing she required a medium. She, no doubt, has to make use of an organism. Once she accompanied me in Paris to see a beautiful performance of a drama bearing her name, and made her remarks upon it as it proceeded. For this purpose she employed my fan, there being no furniture in the box that was not covered with soft velvet that yielded no sound.

If the Countess of Caithness did not sign the foregoing statement "yours sincerely," I should suspect that she was trifling with her correspondent, who, as a Socialist and a Spiritualist, might be prepared to believe almost anything concerning this life or the next; but the letters are apparently written and published in all seriousness, and in all seriousness I hav here reproduced their substance. There are some things in the world too almighty funny to be laughed at. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

News and Notes.

Prof. J. H. Copeland lectured before the Secular Union Sunday evening, September 30th, on "Sin and Crime from the Standpoint of Freethought and Social Reform." His main proposition was that poverty was the source of almost all crime, and that to remove crime we must remove poverty; we must make good conditions of society. As for sin there is really no such thing, for sin is a theological term. It depends upon the existence of God. If there is no God, then there is no sin, for sin is a wrong relation with "God." It is merely a figment of the human imagination. Crime is a wrong relation with our fellowmen; it is a forcible violation of their rights. It is easy to be seen that if the social conditions of mankind were such as to create happiness for all, there would be very little temptation to crime. This involves the great and pressing questions of labor reform, etc. The discussion after the lecture was quite animated and took in from various points a wide survey of the subject. All Freethinkers are deeply interested in these important problems; but there are many and different opinions as to the best solution of them. That they cannot be solved by any of the old ideas or philosophies is apparent. Theology utterly fails. It knows all about God; but it knows very little about humanity. But as God has no need of food, shelter, or clothing, and can look out for Number One with comparativ ease; and cannot in the very nature of the case be the hindmost, and so the devil will not catch him. I do not therefore see what it avails to discuss his character and perfections; for he is in no trouble and anxiety. He pursues the even tenor of his way, and does not seem even to be very much concerned about humanity. But humanity is what we must look after, and it is science that must take care of humanity, and not theology. The solution of labor questions must be entirely scientific and for that universal mental emancipation must be attained. But this intellectual freedom is not the end, but the condition by which the greatest practical results can be obtained for human happiness and progress.

The great purposes of Freethought, its ideas and practical aims, are what will be declared at the coming Congress. There will be a most interesting program. We hav a list of good speakers, men and women both, and there will be a manifold variety of thought. Our program is now published, and in itself it makes a fine campaign document. We hav printed upon it the Demands of Liberalism, the principles of American government, quotations from Paine, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Garfield, Grant, Ingersoll, etc. We intend to distribute five or ten thousand copies. There is so much inquiry as to what Freethought is and what it is doing, that this program is prepared for the express purpose of answering these questions. We hav also printed a list of the Freethought journals. There are thousands of Freethinkers in this country who do not know that there is a Freethought journal published. We want to advertise these journals. What is necessary to do now is to recruit our forces. We must hav new material; and one grand object of the preparatory work of the Congress is to push into new fields; to arouse an interest which has not been aroused before; to make Freethought and its principles better known, This can be accomplished by distributing our programs in every direction, by the thousand. I hope that friends will send for these programs and help to circulate them. Especially call the attention of newspapers to them and get them to make note of the Congress. Almost every Freethinker has sufficient influence with his home journal to get it to announce our national Congress and perhaps also make known its objects and demands. Everything of this kind will tell for our future work.

We must advertise Freethought. As well might you expect a business house these days to succeed without advertising as to expect that Freethought will become a power without its principles being made known. How constant are the inquiries by the unchurched people as to what Freethought is and what it is doing! We shall send these programs to the contributors of the fund, and ask them to giv them around to friends and neighbors. No matter whether they come to the Congress or not, let them find out what is going on and that Freethought has a life and that it is a national power. Put these programs in hotels, railroad stations—any place where they will attract attention and get some new readers. This is the way to push Freethought. We must hustle and make people see that it is a live thing; that it has purposes, organizations, papers, books, etc.

This is what we intend to do and we need money for the purpose and the cooperation of friends. We ask for help to carry out these plans. We can add to our forces if we only make the effort. We can get those interested in Freethought who hav not been so before. We can extend our ranks. We must do this. We must push into new territories. We must not depend upon people to drift into Freethought. We must go after them; we must endeavor activly to enlist their interest and their cooperation.

Rally for the Congress! Help to make it a grand success. Help before Congress to make it known that such a Congress is to be. Help to advertise as widely as possible. The time is ripe for great advance. New opportunities are before us.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

M. M. Trumbull.

(Read at the Trumbull Memorial Meeting, Chicago, October 7th.)

A soldier born, thy spirit welcomed e'er
The stir of battle, be it in the smoke
Of cannon, and the bayonet's glistening surge,
The swirl and thunder of ensanguined hosts,
Where ghastly death confronts the victor's path,
Or realms of thought with fields more stormful far,
Where vaster forces meet in mightier strife,
Where pen more luminous than shining blade,
The flame electric drops which moves a world
And crowns a truth or blasts a giant lie;
In this thou wast a knight exultant too,
And ever in the front with beaming brow,
Thy mind as dauntless as the unsheathed sword
That flings its splendor in the forward fray.

Thy aim was high, not for to-day's applause,
Not for the truth of yesterday's renown,
But for the truth beyond the beaten path,
The untried truth that only lofty souls
Behold and welcome on the distant hights.

Thou wast a dreamer and a toiler too,
Thy mind was in the future's golden days;
The gates of paradise to thy far view
Were opened wide, the goal of martyr's fire,
Of poet's song, of hero's restless march,
The bright enchantment that adorns the earth
With constant hues of beauty and delight.
And still thou wast in touch with common life,
And hand in hand with those who strike the spark
Of earnest action from surroundings grim.

The comrade of the weary slave wast thou,
The bold defender of defeated right,
The guard of liberty when Judas hands
Would clothe her loveliness with gilded chains;
Thine eye was clear to see great nature's law
Above the hoary precedents of wrong;
And as our starry flag thou didst defend
Within the bloody ranks of fateful war;
So wouldst thou make that flag the pennon bright
Of justice to all lands and coming time.

Thy work is done; true to the line was all;
No wavering in thought or word or deed
From freedom's call to which thy soul was pledged.
Sweet fortune thine that in the rayless grave
Illustrious ends the task thou aim'st to do;
So can we honor thee without regret;
No flaw upon the diamond of thy fame;
Thy life is crystaled now in death's white grace
To its supreme effulgence, starred sublime,
Upon the firmament whose thousand orbs
From ages' depths illume our path to-day

The fruit of thy brave toil shall yet appear;
Thy spirit's flower shall bloom in years afar;
The glory of thy dream shall not be lost,
For it is burning in a million hearts;
The reign of justice on the happy earth;
The peace of liberty in every land;
The grandeur of the truth in every brain;
The melody of love in every breast;
While broad and beautiful shall be the way
Of fair humanity; the hights attained
Where wisdom shines; and on the laden plain
Shall glow the feet of labor, bowed no more,
But throned and glorious in its nativ wealth;
And science, genius, music, art, romance,
Shall be the melting links that clasp the world
In bright fraternity and equal good.

Thy harvest home is reached; our path beams on
To this great goal; we do not strive in vain;
For as thy virtues shine upon our eyes,
So shall all virtues shine through coming years;
So shall all deeds flow in one mighty stream—
One onward stream of beauty and delight.
Unceasing is the struggle of mankind—
The gain to-day is but the vantage point
For grander progress on to-morrow's field.
No rest is there, save as one rests like thee—
In the crowned glory of heroic death.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Voltairine de Cleyre's Lecture.

The Manhattan Liberal Club opened its twenty-fifth annual course of lectures at the German Masonic Hall, 220 East Fifteenth street, on Friday evening, October 5th. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., was in the chair and Voltairine de Cleyre gave her lecture on Mary Wollstonecraft. She said that to contemplate the life of Mary Wollstonecraft was to contemplate sorrow. The anniversary of this woman's birth should be a festival day for Freethinkers, equal in importance to that of Thomas Paine. In keeping such days we obey a primal social impulse. They are not merely tributes to individual worth, although that feature is not without its importance. Mary Wollstonecraft was the pioneer worker for woman's emancipation, and she saw that woman could never stand on a plane of equality with man until she was industrially independent. She attacked with cutting irony alike orthodox moralists like Dr. Gregory and Dr. Fordyce, and philosophers like Rousseau, who argued that the first duty of woman was to study to please men by carefully concealing all evidence of whatever reasoning powers they might possess. The struggles of Mary Wollstonecraft developed in her a self-reliant spirit and great generosity. She had a supreme contempt for idleness, whether it took the form of vulgar laziness, of fashionable frivolity, or the stately display of the soldier. Her reform labors began in earnest when she was twenty-nine. She was the friend of Paine, and was in Paris during the Revolution. Always in sympathy with the people, she yet, at great risk to herself, protested against the atrocities of the populace at a time when sympathy was mistaken for treason. It may properly be observed in passing that there are always multitudes who think the same, but in times of revolution the old savage instinct is released from the leash of reason and the educated, humanitarian minority, which always makes for civilization, is swept away in the sanguinary surges of popular wrath. Only the few are capable of seeing that each man and woman is the inevitable resultant of antecedent causes and that hate as a social regenerator is unscientific and futil. It is the weakness of so many who are sincerely working for the improvement of conditions that they more often appeal to hatred than to reason, and the misfortune of the uncritical masses that they are unable to resist these appeals. A speaker may well pause when he finds his fierce denunciations received with rapturous applause and his unimpassioned elucidation of fundamental principles and his calm presentment of remedies listened to in cold silence.

Miss de Cleyre urged her hearers to make themselvs familiar with the writings of Mary Wollstonecraft, especially the "Letters to Gilbert Imlay" and "The Rights of Woman." Miss de Cleyre is a forceful, pleasant, dramatic talker. It was noticed that she spoke of a supreme impersonal "being," but it would seem to be extremely difficult to conceive of a "being" lacking in the apparently essential element of personality. She also makes "Materialist" do duty for "Atheist." T. B. Wakeman followed the lecturer with a short speech, which was both complementary and complimentary to Miss de Cleyre's address. His arguments were well received. Henry Frank, Mrs. Beckwith, and some others also made remarks more or less germane to the subject. There was a good attendance of the old stand-bys of the Club and quite a number of new faces were seen. Next Friday night General Lee will speak upon "A Helpmeet for Man."

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for renewal of subscription. MR. EDITOR: Kindly permit me to add my mite for the defense of J. B. Wise. The amount is very small, and I sincerely wish that I could hav made it a hundredfold larger. DENVER, COL., Sept. 21, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 1st, containing Heston's cartoon, "Sickening Talk on the Gallows," should be enough to convince anyone who has a grain of sense how utterly foolish, unjust, and stupid is the Christian nightmare. I hav loaned it several times with excellent results. Please send "The Candle from Under the Bushel," and some tracts, Ingersoll preferred.

Yours truly, I. N. SHORE.

Begs Leave to Differ and to Agree.

DEMING, N. M., Sept. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $6 50 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and for extension of subscription. I differ from J. W. Richardson, who in your issue of September 1st "differs decidedly from your brother in regard to the tariff." It was unnecessary to say, "I am a strong Republican," and remarkably superfluous to add, "Every true Freethinker should be a Republican." A true Freethinker believes every man has a right to his opinion and is not in favor of government creating a rich class at the expense of the community, nor of enabling them to still further rob the poor by their thieving "trusts" to control the prices of the necessaries of life. Not a Republican, Receives Warm Welcome.

SOMERVILLE, MASS., Sept. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Many papers find their way to my desk, but none receive as warm a welcome as THE TRUTH SEEKER. It has been a constant visitor at my house for over a year and a half, and I hav only words of praise for the course you pursue as editor, with the best wishes for your success. Truly your paper is a truth seeker, and I shall esteem it an honor to be enrolled in your list of life subscribers. Fraternally yours in the fight for justice, Lonesome but Undaunted.

JOHN DAY, OR., Sept. 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 to help your paper along, as also supply me with good reading matter for about another year. I feel somewhat lonesome out here, being about the only outspoken Freethinker in this place and the only one taking THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am confident that there is not one honest, sincere, and devout Christian within ten miles of here, but they all pretend to be Christians, and hav not the moral courage to come out and say openly that they don't believe the stuff and nonsense printed in the Bible. But here is success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. CHAS. G. CASPARY.

Very Warm in His Praise.

MIDDLEFIELD, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3, which place to my credit for the best paper to enlighten the people and expose orthodox fraud that ever was published in the United States, the greatest educator in existence. I would like to do something for the Congress, but am one of those unfortunate farmers engaged in hop-raising; look at the prices of hops and you will see that while it costs twelve cents a pound to raise we are offered eight cents. I hav to curtail expenses, having a small library of Infidel books. You will hav to excuse me this time. Yours in the cause,

ANGUS GRIFFIN.

An Attack of "Reverential Awe."

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Sept. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $2 to apply on my subscription, provided you can conscientiously accept it when you learn how I obtained it. My professional services as a wood butcher were recently desired in converting a sacred edifice where they had worshiped God and fought the devil for twenty years, into a building for profane purposes, which included a billiard hall. Though greatly shocked at being called on to do such work, I needed the legal tender which awaited my services, and went at it with stifled conscience and more or less reverential awe. The deed is now done and I can only hope for forgivness. Truly yours, C. SEVERANCE.

"Deific Insanity."

LEMOORE, CAL., Sept. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In reading Mrs. or Miss Augusta Chapman's reply to Brother Benson on Atheism, the supreme ignorance of Augusta as regards human nature and natural law, and her deific insanity, are so palpable that to keep silent is really painful. Augusta has yet to learn that the relation we sustain to natural law, as it pertains to our own organization and to all surrounding things, is of that character that in conforming to the requirements of these natural laws, every comfort, every joy, every good, and every happiness is obtained, and cannot be obtained from any other source.

When we strictly conform to the laws of our being, every conceivable good will as naturally follow. Since this is a fact, Augusta cannot avoid seeing that there runs intuitivly all through our being a natural desire to avoid pain and to obtain happiness, and that both of these conditions unavoidably exist in the relation we maintain to natural law. Herein also lies our every virtue or our every vice. Our obedience to, and acquiescence in, the laws of our being, is the only source of love, kindness, hospitality, virtue, and every principle that constitutes a perfect being. There is no inspiration in this; it is but the still small voice of nature that calls us to duty, the hidden force of progress within us, that has lifted us from the low plane of animal barbarism up to our present state, and will continue its silent work of evolution until we occupy a plane of purity that Augusta's angels dare no tread. It needs no God to aid us to do this. All of this, and more, pertains to our natural organization. Augusta points us to the natural "cussedness" of our human nature, but fails to see the unparalleled cussedness in the nature of her God, and also fails to see that all badness in human nature is inhuman and unnatural. If it were natural for us to be bad and sinful, this would be the general order of our acts, and goodness would be the exception; while the facts in the case are, the general tendency is to morality and the exception is crime.

Suppose Augusta were to imitate her lovely and truthful God, how long would she be permitted to run at large? Poor soul! she takes that natural desire of hers to do good for the promptings of a God outside of her own organization!

A little knowledge upsets the brain,
But drinking deeper cures it again.

Something About Swearing.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Sept. 17, 294.

MR. EDITOR: I believe every secret society is intended to be partial, and to gain that end they require every initiate to take an oath to assist and protect their fellows. I heard a wife accuse her husband of that kind of fidelity which was enforced by an oath in his society. This led me to think, What is an oath, and where did it originate?

The Mohammedan swears by the beard of the prophet; the Chinese cut off a white cock's head before they are supposed to be able to tell the truth in a court of justice, while the Christian requires you to be sworn with the right hand uplifted, and in some places to kiss his holy Bible, before you can tell what you saw or know about a crime and the criminal, even if there be no other witness, and the criminal is discharged for want of evidence. Abraham got some promises from God in the form of a covenant, if the Bible is true. Gen. xii, 2, 3; xiii, 15, 16; xvi, 10; xvii, 2 to 15, the last six verses of which are too obscene to quote, required the old man to submit to a surgical operation as a part of the covenant. Now what did God do for that? Is it a fact or a fiction? According to Deut. vii, 8, God would not hav loved Israel if he had not sworn to do so. Why did God make such contracts? Who or what did God swear by? Is this not blasphemy to say that God loved because he swore, and this is his word? But we are forbidden to swear by heaven, for it is his throne, or by the earth, for it is his footstool. Every priest and minister is required to swear to teach and preach without change the same religion that his predecessors taught; and yet so strong is the law of progress that many find it difficult to tie up to that hitching post. Every married couple hav made similar contracts under oath.

So great is the power of the church that in one church they never permit divorce. Much could be said on this and the vows of chastity and celibacy, but not enough to prevent the evils growing out of it. Then every civil and military officer has to swear every time he is promoted before he is considered fit for the place. It makes me think of being asked to promis something before I know what it is.

I hav known liars to perjure themselvs to win a case at law, where several of them combined to swear to the same untruth to outweigh in numbers those who testified to the truth. And these same perjurers were sincere believers in the Christian religion. How did God make a covenant with Abraham or with David? Did he do it by proxy through a high priest? Certainly he did not do it directly, because he would then be a personality, a certain number of feet high and pounds avoirdupois. Now I can easily understand how a priest could teach a ruler that he held his position by the will of an imaginary boss spook called God, and that if the king allowed any other kind of religion, or went after other gods, that god would prevent his seed multiplying. Yet I hav no idea that any all-wise, all-powerful God did or threatened any such thing, for such a threat or promis would be proof that such a god was unwise.

A community, state, or nation may enact laws for the protection of all against the aggressions of other individuals, states, or nations, by the consent of the governed. But no good reason can be given why one should be sworn, by holding up the right hand, to obey those laws which he had helped to enact, more than the peculiar manner Abraham made his servant swear. Gen. xxiv, 1, 2, 3. That was funny! Now the question arises: Was Abraham's seed multiplied as much as was promised in that covenant? And would it be any benefit to themselvs if they had increased so much? When shall we be free to act right without being oath-bound?

Yours truly, GEO. F. ELLIOTT.

What Is Our Proper Work?

OTTAWA, KAN., Sept. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly permit me to answer S. P. Putnam's article, "A Protest," in last week's issue. First, I hav no right to change, apologize for, or in any way correct any resolution or set of resolutions after they hav been accepted by a convention, but as a member of said association and being the one who read said petition or resolutions to the convention I will explain my position, leaving other members to do likewise if they choose. By direct advice of our executiv committee everything pertaining to the welfare of humanity was to be discussed in our Topeka convention from a Humanitarian standpoint. This little band of Kansas Freethinkers has worked alone, unaided, unnoticed, and therefore independent of other associations, and when the privilege was granted the workers to come out for humanity, what naturally followed? The promulgation of ideas nearest the heart. The members of our association liv just outside of the great Colorado silver district We hav seen train-load after train-load of men, stout, honest, and true, shipped from their homes like Russian exiles to become what? Not citizens, but disfranchised tramps; and their wives left alone with hungry children to eke out an existence as best they can, and if no other way offers, sell their bodies for bread. This is no false play on rhetoric.

Come out West, Mr. Putnam, and see the sights I hav lately seen. The very day before I left home for the Topeka convention I fed five "tramps" (?) and clothed a boy tramp with shoes and stockings. The morning I left, as I hastened to make ready for the train, a woman carrying a little child six months old asked for a mouthful to eat, not for herself, Mr. Putnam, but for her baby—nature's supplies being cut off. Was not this enough to arouse every latent spark of love of humanity within a sister's breast, even though sarcasm was used to express it? Last month an aged widow cried as she informed me that she could pay only the interest of the mortgage upon her home, never being able to touch the principal.

I will admit those resolutions were written in a vein of sarcasm, especially where they read, "Inasmuch as has been granted to every citizen the constitutional rights of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,'" and how could it be otherwise when we consider the fact that both our secretary and vice-president are prisoners of said United States? I will admit they are sarcastic and crude; I will also admit the rhetoric is bad, but there is a wild, weird wave of unwritten rhetoric sweeps over me whenever I hear the plaintiv cry, "Please, lady, giv me a little bite to eat." Hav I not, as the writer of those resolutions, the same right to be sarcastic as has Mr. Putnam, or, like him, to express ideas in plain words? His article is a complete condemnation of the action of many intelligent citizens of Kansas, and in rude contempt of them, besides being a criticism on the "rhetoric" used. May I ask Mr. Putnam what he thinks a man cares for rhetoric when he is hungry and cold and stands cringing before the pallid face of his wife and hears the wretched sobs of his own offspring?

Yes, I will admit that I used the words "pray," "entreat." Webster says pray means to ask with reverence; therefore, Mr. Putnam, I will say that I used the word in the fullest meaning, not, however, with reverence to Cleveland, but to suffering humanity. I used the words "throne," "crown," etc., simply in an ironical sense, knowing that Cleveland uses his "one-man power" more tyrannically than does Queen Victoria, who really sits upon a throne and whose head is truly bedecked with a crown. Words are used to express ideas and the rich and well-fed can afford to study rhetoric, but I tell you, Friend Putnam, there was not a very great flow of "rhetoric" in my thoughts recently when I asked the jailer of the Shawnee county jail to let me in to visit thirty-three Commonwealers, and he answered me thus: "You can go in, lady, if you like, but they are not dressed for company—they are almost nude;" nor was I overwhelmed with a fine outburst of oratorical words rhetorically used when I heard young Vanderberg's testimony read before our convention; in it he states he has lain in jail fourteen months without a preliminary trial and no evidence against him of a criminal nature or not a stroke of the pen to show why he is there.

Now, Mr. Putnam, were Cleveland to say to Congress, "I pray you to repeal the law demonetizing silver; I pray you to repeal the Comstock law; or, I entreat you to do all in your power to aid humanity," would you not almost, if not quite, fall down and worship him, not stopping to criticise the "pray," "entreat," etc., used therein?

Yes, I will admit more still when I look ahead of me through a long, cold winter and draw the contrast. Cleveland and his family housed and having all the protection in the world given them from cold and see them fed on all the luxuries labor can giv them; when I see them turning a deaf ear to the heartrending cry of suicidal men and starving women, and then when I draw the other picture truly I will admit I go into "hysterics;" and if those resolutions had a shadow cast over them by being written under this mood, I for one hav nothing to regret. ETTA SEMPLE,

Pres. Kansas Freethinkers' Ass'n.

[Mrs. Semple's answer to Mr. Putnam's criticism of the resolutions of the Topeka convention show how much that criticism was needed. The attempted answer does not touch the question at issue. Neither Mr. Putnam nor THE TRUTH SEEKER has expressed any opinion regarding the merits or the demerits of Mr. Cleveland or the wisdom or the unwisdom of the demonetization of silver. The individual Freethinker can say what he pleases about both and can work with any political party, reform or conservativ, but no Freethought organization has any call to take sides on political issues outside of the Demands of Liberalism, for the self-evident reason that Freethinkers are not a unit as to the right or wrong of these extraneous matters of political dispute. Some Freethinkers believe that the misery of which Mrs. Semple speaks was caused by the demonetization of silver; others do not. Some think that President Cleveland is a blundering tyrant; others that he is a wise and just statesman. Some believe in the single tax; others do not. Some are free-traders, some revenue reformers, while others are protectionists. And so on to the end of the chapter. The only possible safety for Liberal societies is to stick to their own work and fight the aggressions of the church. Liberals can do their other reform work through the parties formed for that purpose. That was all that Mr. Putnam asked. As president of the Freethought Federation he could not hav demanded less. Had Mrs. Semple understood him she would not hav written the foregoing letter. He was not defending Mr. Cleveland. He had nothing to do with him, one way or the other, in his capacity as officer of a Freethought organization. In that capacity it is his duty to try to keep the organizations in line for their legitimate work.—ED. T. S.]

Was Jesus of Divine Origin?

ATCHISON, KAN., Sept. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I will again express my gratitude for the grand and fearless work of our paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the bright and morning star of human liberty. It is the power behind the throne that will yet shake the empire of superstition and banish ignorance from among mankind. The object of the age is to assail and overthrow every form of error and deceit. Ignorance is the bane of our humanity, and unless knowledge can be made to take its place man is a total failure, even if he was created by an infinit being. I wish in this short letter to assert my views relativ to the supposition that Christ was of divine character or origin. I take the position that he was not, and I think it easy to prove that he was not from his own words.

Let us see: It is said and believed (and I wish to state here that that belief is not of evidence, but the basis of error) that Christ was the son of God, inasmuch as he was both human and divine. It is evident then that it would be impossible for such a being to ever err in any of his statements. If it can be shown that he made one single mistake, it forever settles the question of his divinity and Godhead. Men are ever asserting their belief in matters of which they hav no positiv knowledge. Man asserts his belief in a God, but has no knowledge or conception of such a being. Even the Bible says "God is past finding out." Who believes it? The man who believes may be a fool, but the man who knows has wisdom. I will here giv some of the statements of Christ and we will see if they come from a divine source. "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. xi, 29). "O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. xii, 34). "For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies" (Matt. xv 19). "For the people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they hav closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes and hear with their ears and should understand with their heart, and should be converted" etc. (Matt. xiii, 15). You will see that in all these passages the word "heart" is the point under consideration. And now I will ask, Does the heart understand in any instance during life? Does the heart ever think? Has it any emotions or intelligence whatever? Will some one who believes Jesus to be divine please answer this question? Could an intelligent being speak so foolishly, much less a God? Think of the expression: "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Is it not out of the abundance of the brain that the mouth speaketh? Is not the brain always the seat of the intellect? "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." He must hav said it in his heart if he ever said it at all, for the fool lacks brains and therefore could not comprehend such a conception. The wise man has never yet comprehended a supreme being—much less has a fool—for "God is past finding out." "Keep thy heart with diligence, for out of it are all the issues of life." It is supposed nowadays that all life is an influx from the brain and not from the heart. Think of all this tomfoolery emanating from an infinit intelligence! One more point I wish to consider before I close, and that is in relation to spirit. If it is a fact that man has a spirit independent of physical organism, and that this spirit is the real being, and that the body is no part of the soul, but only a house for the spirit to liv in, and that this body is the medium through which all pain and suffering is felt, why should it not be just, if not the proper act, to release the spirit from this tabernacle of clay, and thereby enable it to take its flight to other scenes in a better world? Would it not be the best thing in the world to exterminate the entire race of men and thus release this mortal coil from its many sorrows, disappointments, and pains? It seems to the writer that if this is not the real and perfect life, the sooner we reach the other the better. Why prolong our days here in sickness and distress when there is something far better beyond this vale of tears? If there is anything that should be labeled the ridiculous among men, it is their crude and foolish ideas of a hereafter. Why are there so many different beliefs about God and the hereafter? Simply because men hav no intelligent conception of any other existence than the one they now possess. I hav read many authors and speculators upon the phenomena of the future existence of man, and I must say that language is inadequate to express the profound silliness of all such propositions as are set forth by the cunning and deceit of man regarding this question. If there was the least particle of knowledge upon these grave questions the entire race of men would be at agreement upon the subject. And the fact of their disagreement proves the fallacy of such a hypothesis. The religions of all races of men disagree with themselvs; there is little harmony in all their sayings, little but childless folly and silly ranting in it all. Oh, the inconsistencies of mortal mind! Will the race never learn sound wisdom and discretion? Mind cannot exist independent of matter. No brain, no thought; no physical organism, no intelligent manifestation of anything. We perceive only by our senses, and those senses are manifest only by physical organism, the product of matter. I challenge a rational refutation of all the points herein set forth. Until they are overthrown by sound facts, I hold them to be self-evident and valid.

SIDNEY MURPHY, M. D.

The Cause in Oregon.

PORTLAND, OR., Sept. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: July and August are the hot months in Portland, and the First Secular Church and Secular Sunday-School are closed for the usual summer vacation. This gave Miss Olds, superintendent of the Secular Sunday School, Mr. Smith, and myself a vacation also, and we decided to spend it making a tour of the lower Columbia river, and some of the coast and interior counties, to explain and advocate the objects of the Oregon State Secular Union, and the system adopted by it of establishing Secular churches and Sunday-schools in every town, grouped in circuits, each circuit placed in charge of a licensed lecturer of the Oregon State Secular Union, who is to deliver lectures regularly, at regular places, and hav supervision of all Secular Sunday-schools in his or her circuit.

The Oregon State Secular Union had no money on hand to guarantee our expenses, and as everybody is affected by "hard times," we had some misgivings about being able to get very far on the contributions to the hat, and if we did, whether or not they would be large enough to get us home again.

However, it seemed absolutely necessary that if the "Oregon system" of teaching Secularism was ever to be understood by the people, some one must go out and tell them about it, and we could see no reason why we three could not attempt it at least. The expenses of three would be three times the expenses of one, of course; yet none of us wanted to go alone, and none of us wanted to stay at home.

Mr. Smith has a voice, but no knowledge of music, and my education has been similarly neglected, but Miss Olds is at home with her violin, piano, or in a vocal effort.

We could all talk, but all talk and no music might not always interest the crowds we expected to entertain, so we practiced a few duets and "three"-ets, and took a lot of membership blanks and our spare change and set out, July 28th, for weal or for woe.

That evening we stepped off the cars at Scappoose, and took Uncle John Price and his son-in-law, Harry West, and his excellent wife, by surprise. No one in that rich rural country suspected that a Secularist lecturer was within a hundred miles, and the idea of getting together an audience at 2 P. M. the next day filled our friends with wonder.

They assured us that other lecturers, although previously advertised, had had audiences ranging from seven to twenty, and perhaps our enthusiasm seemed to them after the Col. Sellers order.

Virgil S. Smith, one of the Oregon State Secular Union lecturers, makes his headquarters at Scappoose, and early Sunday morning, a la Paul Revere, rode "far and wide," leaving at every farm-house door a large poster announcing our arrival. The result was that at 2 o'clock an audience of over one hundred had assembled beneath the giant firs of West's Grove.

W. W. West, the wealthiest and most influential man in the neighborhood, was chairman of the first meeting. The audience was enthusiastic, and after the meeting we met, among other friends, Mrs. W. W. West, J. F. Dangerfield, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. West, J. M. Gove, and others.

A second meeting was arranged for the following evening, and inquiries made as to the neighboring towns. St. Helens seemed to be the only place, but our friends assured us that no lecturer had ever been there—that it was a very orthodox place, that we probably would be unable to get a hall, etc. That was the place we wanted to go. We wanted to preach the gospel to the "heathen."

Leaving Miss Olds and me to take charge of the Scappoose meeting, Mr. Smith went ahead to bill St. Helens. Another fine audience at Scappoose, a beautiful bouquet from Mrs. Ross, a dance under the auspices of the Oregon State Secular Union after the lecture, hearty handshakes of many friends, and we are off for St. Helens. Mr. Henderson, of Milton, meets us with hack at train. He is one of those sincere men whom it is a pleasure always to meet. Everybody knows of the lecture and we expect a full house. St. Helens is a small but beautifully located place on the Columbia, and we are glad to learn that among her citizens are quite a number of fine Liberals. We could hav lectured here gratis in the Court House, but having left home with the idea that if we wished nice people to listen to us, it would not do to resort to dingy halls and small and unpopular places, because they were cheap or free, we rented the Opera House.

The following incident well illustrates how Christians love their enemies: Making inquiries for some one to accompany Miss Olds on the violin—as we always did where an instrument could be obtained—we were directed to Mrs. M. Explaining to her our mission at St. Helens, she assumed the attitude of a statue—one carved from ice—and said: "I am a Methodist, and I would not care to do anything which might bring such a society here." We asked her to recommend some one else. She named a young lady and a doctor. The lady is a Baptist, also her mother.

We were delighted to obtain the daughter's assistance. The mother is a very agreeable, fine-looking woman. Though a Baptist, she said she was willing to listen to all questions, and would certainly not miss the lecture, but while we were pleasantly chatting the Methodist's daughter came into the parlor with a note. The mother "changed her mind;" she "could not consistently let her daughter play for us," but still she "would come to the lecture." We did not call on the doctor.

We began to think our friends were right in calling this a "Christian" community. At the close of our meeting we were informed that the godly Mrs. M. had taken the pains to drive where she had any influence and tell the people to stay away from our meeting. The Baptist lady did not come. But we had an audience of over seventy-five, and we felt jubilant. Eight new membors joined the Oregon State Secular Union. Dr. Harry R. Cliff was chairman. The doctor is a man of deep thought and original ideas, and would make a stanch worker in a Secular Church.

Among others whom we met are A. K. Blakesley, the genial host of the Oriental Hotel; Mr. Weed, clerk of the court; Davis Brothers, editors of the Oregon Mist; E. T. Gore, H. F. Rung, D. W. Richardson, and J. H. Swager.

We were pleased to again shake the hand of our stanch friend, John Price, of Scappoose. The audience, of course, was largely composed of Christians. Christians are not to be expected to pay the expenses of Secularists, and the result is, we paid the St. Helens people $3 for the privilege of talking to them.

At Ranier we expected to find stanch friends, and we were not disappointed.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Baby's Compliment.

His father and mother were both away,
And baby and I had been friends all day—
Many and gay were the games we played;
Baby ordered and I obeyed;
We cared not at all for the rainy sky,
We built us a blockhouse three feet high;
We threw pine knots on the nursery fire
And watched the flames mount higher and higher,
We hid in the most improbable nooks,
We looked at the pictures in all his books;
We ran in "tag" till his cheeks were red,
And his curls were tangled about his head;
So when the twilight was closing down
Over the fields and the woodlands brown,
And nurse declared we must say good-night,
He clung to me still in the firelight—
He trampled my gown with his rough little feet,
He climbed on my lap and kissed me sweet.
And as he scrambled from off my knee
"You'd make a good mother," said baby to me.

I hav had compliments, now and then,
From grown up women and grown-up men,
Some were commonplace, some were new.
Never was one of them rung so true.
Never was one seemed half so real—
Baby compared me to his ideal!

Two Flowrs.

A valley lay hidden among the green hills,
Made verdant and fruitful by clear, trickling rills,
Charmingly rare,
Exquisitly fair,
With soft southern zephyrs, sweet summer air.

Dame Nature smiled brightly and forth from the ground
A gay little floweret sprang with a bound,
Artistic'ly neat,
Enticingly sweet,
To see and to know her a positiv treat.

With tears of real joy for this beautiful birth
Dame Nature rewarded and moistened the earth;
The fair flower grew,
And crystaline dew
Bedecked it with jewels pure, limpid, and true.

One clear, balmy evening the flowers had a call—
Dame Petal and Blossom, Dame Nature and all—
When lo! with a twirl,
A bewildering whirl,
This princess of flowers was changed to a girl.

As a girl she is nicer than as a mere flower,
Improving in goodness with each passing hour.
I hope she will do
All that's noble and true,
And for her life's color wear naught but true blue.

The Mind a Treasury.

The mind is a treasure house where may be, and should be, deposited jewels of worth and beauty. It is a book filled with rare paintings, many golden memories, fair visions indelibly impressed, and gems whose value cannot be counted by pieces of gold and silver; or, it may be but a record of duplicity, villainy, and many distorted fancies.

It should be the aim to store the mind with the useful and valuable, to do this in youth, when all the world is new and fresh, that in old age the mental reservoir may be a source of pleasure and profit.

A lady was afflicted with an incurable disease. She suffered much and almost constant pain. She was a victim of cancer and was obliged to carry her right arm in a sling. Upon the fingers of her left hand she wore flashing and costly jewels to the amount of thirty thousand dollars. She said to one attracted by the beauty and brilliancy of the gems: "You admire my rings! Yes, they are beautiful, but I would cheerfully giv them all to hav the use of my right hand and to be free from pain."

One night the lady whose room was next to that of the owner of the jewels, after she had retired for the night, was entertained for hours by the most beautiful recitations. They came from the room of the invalid. There were choice selections from Cowper, Wordsworth, Poe, Hood, Byron. Gray, Shelley, Shakspere, and other poets.

The listener was spell-bound as she heard "The Dream of Eugene Aram," "The Raven," "Rob Roy's Grave," "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," "John Gilpin's Ride," and lastly the whole of Shelley's "Queen Mab." The next morning she hastened to inquire who was the reader who rendered so finely the standard selections, and if it could be possible that they were given by the sick lady. "Yes, it was I," she said. "I had a bad night last night. I could not sleep with the pain, and to relieve the tedium of the long and weary hours I repeated the poems learned in my young days. I often do that when I cannot sleep."

"You do not mean to say you recited all those from memory?" said the astonished listener.

"I do indeed, and those poems are not all by any means that I am familiar with. It is a great satisfaction to me now that I stored them away 'in the book and volume of my brain,' where now, in these later days, I often 'turn the leaf to read.' They are the jewels set in my mind and their luster is not less than the diamonds upon my fingers, which you so much admire."

What a pleasure and gratification was this storing of the mind with the gems of poesy, and how much pleasure they yielded in after life. The lesson is obvious. S. H. W.

Stopped the Baby's Cry.

A bachelor is not usually accredited with much knowledge about the proper treatment of children, but sometimes they step in where angels—that is, the mothers of the children—fear to tread, says the Philadelphia Press. A well-known man about town, who is pretty well on in years, and not very fond of children, stopped in to see a married sister the other day and found her trying to amuse her little boy, aged five years. Not long after he arrived she stepped out of the room to attend to some household matter, leaving him alone with the child. The latter eyed him dubiously for some minutes. He was a spoiled child if ever there was one, and had no idea of making promiscuous acquaintances. The bachelor tried to make the little one laugh, but all he got for his antics was a sour look. Finally, without any warning, the child burst out crying. Here was a quandary, to be sure. He didn't care to pick the boy up, and soothe him. His attempts in a verbal line were dismal failures. What should he do? Finally a thought struck him. He looked at the crying youngster, and the crying youngster looked at him through his tears. He was evidently much pleased with the impression he was making.

"Cry louder," said he.

The child obeyed.

"Louder yet," urged the bachelor.

A yell went up that would hav done credit to an Indian.

"Cry louder still," insisted the man, and the boy did his best to obey.

"Louder," fairly howled his uncle.

"I won't," snapped the infant, and he shut his mouth with a click and was quiet for the rest of the day.

Correspondence.

YONCALLA, OR., Sept. 6, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written to the Children's Corner often and am always pleased to see my letters in print. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for three years and I think he will continue. I always read it on Sundays in place of the Bible. If any Christian mentions the Bible my father gives him some chapters to read; the usual answer is that such matter is found only in the Old Testament. Christians are getting pretty tough around here. The preacher ran off with another man's wife. That's just about the way they all do; we could not expect any better of them. We hav lots of Christians around here. My father has always been a Freethinker and has always got along all right, and I think he always will. I break one of the Ten Commandments every Sunday. I crochet or read THE TRUTH SEEKER to pass away the time. There are two churches in our town—Presbyterian and Methodist. I think our town would be better off without them. We hav but one small schoolhouse, so I think it would hav been better had they built a schoolhouse instead of the churches. Our school starts September 10th. We had so many scholars last year that we had to rent a dwelling house to accommodate half of them, and I guess we will hav to do it again this year. My father tried to raise enough subscribers to get "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," but, owing to the hard times, he could not do it.

CHEAP EDITION.
Hard Knocks at Christianity.
By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

IT is hard to please a jealous person.—Investigator.

NEVER yet was noble man but made ignoble talk. He makes no friends who never made a foe.—Tennyson.

THE truth seems to us, not that the age in which we liv has lost its moral sense, but that it is acquiring a different sense of moral proportion.—London Chronicle.

ENFORCEMENT of justice is nothing else than maintenance of the conditions of life as carried on in the social state. And the more completely justice is enforced, the higher will the life become.—Herbert Spencer.

WE must claim and make forever sure that heritage of American youth which is the true meaning and priceless boon of democratic institutions—equal opportunity in a land of equal rights.—Hon. William L. Wilson.

THE spirit of liberty is not merely, as some people imagin, a jealousy of our own particular rights, but a respect for the rights of others, and an unwillingness that any man, whether high or low, should be wronged or trampled under foot.—Channing.

A RELIGION of effortless adoration may be the religion for an angel, but never for a man. Not in the contemplativ, but in the activ, lies true hope; not in rapture, but in reality, lies true life; not in the realm of ideals, but among tangible things, is man's sanctification wrought.—Professor Drummond.

THE infinit universe cannot hav emanated from nothing; something must necessarily hav existed eternally, or that which exists must hav been produced by nothing; if ever there could hav been a time when nothing existed, then there could never hav been any such thing as existence.—Xenophanes.

MAKE reputation the servant of character. Despise any respectability that cloaks itself against an absolute acceptance of life in all its forms—in its shadow and light, in its virtue and vice. Giv eyes to evil that it may see. He who gropes and does ill to-day may to-morrow stand erect and fill the world with emulativ zeal.—Horace L. Traubel.

ALL the wrecks on either shore of the stream of time—all the wrecks of cities and nations, are a warning that no nation founded on slavery can liv. From sand-enshrouded Egypt, from the marble wilderness of Athens, from every fallen stone of mighty Rome, comes a wail—a cry: "No nation founded on slavery can stand."—R. G. Ingersoll.

BUT mankind are not pieces—there's your fault!
You cannot push them, and, the first move made,
Lean back to study what the next should be,
In confidence that when it's fixed upon,
You'll find them where you left them, blacks and whites;
Men go on moving when your hand's away. —Browning.

THE goal which we endeavor to attain is scientific truth, the one test of which is that it will bear untrammeled and unlimited investigation. Such truth must be not only verified, but always verifiable. It must welcome every test; it must recoil from no criticism, higher or lower, from no analysis and no skepticism. It challenges them all. It asks for no aid from faith; it appeals to no authority; it relies on the dictum of no master.—Daniel G. Brinton.

A "WOMAN'S-RIGHT woman" gave me sometime since a watchword which would form a perfect motto for a hedonist society. It was this—"Self-development is greater than self-sacrifice." Oddly enough, self-evident as this proposition seems to any enlightened mind the moment it is formulated, I find it greeted with surprise and hesitation among average Philistines wherever it first shows itself. People are so convinced of the old devil-worshiping belief in self-sacrifice as in itself a good thing, that it startles them to see self-development put before it. In short, they believe their god has so ill-constituted his world that for his creatures to develop themselvs freely and satisfy the longings of their own natures is obviously wrong; while to sacrifice themselvs ruthlessly, and to repress or thwart or crucify their own natures, is obviously right and proper and desirable. One has only to place these two antithetical conceptions in such juxtaposition in order to see that the ascetic creed implies a diabolical origin for the cosmos. God so made us, and put such instincts in us, that to gratify them is wrong, and to crush them is right; to be happy is wicked, while to be miserable is righteousness.—Grant Allen.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her 'curse,' of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreadful disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

JACOBUS MAGNUS.

A Sermon in the Valley. By JOHN DICKINSON DOBBS, M.A., LL.D., in which the evil one, in the disguise of alcohol, inspireth the reverend gentleman to say many true things inadvertently, transporteth him into high places on the wings of sentiment, showeth him visions, and turneth the current of his discourse toward terrestrial joys.

Our text this morning will be found in the twenty-fourth chapter of the Book of Genesis, the eleventh and seventeenth verses; and my humble endeavor, dear friends, will be to illustrate to you from the life of Jacob how virtue and piety are rewarded by the Almighty, and how he protects his chosen ones from the avarice and malicious hatred of the wicked. In all the sacred book, from Genesis to Malachi, we cannot find a story which affords stronger proof of God's goodness and mercy to his children, and the stern justice meted out to those who disobey his holy word, than the career of Jacob, with which I hope you are all familiar. What history is more thrilling to the Christian mind than that of this divinely-favored and immaculate patriarch of Israel? My friends, every sincere believer should be conversant with his exemplary career, stamped as it is with the marks of divine favor and approval. Looking to the chronicles of the saints for encouragement in that hour when the Lord chasteneth his servant, and seemeth to permit the snares of the wicked and the machinations of Beelzebub to prevail against him, then it is that the lowly follower of Jesus feels in his heart a consciousness of the unerring justice of our Heavenly Father in his relations with us poor worms his creatures; and we are reminded that God putteth forth the hand of his omnipotence to succor the faithful in the time of peril. Just as he protected the innocent Jacob from the avarice of his brother Esau, and preserved him from the imposition of the inhospitable Laban, so also, my brother, will he deal with thee if thou preservest thy faith in the puissant sway of his omniscient grace; so will he bestow upon thee that religious discernment and moral stamina which form so firm a foundation for the virtues and piety of this admirable man.

Turning to the initial portion of our text, in the eleventh verse of the twenty-fourth chapter of Genesis, we find these remarkable words: "And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept." I say remarkable, dear friends, because, although it may be admitted that the delights of so happy a recognition might fittingly be consummated with a kiss, still to one who has not devoted earnest and prayerful consideration to our inspired account of this affecting incident it may seem extraordinary conduct on the part of Jacob to lay violent hands upon his quivering vocal chord (still trembling, peradventure, from this osculatory transport) and lift it off its feet toward the vast empyreal sphere in rapturous emphasis, the while he laid the dust around the sacred well of Haran with a shower of grateful tears. But, brethren, it pleased the Almighty Father, in his infinit wisdom, to giv us, through his inspired servant, the key to what might otherwise hav remained for all time a mystery and a stumbling-block to trip the faithful—casting, perchance, upon this great man's spotless character a suspicion of hysterical tendencies. I believe, my friends, that the strange deportment of Jacob at this juncture may be satisfactorily explained by a study of the simple and unadorned language of the inspired narrator of this interesting and instructiv epoch in his life. Turn to the seventeenth verse of the same chapter, and you will read these words: "But Rachel was beautiful and well-favored" I think we may perhaps, without disrepect to the memory of the revered subject of our thoughts this morning, venture to remark that Jacob was probably an ardent admirer of the charms of the gentler sex. At any rate, basing our supposition on his uxorious record subsequent to the day when for the first time, in the exuberant flush of youth, he pressed a kiss on the sweet mouth of the fair Rachel, we may reasonably assume that he undoubtedly evidenced this virtue as he advanced in years and righteousness. Who knows, indeed, that it may not hav evolved in direct consequence of the ecstasy of that felicitous moment when the youthful Jacob came upon this vision of loveliness and sipped his initial taste of the elysian nectar from the winsome lips of his virgin cousin.

Brethren, we will digress at this point in order to study the pleasing picture which is here presented to us—Rachel, the daughter of Laban, the son of Nahor. Methinks I see her image pass before me, as it was imprinted on the heart of Jacob that radiant morning in the world's green youth when they two thrilled together beside cool Haran's pool! Can we proceed without a glance, however furtiv, at this soft statue of ingenuous grace, whose curving lines of beauty, suggested rather by the very robes that hide them, evoke with their mute eloquence dreams of ecstatic bliss! Her raven tresses in a wave of curls glance on her snowy neck! Light, lovly limbs, to which the spirit's play givs motion airy as the dancing spray of falling waters! "Lips in whose rosy labyrinths when she smiles, the soul is lost!" And blushes swift and wild as are the momentary meteors that shoot athwart the untamed but beauteous firmament! Eyes—deep, fathomless, strange, but yet exquisit; now crossed by glimpses of the joys of heaven—now shadowed with the shames of earth; in every look the flashes of a bright, unclouded soul, unstained with guile and ignorant of sorrow! I confess, dear friends, that though my head is hoary with the winters that hav flown, and my veins are waxing sluggish, I cannot rest my thoughts upon this charming picture without some return of that enthusiasm which was wont to stir them to a quicker pulse in the days of fervid youth. I hav often wished, when reading this romantic episode in the life of Jacob, that the genius of a Raphael or a Michael Angelo could hav exercised itself upon the delineation of this sensuous-breathing beauty of the dreamy East, and left upon his immortal canvas a master's fancy of nature's power and glory in the gorgeous land of her early love. Ah, my brethren!—and especially thou, my young brother, who, like Jacob, are not proof against the enchantments of feminin grace and beauty—who is there among us that would not hav claimed relationship with her? Who is there within the range of my voice this morning, that, meeting in the wilderness with this delicious prodigy of maiden charms—this budding rose of Israel, still sparkling with the dewdrops of the twilight hour of childhood, yet warming into life and radiant with the beams of love's young dawn—who is there, I say, who would hav hesitated to stamp the assurance of relationship, with dear familiarity, on the untried lips of such an one! Nay, more! who is it that, in the language of our sacred text, would not hav "lifted up his voice and wept" for soulful joy at such a blessed vision! Yes, my brother, thou too wouldst hav done as did the youthful Jacob; for thee, also those lips would not hav smiled in vain their invitation! Thou, too, hadst irrigated the barren waste of superfluous expression which ornaments thy beaming face with the pent-up torrents of long-hoarded moisture! Thou, too, my brother, who oft in the debating-club hath raised thy voice in eloquent excuse of thy delinquent fees!—and thou, pale-faced ecclesiast, whose resonant tones are wont to ring the rafters in melodious sweetness, and arouse the hardened sinner to concede the cogent logic of thy burning words, and thy peculiar fitness for the garrulous stump—ye all hadst seized with unkind hand, e'en as did Jacob, the great distributors of thy small thoughts, and lifted them in transport to the bright dome of blue infinity!

But, friends, wherefore this rapt attention? Ye fright me with the warm encouragement that your eyes do speak! The atmosphere within the house of prayer, where all before breathed naught could vex the calm tranquility which marks the workings of true faith and the serenity of stern conviction, is now reverberant with approving whispers, which echo back and forth from lips that erstwhile scarce could summon energy to speak ordained responses. The somnolent brothers who ne'er hav missed for twenty years their Sabbath drowse, hav lost their lethargy and, wide-awake, do hang with eager attitude upon my words. Ah me! my heart migivs me! What hav I said that thus could rouse the interest of my flock to such a pitch of expectation? and why this strange delirium which numbs the limbs and steals away the senses? For an hour or more its subtle sway has gained on me; and I confess the words of exhortation that the tongue did speak my soul knew not. It seems to me as though my brain were reeling with the burning fires of hell; my trembling knees scarce can support my weight; and some malignant force doth bear me toward the earth, and fain would hav me prone in horizontal shame before you! Lord, what hath thy servant done that thou shouldst lay on him the heavy hand of tribulation? Can it be possible that written in the holy book are words may lead astray him that doth read them? Away, satanic thought, inspired by the blasphemer! back to the noisome pit! And yet, doth not great Solomon, crowned by Jehovah with the priceless coronal of wisdom, invite his friends to "drink, yea, drink abundantly O beloved"? Verily I fear the fiend hath entered me and put into my mouth abominations, that I might utter them in the sanctuary of the Most High! Brethren, I perceive that I can stand no longer. Surely 'tis no else than death that thus affecteth me! Yea, true, the sands of life are slipping fast away; and I do feel the prefatory fluttering which bespeaks the spirit's flight. Beneath my feet the old world reels; its wild pulsations thrill me with dismay, lest I should lose my footing! Ere the roof doth fall upon us—hic—(and even now methinks I see these massiv walls quake with disquietude) let me once more pronounce—hic—the benediction, and seek in prayer the blessing of the Lord. Friends—hic—I am sinking; our mother earth attracts me. Mysterious visitations do appall me with their strange phenomena. I see approaching me—hic—rare beings from above, who summon me to follow them, and one, more somber than the rest, which looks like—hic—death! Grim death, if it be truly thee, embrace thy—hic—willing prey! O Christ, receive my soul, winged for its blest reward, and waft thy servant—hic—to that mansion in the skies prepared for—hic—him! My children, blank oblivion cometh on apace!—hic—but ere unconsciousness o'ertakes me—hic—I will speak one last word more.—hic—hic— Keep in your—hic - hearts the story of—hic—great Jacob, and remem—hic—ber Rachel!—hic—hic.—.

From the Lickspittle Daily Buzz-Saw.

We are glad to welcome into our midst the Rev Jeremiah Cant, who has been called to fill the vacancy of the First Hardhead church caused by the retirement of the Rev. John Dickinson Dobbs, who, on account of ill heath, has been strongly urged by his physicians to take a a long rest from the arduous labors of the ministry. The congregation made up a handsome purse and presented it to their beloved pastor, and tears stood in the eyes of many as flock and shepherd parted.

There will be a festival and hand-shaking at the parsonage this evening, at which all members of the congregation and their friends are invited to be present and extend a hearty welcome to the new pastor, Mr. Cant. VAUGHLEIGH.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

At its meeting in Council Bluffs last week Gen. Greenville M. Dodge, of Iowa, was elected president of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee.

An immense steel-rail plant is about completed at Youngstown, Ohio, at a cost of $1,500,000. By means of interchangeable rolls both steel billets and rails can be made.

There are some indications which point to the conclusion that Senator William B. Allison, of Iowa, a moderate protectionist, may receive the Republican nomination for president in 1896.

In the twenty-first congressional district of New York the Democrats rebuked Simon Schermerhorn for his failure to vote for the Wilson bill, and nominated George Van Horn to succeed him.

It looks as though the French were trying to stretch their protectorate over Madagascar into a complete occupation of the country. If they do it may involve them in serious trouble with England.

The Chinese are reported to hav abandoned Moukden, the capital of Manchooria, and the Japanese are said to hav landed a large force at Talien-Wah, on the Chinese coast northeast of Port Arthur.

There was a slight Republican gain in the vote at the town elections in Connecticut, and a somewhat greater gain for license, Danbury, New Britain, and other places slipping away from the Prohibitionists.

The late Atlantic coast cyclone, which failed to reach this city, caused great loss of life and property in Cuba. In the eastern part of the island the banana plantations were wrecked and two hundred people were killed.

It is reported that rebellion has broken out in some of the provinces of China, owing to dissatisfaction with the conduct of the war against Japan, and it is rendered comparativly easy by the withdrawal of troops to send to the front.

In the Florida election the main fight was between two Democratic factions, the friends and enemies of Senator Call, and Governor Mitchell stationed troops in Jacksonville, but they were not needed. The Populist vote was small.

Senator McPherson, of New Jersey, announces that he cannot be a candidate for reëlection, on account of failing health. It is supposed that this declaration is called out by the treatment of Congressman Cadmus by his constituents.

The Democrats of the Fifth New Jersey district repudiated Congressman Cadmus for his votes against tariff reform, declaring that he was a traitor to his party and more dangerous than an open enemy. Hon. Preston Stevenson was nominated in his place.

A Japanese fleet, convoying transports —seventy vessels in all—has been sighted in the gulf of Pechili, near the Chinese coast. It is supposed that the troops on board constitute the Second corps of the Japanese army and that it numbers about 30,000 men.

The Democratic state central committee of Ohio has issued an address to the electors of the state calling upon them to so vote that no matter which party secures the ascendancy in the next Congress the free coinage of silver will be attained. The document is a voluminous one.

The Democratic minority of the recently adjourned Constitutional Convention of New York has issued to the electors of the state an address protesting against what is called an attempt to incorporate into the Constitution a "gerrymander" of the legislativ districts of the state.

A race riot is reported at Power's Station, near Hawesville, Ky., on Oct. 4. Negro excursionists, forced to ride in separate cars, engaged in a shooting affray with several white men. The whites report that seven negroes were killed, and more wounded, and a number of whites wounded.

A cyclone swept over Little Rock, Ark., on Oct. 2. Thirty buildings in the business portion of the city were unroofed and the state insane asylum and the penitentiary, two miles from town, were badly damaged. Several people were killed and property to the amount of $1,000,000 or more was destroyed.

Still another war governor has passed away; Andrew G. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, died at his home in Bellefonte on Oct. 7. He was born in that place on April 27, 1817. To him was chiefly due the first nomination of Lincoln, and the troops he raised were the first to reach the national capital at the outbreak of the civil conflict. He called an extra session of the legislature, secured an appropriation of $3,500,000, and with that equipped the reserves that saved Washington after the first battle of Bull Run.

Prof. David Swing, the liberal minister, died in Chicago on Oct. 3. Accused of heresy, he left the Presbyterian church several years ago and established Central church, on undenominational lines. He soon had a larger church and was receiving a larger salary than any other minister in Chicago. Services were held in Central Music Hall, which was too small to accommodate the crowds which went to hear him. The church had a Sunday school of three thousand pupils, a large kindergarten and an industrial school. Professor Swing was born in Cincinnati in 1083.

In the election in Georgia last week a large vote was polled and the Democratic candidates were successful, although by a greatly decreased majority from that obtained two years ago. The majority has fallen from 70,000 to less than 30,000 on the vote for governor. William Y. Atkinson, the governor-elect, runs 4,000 behind the rest of the Democratic ticket. As he had declared himself for the free coinage of silver and as a vote against him was a vote for the free coinage Populist candidate, Judge Hines, it would seem that the disaffection toward him had other causes than the currency issue. The Democrats hav the state legislature by a safe majority, thus insuring them a United States Senator to succeed Patrick Walsh.

Commodore Elbridge T. Gerry, president of the society alleged to exist for the prevention of cruelty to children, has been in trouble lately, as Mr. Goff, examining witnesses before the Lexow committee, took occasion to protest against the law which puts so much arbitrary power into the hands of the officers of that society. Mr. Gerry wanted to read a statement regarding a certain case to the committee, but he was told that he could not do so, as the committee was not listening to the reading of statements, but was taking sworn testimony; if Mr. Gerry desired to go on to the stand and be sworn he could do so. Commodore Gerry also wants a law passed by the legislature to provide for the legal whipping of men guilty of extreme cruelty to children. A resolution favoring this method of punishment was adopted by the society.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, author of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," the "Wonderful One-Hoss Shay," and other famous articles and poems, died at his home in Boston on Oct. 7. He was one of America's foremost men of letters. He was of Dutch descent on the mother's side, the Wendells having gone from Albany to Boston early in the eighteenth century; Jansen Wendell, who came from the Old World in 1645, was the first settler. Wendell Phillips was descended from the same family, and Dr. Holmes alluded to the fact in his Phi Beta Kappa poem of 1881:

"Fair cousin, Wendell P.,
Our ancestors were dwellers by the Zuyder Zee;
Both Grotius and Erasmus were countrymen of we,
And Vondel was our namesake, though he spelt it with a V."

Oliver Wendell Holmes was born Aug 29, 1806.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

A Distinction Without Much Difference.

A few months ago we mentioned the fact that Rev. Irl R. Hicks, of St. Louis, had preached a sermon in 1874 in Eden Chapel in Missouri, and we said that it was stated that in that sermon he had declared that the soul of Abraham Lincoln "went howling from the theater down to hell." Some reader of this paper has sent Mr. Hicks a copy of the issue containing the paragraph in question, and now he favors us with a marked copy of his Word and Works for August, in which he says that we are mistaken—only he does not use that exact form of words—that he did not say what we were informed that he said. He explains that he was preaching a Thanksgiving sermon, in which he emphasized the fact that the prayers and thanksgivings of the people should be hearty and devout, and that the rulers who issued the proclamations, "calling the nation to prayers and thanksgivings, should join the people in making such occasions what they ought to be." Mr. Hicks continues:

"We deplored the fact that, at the close of a long and bloody civil war, on the very day President Lincoln had called the nation to devout prayer and thanksgiving, he lost his life, 'not amid the assemblies whom he had called to the house of God, but in the public theater, the gates of which open hellward from the earth.' Our remarks were not intended as an attack upon President Lincoln, but a comment on the sin and folly of trifling with God, as if formal proclamations, creeds, or confessionals, were anything but mockery in his sight, without the sincere and devout service of the heart. We are still of the opinion that 'the gates of the public theater open hellward from the earth'—that it is a source of extravagance and vanity, a menace to chastity and morality, and that no man or woman with well balanced mind and heart would complacently entertain the thought of passing from the sensual amphitheater directly into the presence of Almighty God."

We fail to see that Mr. Hicks has helped his case very much. If "the gates of the theater open hellward from the earth," Abraham Lincoln, who received his death wound in the theater, ran considerable risk of going straight to hell when he died. Even now the preacher more than intimates that Lincoln was guilty of "the sin and folly of trifling with God," and we would not be surprised if as early as 1874 his words and manner were less conciliatory than his words are now. Now he says that it is his opinion that no man or woman with "well balanced mind and heart" would like to think of going from the theater directly into "the presence of Almighty God" The implication seems to be that Lincoln did not hav a well-balanced mind and heart, and we fairly presume that this is what the average clergyman thinks of every person who attends the theater. It occurs to us that the implication may be as valid, as a general proposition, as would be a similar one regarding all attendants at church services, but no more so.

The Secular Principle of Government.

Should the state grant any favors to any church or to any number of churches? Should the state contribute in any way to the propagation of religious dogmas? Should the state compel outward respect for or observance of any rite, ceremony, or institution of any church or of any religious system? Secularism promptly answers these questions with an unqualified No. The union of church and state is wrong in principle and disastrous in effect. All history testifies to this. So indisputably true is it that even those sectarists who are striving to establish a theocracy in this country are compelled to continually protest that they are unalterably opposed to the union of the church with the state—that is, they are forced to disguise their intentions, forced to pretend that they hate that which they love, forced to make believe that they are Secularists in all but the name, for Secularists they must be if they do not believe in the combination of the church with the state or the subordination of the state to the church. Yet, despite all their solemn declarations that they favor the complete separation of the state and the church they hate and loathe the principles of Secularism and the name of Secularist. Why this glaring contradiction, this unblushing self-stultification? The key that unlocks the mystery is the fact that they are not opposed to church and state union. How, then, do they salve their consciences for the deception practiced upon the uncritical public? In a very simple way indeed. They say that they do not want any particular church to be made the state church, for that would be the union of church and state, but they do want the fundamental principles of religion recognized by the state, and that would not be the union of church and state. They fail to see, or at least to publicly acknowledge, that the essence of theocracy is the favoritism shown by the political powers to the beliefs of certain citizens at the expense of other citizens. Favoritism breeds irresponsibility, corruption, and tyranny, and these are the great evils of ecclesiastical alliance with or dominance over the state.

Thus it is clearly apparent that the recognition of religion by the state is essentially union of church and state. This fact is brought out still more distinctly by an enumeration of the demands of the theocrats. They want church property to be exempt from taxation; this means the appropriation of money by the state to the churches. They want chaplains in the army and navy, in the chambers of legislation, and in penal and reformatory institutions; this means more state payments to the churches. They want religious instruction in the public schools; this means still more money from the state for the propagation of church dogmas and also the direct teaching of those dogmas by the employees of the state. They want laws forbidding work and recreation on Sunday; this is a demand for the setting aside of one day in the week for the exclusiv use of a privileged class—the priesthood—and is intended to secure an acknowledgment of a tenet of the Christian church. They want the social relations of men and women regulated in accordance with what they say was the opinion entertained by a young Jew worshiped by them as a part of God; this means, of course, the recognition by the state of another tenet of the Christian church. They want the national Constitution so amended that the fundamental doctrins of the Christian church and of Theism will be made a part thereof and all except professing Christians be shut out of public positions—if this does not mean open and unequivocal union of church and state, what does it mean?

What man or woman who intelligently loves liberty and justice can indorse the theocratic program or recoil from the acceptance of the principles of Secularism?

The Christian Reformer, the most aggressiv organ of the theocratic party, keeps a very sharp watch on the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and givs its readers the benefit of many of our exhortations, but it generally fights shy of our arguments. However, in its issue of October 6th it made a few quotations that might hav shocked some of its constituency. We had said that a great deal of the prevalent political corruption "is directly chargeable to the theocrats. The attempt to subvert the secular Constitution has contributed powerfully to the unmanning of politicians. They hav been bullied into voting for all sorts of unconstitutional laws, and hav made all kinds of promises under duress of threats of defeat in future elections if they did not giv their public indorsement to the demands of the theocrats." This was certainly plain enough without what immediately followed it in the editorial from which it was taken by the Christian Reformer. Any person of ordinary mind should hav been able to see that we had reference to the theocratic legislation secured by the Sabbatarians and other people of that class "under duress of threats of defeat" for the legislators who should fail to vote for the laws demanded in the interest of religion. But the editors of the Christian paper evidently did not like to lay before their readers statements of fact which the editors knew could not be disposed of by them. Hence they said: "To say that the efforts of Christian people for the enactment and enforcement of Christian laws lead to political corruption is to utter arrant nonsense." Then they proceeded to dilate upon the political rottenness of the great cities, as though our remarks had direct reference to that kind of political corruption. Here is what immediately succeeded the lines reproduced by the Christian Reformer:

"They [the legislators] hav seen misleading and even forged petitions laid upon their desks, and they hav not dared to expose the fraud, but hav had to make believe that they saw nothing wrong, and hav talked and voted as though they had not the slightest doubt of the truth of the theocrats' assertion that those documents actually expressed the solemn wish of a vast majority of the people."

All this needed no explanation; it was self-evident that we alluded to the scandalous performances of the Sabbatarians at the time they were trying to close the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday. To emphasize the fact which the Reformer seems to be so anxious to obscure, we again print some figures which we gave in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th: "The actual number of petitioners calling for the closing of the Fair on Sunday was 315,154; those protesting against closing numbered 300,000. The Sundayites claimed that 40,000,000 people had asked for Sunday closing; they attempted to substantiate this claim by offering to Congress petitions said to number 25,509,182. Here are a few samples of their rascality: Michigan has a population of 2,093,896; it was represented to hav sent 4,096,240 petitions.

The population of Ohio is 3,672,316; they said she sent 4,104,396 petitions. Pennsylvania's inhabitants number 5,258,014; the Sundayite petitions were pretended to bear the names of or to represent 15,552,473 people! Think of it! If every man, woman, and child, including new-born babes, in these three states had asked for Sunday closing the petitioners would hav been but 11,024,226. According to the good Sabbatarians, 23,753,109 names were secured in those states. In other words, there were 12,728,883 more alleged signatures or votes for Sunday closing than there were people of all ages in the states named."

In this connection we printed the remarks made by a Presbyterian minister, Rev. Mr. Cross, before a committee of Congress. Here they are again:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: The real object of my being here to speak a word is in favor of intellectual honesty on the part of the orthodox churches. I am a minister of an orthodox church. I notice in my territory that these church petitions are exceedingly delusiv as to the number of those that sign them or vote for them. Now, for example, in one instance in our state the Presbyterians passed a resolution, saying that we represent so many, aggregating a certain membership; and then the Christian Endeavor Society, composed of many of the same church-members alluded to by that Presbyterian church, will pass a like resolution and say we represent fifty, seventy, or one hundred members. And then it will be brought before the Sunday-school. And many of the persons who are counted as voting for the resolutions will hav been counted three, four, or five times; and it is almost on the principle of voting early and often, which is so much opposed in secular politics. I am a witness to this fact: There was one petition claiming to represent eighty church-members that signed the petition to Congress, but they were not present at all. It was at a Sunday-school, and the vote was taken by the Sunday-school superintendent, and there were children voted for these resolutions that were not old enough to know whether the expression 'World's Fair' meant the pretty girls in the next pew or the Columbian Exposition in Chicago."

Is there any room for doubt as to the species of political corruption that we meant had been caused or increased by the attempt to put Christian laws into our statute books? But more than this may justly be charged to the account of the theocrats. There can be no question that every such transaction as that to which the Sabbatarians and the members of Congress were parties must inevitably tend to the demoralization of all concerned. So in another sense it is true that the attempt of the theocratics to make their religious notions a part of the civil law has "contributed powerfully to the unmanning of politicians," notwithstanding the Reformer's assertion that such an averment is "arrant nonsense."

We shall consider this subject further next week.

Mr. Wise, His Trial, and the Preachers.

J. B. Wise attended the Leavenworth term of the federal court to answer to the charge of obscenity made against him at the instigation of Rev. H. B. Vennum for mailing the preacher a postal card on which was written a passage from the Bible, but the case was continued to the April term of the court at Topeka. While it would be a relief to Mr. Wise to hav the suit disposed of at once, the postponement will giv us time to reach the people with a statement of the facts and arguments on the merits of the prosecution and the implications of such a charge against the Bible.

Rev. S. D. Beegle has lately had two letters in the Clay Center Dispatch in which he has attempted to break the force of the Rev. Mr. Vennum's assault on the Bible. He says that if Mr. Vennum had "carefully studied the different translations of the Bible, and especially the revised version of 1881, he might hav avoided all this trouble and all this disgrace to the Bible, to the church, and to the religion of the Bible."

"In the revised version the objectionable words in the said passage are rendered, and no doubt correctly, in a way which leaves in them little, if anything, that is indelicate. Compare Clarke's Commentary, also that of Jamieson, Faucet, and Brown. For the only still remaining somewhat objectionable word, the latter commentary very properly proposes a perfectly proper word as a substitute. With these changes, the passages would be far less indelicate than many passages found in the criminal laws of every state in the union. In short, it would be a passage of which the most sensitiv nerves need not be afraid."

Mr. Beegle forgets that the authorized version is the one in common use, even in the church, and that Mr. Vennum may very properly retort that it is not his business to throw aside the version of his God's holy book which that God has permitted his children to use for two hundred and seventy years, and take up one which the spirit of modern skepticism forced the Protestant church to giv to the world without its being asked for by the masses of Protestant Christians. More than this, Mr. Vennum may well be justified in censuring his colleague for calling attention in this perilous time to the astonishing fact that the "Word of God" may be made decent or indecent by a council or conference of men who lay no claim to inspired wisdom and for whom the most zealous Christian would not assert inerrancy of judgment. Certainly Mr. Beegle has not helped the case for the Bible a bit by his learned intervention. Every such "defense" as his is an assault on the alleged divinity of the book.

In another letter Mr. Beegle admits that it is not easy at first sight to successfully meet Mr. Wise's contention that if he is to be punished because he sent one passage of the Bible through the mails then those who publish and scatter the Bible broadcast should be punished much more severely. But the preacher thinks that it should be remembered that the statute books of all the states contain language far more obscene than Isaiah xxxvi, 12, and that in the trial of criminal cases in our courts the lawyers are permitted to "put questions both to clients and witnesses, and that too in open court, before the crowds often, which are more obscene than the Bible passage referred to." All this may be true, but if the Bible should be non-prosecutable when it contains words which must be used in the statute books to define crime, and which lawyers must use in prosecuting persons accused of crime, why should not other books hav immunity from prosecution when they contain the same or similar words? Why should the Bible be privileged and reformatory and scientific books and papers be outlawed? E. H. Heywood's "Cupid's Yokes" and Dr. Knowlton's "Fruits of Philosophy" were serious works written to advance what their authors believed would be the progress of humanity, and yet nothing availed to save those pamphlets from condemnation or those who sold them from punishment. Why this discrimination?

We hav no desire to see Mr. Wise punished for doing what he had a perfect right to do, and neither are we fighting to shut the Bible out of the mails; we are demanding simply that the church shall cease its dictatorship and that the Bible shall not be permitted to go where modern humanitarian works are denied passage.

Mr. Wise was simply showing up the obscenity of the Bible, and to prevent his doing that the Christian preacher jumped on him. The Christians do not care that the Bible is obscene—they claim indeed that it is not—but when an Infidel shows that it is they put him in prison. It is to defend their book that they are striving to put Mr. Wise in jail—not for sending it through the mails, as they do that themselvs. They are striving to deter Infidels from attacking the Bible, and every Infidel should rally to defeat them. It would be a pretty thing if Christians can send the Bible smut through the mails and then put in prison every Infidel who points out that smut.

Injustice Does Not Pay.

The original constitution of Tennessee, like those of some other Southern states, provided that no minister or priest could be eligible to a seat in the legislature, and in the case of Tennessee the provision has stood through all the revisions of the constitution. In the "whereas" we find the reason for the inhibition. It is this: "The ministers of the gospel are, by their profession, dedicated to God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their functions." This sounds suspiciously like one of the favorit arguments against giving the ballot to woman. She ought not to "be diverted from the great duties" which her functions devolve upon her. The Chattanooga Times thinks that an amendment to the federal Constitution disqualifying ministers and priests for office would be promptly ratified by the Southern states without an exception. Curiously enough, the reason it assigns for the exclusion of this class of citizens from direct participation in law-making is the exact opposit of that given by the framers of the Tennessee constitution. It says that the real reason for the prohibition was "the Jeffersonian revolt against ministerial meddling in civil affairs." From this it would appear that that clause in the constitution was "writ sarcastic." The utter futility of discrimination against a class in the effort to safeguard the rights of the people was perhaps never more conclusivly shown than in this instance. The ministers of Tennessee were forbidden to help frame the laws of that state because it was feared that they might make an injurious use of their power if they were put upon an equality with their lay fellow-citizens. What is the result? Why, Tennessee is one of the most intolerant states in the Union, as witness the abominable persecution of the Adventists. What has proscription gained for freedom of conscience? Nothing, of course; it never does. It never pays to discriminate when framing constitutions and enacting laws. Partialism is unwise, dangerous, suicidal. No matter how plausible may be the arguments with which we justify, or try to justify, these political boycotts, they are sure to bring in their train greater evils than those they were designed to cure or prevent. Let the example of Tennessee be a warning to those who are just now fascinated with the Orange idea that it would be a fine stroke of policy to shut Catholics out of office and expatriate Catholic priests, perhaps even to disfranchise all of that faith. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," and every Catholic made to suffer in any way because he is a Catholic will be strengthened in his faith instead of alienated from it and his influence in its behalf will be tenfold greater than it was before. It seems absolutely incredible that this should for an instant fail to be self-evident to any Freethinker, and to every Freethinker.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is Out and Away.

All advance orders for Mr. Putnam's masterpiece of Freethought literature hav been filled, and now we are able to send out the book as it is ordered. Among the commendations of the Volume that hav already come to our desk are these:

"'Four Hundred Years of Freethought' received. I hav not had time to fully examin the work, but believe it is all you claim in the advertisment; and so far as the get-up of the book is concerned, it is side by side with Mr. C. P. Farrell's volume of Ingersoll's lectures, in my opinion. A. B. LENNOX."

"BOSTON, MASS., Oct, 10, 1894.

"I hav just received my copy of 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought,' and looked over all the pictures, and they are a very fine set of Freethinkers, men and women. I hav seen about forty of the originals, and testify that the portraits are good likenesses. I consider it an honor to be mentioned in such a book. I wish you may hav a hundred editions. HENRY N. STONE."

"MONTREAL, Oct. 12, 1894.

"I got 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought' yesterday, and was indeed surprised to see such a grand book. Every wide-awake Freethinker who can raise the money will be bound to hav it; for it is not only a complete outline of the progress of modern thought, but it is especially interesting to see the faces and know about the lives of the men and women whose writings we constantly read People pay fifty cents for a portrait of a celebrity, and here are one hundred and forty portraits, most of them printed in a high style of art, $70 worth, and more besides! All for $5! Comrade Putnam deserves great praise for this tremendous effort, wonderfully well done in so short a time. His power of description and narration is marvelous; he is one of the most forcible and yet ornate writers of our time. The publishers, too, are entitled to much commendation for their share of the work. "R. C. A."

As will be seen by reference to our advertisments on our 1st and 2d pages, we are making some very favorable offers in connection with this book.

"Camilla" is informed that no attention is paid to anonymous manuscripts. All articles intended for publication must be accompanied by the real name of the writer. Of course any initial or nom de plume may be attached to the article, but the author's name must be made known to the editor.

Four New Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty-five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also in press, and will be ready soon. The price of each will be twenty-five cents. They will be printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. Every one will want copies of these splendid addresses, and orders may be sent to us at once, and will be filled as soon as we get the books from the publisher.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents.

"Is it not time to stop tinkering with the Bible and treat it as a book commanding respect, reverence, and obedience?"—The Presbyterian.

The time has come to stop worshiping the Bible and to treat it as all other books should be treated—accept the truths it contains, reject what is not true, and hold the judgment in suspension regarding what is doubtful.

It will no doubt interest all Freethinkers to learn that the pious and pestiferous Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, who is again a candidate for United States Senator, has been indorsed by the American Protectiv Association of his state. Inasmuch as Blair is one of the most conspicuous supporters of various church-and-state schemes, while the association named claims to stand for the divorce of politics and religion, the action of the New Hampshire councils will no doubt induce serious thought in the minds of a few people of Liberal views.

W. Holman Hunt, the artist, in his presidential address to the Sunday Society of England, suggested that Jesus Christ, were he living in Christendom to-day, would advise his disciples to visit the museums on Sunday. Merely observing in passing that if the people of the world had heeded his injunction to take no thought for the morrow, there would be no museums for anybody to visit on any day, it should be said that it makes little difference what Jesus or Julius Cæsar would think about the matter. What is essential is this: Would the Sunday opening of museums and other places where useful information and pleasant entertainment can be found be conduciv to the physical, intellectual, and moral well-being of the people? There can be no doubt that it would. That settles the question, regardless of the supposititious opinion of some ancient citizen who never heard of a museum or of an art gallery.

The Christian Reformer, referring to the current story of the group of Senators who did not know where to look in the Bible for the Sermon on the Mount, remarks:

"Think of men being sent to the United States Senate who know so little of the Bible! It is not likely they would put much of the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount in their legislation."

If they should set out to put in practice the principles of that discourse they would at once abolish the judicial oath. How would that suit the pious people who think they cannot tell the truth unless they swear to it? The Senators would also set themselvs against all laws for the collection of debt and all laws punishing kidnaping. The Senate would dismiss its chaplain, for he prays in the public place where and because he may be "seen of men." It would adopt a resolution protesting against the accumulation of property or the doing of anything involving taking thought for the days to come, and to harmonize its action with its words it would cease to legislate and the Senators would renounce their salaries and hereafter look to their heavenly father for their food, raiment, and shelter. If to be a Christian one must put in practice the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount there is not a Christian in the world to-day.

The Dakota gentleman who thinks that the mythical miraculous preservation of the three Hebrew children gave God a license to burn to death the five hundred people who perished in the forest fires in the Northwest this year may be pleased to hear that the same "merciful Providence" has just killed nine Hebrew children in this city by throwing an unfinished factory down upon the tenements in which they resided. As all Christians who are familiar with the Bible are aware, God long since solved the problem of aerial navigation, and in old times was occasionally seen flying "on the wings of the wind." Well, on the morning of October 10th he came along on the hurricane which swept over this city and picked up an eight-story brick building, and with it killed the nine Hebrew children mentioned, members of the Steinman, Korones, and Abrahams families. He had just counted the hairs of their heads, as is his wont.

The United States Government is run by the Christian church. Because Postmaster Hesing of Chicago was going to hav a parade of the carriers of the city—with their cheerful consent—on Sunday, the preachers raised a great fuss and sent in a protest to the department at Washington, and they of Chicago were reinforced by the priests in other parts of the country. The department surrendered and countermanded the parade. The insolence of these preachers is simply intolerable. Let the people tell them that it is none of their business what the letter carriers do with their time when off duty. The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write to Postmaster-General Bissell, at Washingtion, D. C., in protest against this interference with Postmaster Hesing and the carriers of Chicago at the dictation of men who want to make all the people of the country believe as they believe or pretend to believe.

We do not know whether the Mennonites love their enemies, as Jesus commanded his disciples to do, but it seems that there are some of that sect who are willing to be robbed for the glory of God. A press dispatch tells us that on October 8th, in Manor township, near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, the house of Christian Witner, a Mennonite, was entered by burglars and several thousand dollars, which Mr. Witner had just drawn from the bank, was stolen. The Mennonites do not countenance war or civic contention, and consequently Mr. Witner had no weapons in the house and so was an easy victim. Wishing to avoid all "civic contention," the family did not acquaint the authorities with their loss and the officials did not hear of it until the 10th. Now the Witners are worried because there is likely to be trouble about the matter. We sincerely hope that no Christian or latitudinarian panegyrist of the Sermon on the Mount will make fun of this good Mennonite family.

The National Reformers and other people of that ilk are very strongly impressed with the idea that the kingdom of God will be in a fair way to be realized on earth if only they can get a recognition of their peculiar religious notions into the Constitution and rigid Sunday laws written in the national and state statute books. Their childlike faith in the saving grace of brute force reminds Rev. E. M. Wheelock, of Austin, Texas, of a bright little five-year-old girl who wanted her mother to adopt as a playmate for her a boy baby who had been left an orphan. Its parents were Jews. The mother was averse to such an arrangement and thought she could settle the matter for good by saying: "But, Mabel, he is a Jew, and you wouldn't hav a Jew for your little brother, would you?" Mabel considered the question for a moment, and then said: "No, mamma, I wouldn't; but can't you spank him and make him believe in Christ?" The Covenanters want to spank all the Freethinkers, Jews, and Adventists in the country.

We in America are a free people; we love liberty, in the abstract; we laud it in the papers, and shout praises of it from the political stumps and Fourth of July rostrums, but this is the way we allow an illiterate old man to lead us around by our auricular appendages. The story is told in the Times of this city:

"Anthony Comstock, the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, had a lively argument yesterday with J. A. Wood, who, in company with Edward Paisle, is the publisher of a series of pamphlets which are being sold by the street pedlers.

"Mr. Comstock met Wood in Ann street. He began the conversation by asking where Wood published the books. Wood replied that they were printed in Philadelphia.

"Mr. Comstock ordered the publisher to take the books off the wagons, telling him that they were unfit to put before young people.

"'Young man,' said Mr. Comstock, 'are you aware that you are violating the law?'

"'No,' replied Mr. Wood. 'Judge O'Brien handed down a decision that the books were not obscene.'

"'Judge O'Brien's decision is not worth the paper it is written on,' retorted Comstock.

"'You can take your choice,' said Comstock. 'Either take those books from the street or go to court and defend yourself. I advise you to take them off, as you hav no defense to make.' Wood said he would hav them taken off, and the argument ended."

"And the argument ended"! Why shouldn't it end to Comstock's complete satisfaction when the agent of such a society can snap his fingers with perfect impunity in the face of a judge of the Supreme Court of the state? Our dictator grows more and more arrogant as the years go by and the hand of justice continues to do injustice at his command. Occasionally a judge snubs him, but he does not care so very much for that, for he is convinced that a man who can hav his own way, as he does, nineteen times out of twenty, is extremely lucky, as things go in this world. And he is right.

It is a quite common error to suppose that the majority is justified in suppressing by force whatever they imagin is productiv of bad results Indeed, this is the mistaken idea most frequently entertained by people who otherwise think with more than average clearness. The church has always acted in accordance with this view, and the result is that she has been the most cruel and destructiv power that has ruled and desolated humanity. Freethought is the protest of common sense, science, mercy, justice, and liberty against this baleful delusion. The sole legitimate function of enacted law is the protection of the personal and property rights of the individual. When it goes beyond that it becomes crime and invites disaster. There is no justification in ethics or statesmanship for the attempted suppression of the propaganda of any creed. At rare intervals some misguided Infidel suggests that it would be well to forbid the preaching of Christian doctrins because the preaching and acceptance of those doctrins often produce evil fruits. Such people seem to forget that for Freethinkers to advocate the regulation of belief by law is suicidal. If it would be right and expedient for us, were we in the majority, to make the teaching of principles—for instance, the infamous dogma of hell-fire, or the other miserable doctrins taught at revivals—which we think harmful a crime to be punished by the state, why would not the present majority be at perfect liberty to make the teaching of principles which they think harmful a crime to be punished by the state? If the lack of power is all that prevents us attempting the suppression by force of the Christian religion, what warrant hav we to complain if the Christians act upon the hint we giv them and suppress Freethought by force? Were the Demands of Liberalism formulated and is the fight for Secularism waged only because we are at present in the position of the under dog, and are we to prove false to all our high professions when we get on top? If that is our program the Christians would be fully justified, reasoning as a certain Western paper does, in exterminating us at once. Any Liberal journal that takes the position herein criticised plays directly into the hands of the theocratic reactionists.

An Autobiographical Sketch of Paine.

Moncure D. Conway sends to the New York Evening Post an unpublished letter by Thomas Paine, with an introductory note as follows:

SIR: The subjoined autobiographical sketch by Thomas Paine appears to me of great interest. It was inclosed in a letter of January 14, 1779, written from Philadelphia to the Hon. Henry Laurens. Paine had resigned his office as secretary of the Committee of Foreign Affairs on January 8, on account of the controversy with Silas Deane, and Laurens had resigned the presidency of Congress in connection with the same matter. The letter was probably written at Laurens's request; it is hastily written, and its egotism should be read with the reflection that it was a private letter to Paine's most intimate friend. After slumbering long among the papers of Mr. George Bancroft, this interesting document found its way into the possession of the Lenox Library. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

PAINE'S LETTER TO LAURENS.

SIR: For your amusement I giv you a short history of my conduct since I hav been in America.

I brought with me letters of introduction from Dr. Franklin. These letters were with a flying seal, that I might, if I thought proper, close them with a wafer. One was to Mr. Bache of this city. The terms of Dr. Franklin's recommendation were "a worthy, ingenious, etc." My particular design was to establish an academy on the plan they are conducted in and about London, which I was well acquainted with.[1] I came some months before Dr. Franklin, and waited here for his arrival. In the meantime a person of this city desired me to giv him some assistance in conducting a magazine, which I did without making any bargain.[2] The work turned out very profitable. Dr. Witherspoon had likewise a concern [in] it. At the end of six months I thought it necessary to come to some contract. I agreed to leave the matter to arbitration. The bookseller mentioned two on his own part—Mr. Duchee, your late chaplain, and Mr. Hopkinson. I agreed to them and declined mentioning any on my part. But the bookseller getting information of what Mr. Duchee's private opinion was, withdrew from the arbitration, or rather refused to go into it, as our agreement to abide by it was only verbal. I was requested by several literary gentlemen of this city to undertake such a work on my own account, and I could hav rendered it very profitable.

As I always had a taste to science, I naturally had friends of that cast in England, and among the rest George Lewis Scott, esq., through whose formal introduction, my first acquaintance with Dr. Franklin commenced.[3] I esteem Mr. Scott as one of the most amiable characters I know of, but his particular situation had been, that in the minority of the present King he was his sub-preceptor, and from the occasional traditionary accounts yet remaining in the family of Mr. Scott, I obtained the true character of the present King from his childhood upwards, and, you may naturally suppose, of the present ministry. I saw the people of this country were all wrong, by an ill-placed confidence. After the breaking out of hostilities I was confident their design was a total conquest. I wrote to Mr. Scott in May, 1775, by Capt. James Josiah, now in this city. I read the letter to him before I closed it. I used in it this free expression: "Surely the ministry are all mad; they never will be able to conquer America." The reception which the last petition of Congress met with put it past a doubt that such was their design, on which I determined with myself to write the pamphlet [Common] Sense. As I knew the time of the Parliament meeting, and had no doubt what sort of a king's speech it would produce, my contrivance was to hav the pamphlet come out just at the time the speech might arrive in America, and so fortunate was I in this cast of policy that both of them made their appearance in this city on the same day.[4] The first edition was printed by Bell on the recommendation of Dr. Rush. I gave him the pamphlet on the following conditions: That if any loss should arise I would pay it—and in order to make him industrious in circulating it, I gave him one-half the profits, if it should produce any I gave a written order to Col. Joseph Dean and Capt. Thos. Prior, both of this city, to receive the other half, and lay it out for mittens for the troops that were going to Quebec. I did this to do honor to the cause. Bell kept the whole, and abused me into the bargain. The prize he set upon them was two shillings. I then enlarged the pamphlet with an appendix and an address to the Quakers, which made it one-third bigger than before, printed 6,000 at my own expense, 3,000 by B. Towne, 3,000 by Cist & Steyner, and delivered them ready stitched and fit for sale to Mr. Bradford at the coffee-house; and though the work was thus increased, and consequently should hav borne a higher price, yet, in order that it might produce the general service I wished, I confined Mr. Bradford to sell them at only one shilling each, or tenpence by the dozen, and to enable him to do this with sufficient advantage to himself, I let him hav the pamphlets at 8½d. Pennsylvania currency each.

The sum of 8½d. each was reserved to defray the expense of printing, paper, advertising, etc., and such as might be given away. The state of the account at present is that I am £39 11s. out of pocket, being the difference between what I hav paid for printing, etc., and what I hav received from Bradford. He has a sufficiency in his hands to balance with and clear me, which is all I aimed at, but by his unaccountable dilatoriness and unwillingness to settle accounts, I fear I shall be obliged to sustain a real loss exclusiv of my trouble.

I think the importance of that pamphlet was such that if it had not appeared, and that at the exact time it did, the Congress would not now hav been sitting where they are. The light which that performance threw upon the subject gave a turn to the politics of America which enabled her to stand her ground. Independence followed in six months after it, although before it was published it was a dangerous doctrin to speak of, and that because it was not understood.

In order to accommodate that pamphlet to every man's purchase and to do honor to the cause, I gave up the profits I was justly entitled to, which in this city only would at the usual price of books [hav] produced me £1,000 at that time o'day, besides what I might hav made by extending it to other states. I gave permission to the printers in other parts of this state to print it on their own account. I believe the number of copies printed and sold in America was not short of 150,000—and is the greatest sale that any performance ever had since the use of letters, exclusiv of the great run it had in England and Ireland.

The doctrin of that book was opposed in the public newspapers under the signature of Cato, who, I believe, was Dr. Smith,[5] and I was sent for from New York to reply to him, which I did, and happily with success. My letters are under the signature of "The Forrester." It was likewise opposed in a pamphlet signed "Plain Truth," but the performance was too weak to do any hurt or deserve any answer. In July following the publication of "Common Sense" the Associators of this state[6] marched to Amboy under the command of General Roberdeau. The command was large, yet there was no allowance for a secretary. I offered my service voluntarily, only that my expenses should be paid, and all the charge I put General Roberdeau to was $48; although he frequently pressed me to make free with his private assistance. After the associators returned I went to Fort Lee, and continued with Gen. [Nathaniel] Greene till the evacuation.

A few days after our army had crossed the Delaware on the 8th of December, 1776, I came to Philadelphia on public service, and seeing the deplorable and melancholy condition the people were in, afraid to speak and almost to think, the public presses stopped, and nothing in circulation but fears and falsehoods, I sat down, and in what I may call a passion of patriotism, wrote the first number of the Crisis. It was published on the 19th of December, which was the very blackest of times, being before the taking of the Hessians at Trenton I gave that piece to the printer gratis, and confined him to the price of two coppers, which was sufficient to defray his charge.

I then published the second number, which, being as large again as the first number, I gave it to him on the condition of his taking only four coppers each. It contained sixteen pages.

I then published the third number, containing thirty two pages, and gave it to the printer, confining him to ninepence.

When the account of the battle of Brandywine got to this city, the people were again in a state of fear and dread. I immediately wrote the fourth number [of the Crisis]. It contained only four pages, and as there was no less money than the sixth of dollars in general circulation, which would hav been too great a price, I ordered four thousand to be printed at my own private charge and given away.

The fifth number I gave Mr. Dunlap, at Lancaster. He, very much against my consent, set half a crown upon it; he might hav done it for a great deal less. The sixth and seventh numbers I gave in the papers. The seventh number would hav made a pamphlet of twenty-four pages, and brought me in $3,000 or $4,000 in a very few days, at the price which it ought to hav borne.

Monies received since I hav been in America:

Salary for 17 months at 70 dollars per month(7)	1,190 dollars
For rations and occasional assistance at Fort Lee	141 ditto
For defraying the expense of a journey from East Town round by Moriss when secretary to the Indian Commission(8), and some other matters, about 140 or 145 dollars	145 ditto
Total of public money	1,476

In the spring, 1776, some private gentleman, thinking it was too hard that I should, after giving away my profits for a public good, be money out of pocket, on account of some expense I was put to—sent me by the hands of Mr. Christopher Marshall 108 dollars.

You hav here, sir, a faithful history of my services and my rewards.

More About Suicide.

The question of the right of suicide from the Christian standpoint involves the greater question of God's providence and his claims upon man; or, stated generally, the question whether God has asserted any rights on earth that man is bound to respect. His self-appointed mouthpieces hav for ages maintained that he has. First, as, they aid, he made man in his own image and then commanded that that image should be respected and not marred. (Gen. ix, 6.) Next was the notion of God's government over these images of himself—his providence, as it is called; a "smiling providence" if the images were doing well and meriting his approbation; or a "frowning providence" if they had been misbehaving and were undergoing disciplin and punishment. Such calamities as personal accidents and sickness, destructiv storms, floods, lightning, pestilence, and all such unmanageable agencies were reckoned as the "acts of God," and meant for punishment when he is in the frowning humor. The necessity to labor for a living was also regarded as a curse pronounced on mankind for the sin of Adam (Gen. iii, 19).

Then the notion logically following these assumptions was that it was an act of presumption and rebellion to attempt to thwart the designs of God by trying to prevent the calamities he meant to inflict. Thus, if a man were sick it was rulable to ask God to cure him, but a sin for him to take medicin with a view of curing himself. King Asa was supposed to hav suffered for this sin—of seeking "to the physicians" instead of to the Lord (2 Chron. xvi, 12). During the Middle Ages the church discountenanced physic and habitually attempted to control all sickness and pestilence by prayer and ceremony. When lightning rods were first introduced in France they were denounced by the church as impious because designed to thwart the will of God in steering the thunderbolt.

For a long time all sorts of invention calculated to save labor was looked upon by the "rigid righteous" as the work of the devil and designed to nullify God's curse.

About fifty years ago a very pious old farmer lived in Ohio, who had accepted God's curse of labor in good faith and never tried to shirk or take any easy ways. He always cut his grain with a sickle. But finally, when he was no longer able to work, one season he sent for his grandsons to come and cut his field of wheat. He spied them coming, each carrying a grain "cradle," which was then a new-fangled invention. He hastened to meet them and forbade them from taking the sacrilegious implements into his field. "Boys," said he, "my grain may fall down and rot, but it shall never be cut by those inventions of the devil." But all this is changed. The more advanced of God's friends and spokesmen hav renounced for him all claim upon human suffering and misfortune. They allow man to invent and discover to his heart's content, and apply his discoveries to the entire nullification of all of God's providences so far as they are hostil to his peace and comfort. They concede that God takes no delight in seeing men suffer, and enters no protest against the use of anæsthetics to make him insensible to pain. The preacher himself will not hesitate to take odontunder when a tooth is to be pulled, or chloroform when a leg is to be sawed off. The more advanced agree with the evolutionist that man was not created in the image of God but in the image of a monkey; and that he has been slowly growing into an image of what a God ought to be ever since, by reason of these very inventions that put him in a position to get the most satisfaction out of his environment. Now where can they logically stop in these concessions to man? Nowhere. If he has a right to take chloroform or morphine to escape his suffering, why has he not the right to use the more effectual remedy of suicide? If God wants a man to suffer, he has no right to take chloroform; if he does not want him to suffer he must hav the right of suicide, if that is the only way of escape.

If a man is sick with an agonizing and fatal disease, the doctor does not hesitate to put him under the influence of opiates, and when one dose wears out and the man becomes sensible of his misery again, he givs him another, and if necessary, keeps it up a week or a month, or until the patient dies; and everyone—preachers and all—agree it is right. That is, the mind of the patient is killed and his body left to die of the disease. What a man may employ a doctor to do for him he has a right to do for himself, if he can. That is, he has a right to destroy his mind in order to abolish intolerable agony. This involves his right to destroy the body too, since a body without a mind is functionless and worse than useless to anybody, and so the operation that destroys the mind practically destroys the body.

All our rights are held subject to and limited by the rights of others. So that in any given case, whether suicide is right or not, depends upon circumstances. The desire of one to escape the ills of life must be balanced against the claims that others may hav upon him. And here, if anywhere, is the place for the state to put in its interference. And since it takes an interest in the birth of citizens by endeavoring to insure each one a licensed and legitimate entrance into the world, it might not appear so very illogical if it should seek to regulate his voluntary exit. So, for the consideration of those states that, like New York, wish to interfere with suicide, I suggest, with more or less seriousness, the following regulations:

First. Any person desirous of committing suicide must first apply to the Probate Court for a license.

Second. The Probate Court shall examin the candidate with respect to his sanity, and if he is insane, he shall be sent to a lunatic asylum, where, in the course of time, he will be killed by kindness.

Third. If the candidate is sane the court shall ascertain whether he has posted his books and left his accounts in intelligible shape, and insured his life.

Fourth. The court shall ascertain what use the candidate is to his friends, whether they giv their consent, and whether it is possible to find a remedy in life for the troubles the candidate is endeavoring to escape. If the court finds it to be the man's duty to liv he must refuse the license, otherwise he must grant it. But the chances are that by this time the candidate will hav become sufficiently disgusted to be willing to liv a while longer. But if not, then

Fifth. He is to be given his license and sent to the morgue, where apartments are to be fitted up for suicides' use, and furnished with razors, pistols, ropes, a tank of deep water, a choice collection of poisons, and all the necessary implements for a quick and licensed exit.

Everything being done thus, "decently and in order," the state ought to be satisfied.

God's claims to the life and sufferings of a man having been set aside, the only other claims are those of his fellow-men. It takes two sides to make a binding bargain. Whether a man owes society anything depends on what society has done or is willing to do for him. If she wants him to liv it is her duty to make his life tolerable, otherwise he is not morally obliged to liv on his own account. A man belongs to himself except to the extent that he has by his own act bound himself to others. And he is not bound to accept life on terms imposed by others, and to which he has not given his consent.

He is by nature introduced to life with susceptibilities and feelings that imply a promis of conditions to giv him happiness. It is only when this promis is performed that he is under obligation to accept existence, and the performance in itself insures his cordial acceptance of it; while its nonperformance givs him both the right and the incentiv to reject it.

JAS. B. ALEXANDER.

The goodness of God is fully demonstrated in the story of how he allowed the devil to destroy "my servant Job's" property, kill his family, and finally cover him with boils.

My Religion.

I believe in the nobility of human life. I believe in the sacredness of human happiness. I believe in the divinity of human love. I believe in the religion of this world. I believe in freedom. I believe in liberty. I believe in right. I believe in truth. I believe in goodness. I believe in kindness. I believe in gladness. I believe in blessedness. I want to see everybody happy. I believe in comfort. I believe in contentment. I believe in joy. I believe in the holiness of the human smile. I believe in the sanctity of human laughter. I pity the unfortunate possessor of a long religious face. I do not believe in Jehovahs and Satans, and gods and devils and angels and demons and heavens and hells and New Jerusalems and purgatories. I believe in men, women, and children, in the universe, this world, the earth, in America, the United States, in you and in myself. I think more of my mother, my brother, and myself than I do of any trinity above the clouds. I like my fellow-men. I like this world. It is good enough for me. I like the way we are progressing. We are getting better every day. Hatred, ignorance, selfishness, and intolerance are giving way to love, education, liberality, and justice. Nearly everybody in this world has ideas of his own. People are beginning to open their eyes. They are doing their own thinking. Every man's brain is his church. Doubt and unbelief are gaining ground. Christianity has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Science is bringing light. Mankind is on the upward march. Error is dying. Truth is rising. The world is getting better every hour.

I believe in that love that binds man to man, and strews along the pathway of every individual the tenderest flowers of the sweetest perfume. I like the big-heartedness of the great majority of our people. I am glad that love can find a home in almost every breast.

I like the order and nature of things in this world. I like all the seasons of the year. I like winter. I like summer. I like the snow and the ice. I like the birds and the flowers, and the trees and the grass. I like the good, the great, and the beautiful. I like to read Shakspere's plays and Hugo's novels, and I thank them for their works. I like the music we hav in this world, and I thank the great composers. I like the way Remenyi plays the violin. I like to hear men and women sing. I like the common-sense we hav here. I like to hear Ingersoll lecture. There is enough of the good, the great, and the beautiful on this earth to fill every soul with rapture through all eternity. I like everything that tends to increase human happiness. And I believe it is the duty of every man to add to the pleasures of every other man. This is the life to enjoy. Now is the time, and right here is the place, to be happy. This is the only life we are sure of. If we are not happy here we may never be. He that saves his life may never lose it, but he that loses his life may never find it. It is not necessary that we should believe in a future state. It is only necessary that we should believe in a present one. It is not enough that men should exist, they should liv noble, sublime lives. It is not necessary to be miserable here in order to be happy hereafter.

If there is a savior we will all be saved. There is no doubt about it.

I pity every human being that believes in punishment. I know how it is. I know how to sympathize. I hav been through the mill. I hav experienced the fears and dreads that arise from such a belief. But, thanks to common sense and a tender heart, I hav waded out of the swamps of superstition. I hav accepted humanity as my religion, and at its altar I shall worship. I can never bow my head to Israel's God, nor bend my knee to the author of hell. I can never believe in a religion that fills the human breast with sorrow, that causes the hearts of children to ache with fear, that makes death a demon and the dying man his victim. I can never believe in a religion that separates husband and wife—mother and child. I can never believe in a religion that cursed the human race with war.

I can never believe in a religion that has caused bloodshed and crime. I can never believe in a religion that has deprived any human being of one iota of happiness. But I can and do believe in a religion that has for its aim the welfare of the whole human family. The holiest and most sacred, the grandest and the highest, the purest and the noblest sentiment that man can feel is that which can hav its abode only in the tenderest of hearts—love for humanity. What is more excellent than to love mankind? What is more worthy of man's love than man? To love is to be charitable. To love is to be benevolent. To love is to be liberal. But without love neither charity, nor benevolence, nor liberality can exist. To love them is to help, and to help humanity is the noblest work of man. So I believe in the religion of love than which there can be none more magnificent—none more sublime. Love is the brightest star that shines in the sky of the human heart. It is the loftiest tree that rocks and bends in the forest of affections. It is the most beautiful rose that buds and blossoms in the flower garden of human sentiments. It is the lily of the valley—the human soul's bright sun. It is king of kings, and lord of lords. It is over and above everything else. "It is the greatest thing in the world."

Without love there could be no joy—no happiness—no summer—no sunshine—no rapture—no ecstasy. All would be black hate. Boys could not play. Birds could not sing. Flowers could not bloom. The beautiful could not exist.

Love has made men work. It has built homes. It has tilled the soil. It has raised stock. It has sent boys and girls to school. It has made men and women. It has done more for this world than all the gods of all religions, of all lands and of all times. It has made human life worth living. It has changed bitter to sweet—rough to smooth—long to short—pain to pleasure—sorrow to happiness. It has made men and women good and great, tender, kind, and just.

Upon what foundation does society rest? From what beginning hav all reformations sprung? Upon what base do all good laws stand? From what origin hav all beliefs developed? I answer, love. Not love for God, but love for man. Love for the good, the great, the beautiful, and the true.

In superstition's night, under the bloody hand of intolerance, surrounded by thumbscrews and racks, by fagots and stakes, by dogmas and ropes, by wheels and prisons, standing in the shadow of death, the brave men, the good men, the heretics, the Infidels who loved principle better than policy, dared to speak the truth on the side of right. They had the courage to face the threats of gods and men. They feared fire neither on earth nor in hell. And why? Because they loved the right. They died that truth might liv because they loved their fellow-men.

Happiness is the only good. Humanity is the only religion. Home is the only heaven. Husband, wife, and children are the only angels. Love is the only god. And all I ask, and all I hope for, is to be blessed with such a good—to enjoy a belief in such a religion—to liv in such a heaven—to be surrounded by such angels, and to be watched over by such a god.

C. W. WILLIAMS.

Springfield, Mo.

Two J. C.'s.

It is often said that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is as well attested as the death of Julius Cæsar. It ought to be as the supernatural prodigies said to hav accompanied that tragedy, when—

> The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead
> Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets.

Professor J. A. Froude, in a "Plea for the Free Discussion of Theological Difficulties," which he wrote in Fraser's Magazine, and which is republished in his "Short Studies on Great Subjects," thus disposes of the rash contention: "Julius Cæsar was killed in a public place, in the presence of friend and foe, in a remarkable but still perfectly natural manner. The circumstances were minutely known to all the world, and were never denied or doubted by anyone. Our Lord, however, seems purposely to hav withheld such public proof of his resurrection as would hav left no room for unbelief. He showed himself, 'not to all the people'—not to his enemies, whom his appearance would hav overwhelmed—but 'to witnesses chosen before;' to the circle of his own friends. There is no evidence which a jury could admit that he was ever actually dead. So unusual was it for persons crucified to die so soon, that Pilate, we are told, 'marveled.' The subsequent appearances were strange, and scarcely intelligible. Those who saw him did not recognize him till he was made known to them in the breaking of bread. He was visible and invisible. He was mistaken by those who were most intimate with him for another person; nor do the accounts agree which are given by the different Evangelists. Of investigation in the modern sense (except in the one instance of St. Thomas, and St. Thomas was rather rebuked than praised) there was none, and could be none. The evidence offered was different in kind, and the blessing was not to those who satisfied themselvs of the truth of the fact by a searching inquiry, but who gave their assent with the unhesitating confidence of love."—London Freethinker.

COLONEL INGERSOLL will lecture at the Star Theater, New York, on the evening of November 11th. Subject, "The Holy Bible." This is his new discourse, and shakes up orthodoxy as only he can do it.

Observations.

If that Voltaire of the present century, Theron C. Leland, could hav lived a few years longer—long enough to read the discussion on "Woman's Sphere" recently occupying the columns of the San Francisco Examiner—he would hav enjoyed a pleasure which was denied him. He would hav seen one of his children following his trail over the field of reform with a footstep as light, an eye as keen, and an air as jaunty as his own. For some years the reading public has known Lilian Leland as the author of a book of travels around the world, but she has not until the present time taken up her pen to write radical articles. When I resided in San Francisco Lilian was not a reformer. She saw no reason why the ideas of people should be disturbed, though erroneous. While an ardent admirer of her distinguished father, she was wont to maintain, against my own strenuous opposition, that he exercised himself unduly over the follies of the world and the falsities of its beliefs. In San Francisco especially, she held, there was no call for advanced doctrin. Perhaps that sandy city has grown conservativ since those days; at any rate, Lilian has become a reformer. She has joined an Equal Rights League, and as one of a committee appeared before a convention of male politicians to present the claims of women as citizens and voters. Her reception there, which to one as engaging as herself could not fail to be cordial, gave her courage, and when that old chestnut, "Is Homelife Women's Limit?" came up for discussion in the papers she was decidedly in it. I hav read a good deal about the sphere of woman, but Lilian has hit upon a definition of it that must stand forever because it is all-inclusiv. "Woman's sphere, indeed," she says; "the sphere of woman is this terrestrial globe." Having proceeded thus far with unprecedented success, Lilian now takes the third degree, and the last Examiner to hand contains a report of one of her public speeches. She is not among those who are afraid to tell things exactly as they are. The following words are pervaded with solemn, but hitherto unuttered truth:

A woman can stand at the washtub all day without being in the slightest degree unsexed. It does not unsex her to chop wood, carry coal, dig potatoes, or harness a horse. She can work until midnight and start in the next day for another sixteen hours' work, and be just as womanly as possible all the time. A woman can do anything that she has to do. Human endurance is the only limit she knows. It is cruel to fling into the face of the broken-hearted victim of man's perfidy the heartless taunt, It was her own fault. As a matter of fact, the women who are neglected are generally the sweet-tempered, docil, devoted wives who hav no interests beyond their homes, their husbands, and their children. They make the easiest victims. A domineering woman with a lively sense of her own rights and decided temper doesn't get imposed on very much.

The autobiographical sketch of Paine which Mr. Conway has just rowsed out of unmerited obscurity is calculated to underscore the statement made by Colonel Ingersoll at New Rochelle last Decoration Day, to the effect that "Paine was the best intellectual marksman of his time." Paine says: "As I knew the time of the Parliament meeting, and had no doubt what sort of a King's speech it would produce, my contrivance was to hav the pamphlet ["Common Sense"] come out just at the time the speech might arrive in America." Did he hit the target? He did; he scored a bull's eye. The author proceeds, "And so fortunate was I in this cast of policy that both of them made their appearance in this city on the same day." When newspaper "scoops" are under discussion, this one should not be lost sight of. It was and remains pre eminent.

If the reader, now made acquainted with Paine's purpose in writing "Common Sense," turns to that work and studies it, he will recognize off-hand that it is not a reply to King George's extended remarks. To hav reasoned with the king at that time would be like arguing with a judge after sentence is pronounced. Paine knew a trick of the value of two of that in the American court. He denied the jurisdiction of His Royal Idiotcy over the colonies, and of all kings over any people, and King George's speech, on the day after it arrived, was not worth what it cost the tax-payers to hav it engrossed and framed for presentation. The goosequill that Paine fixed up with a jackknife costing one shilling collided with the expensiv scepter of the leading monarch of those days, and made it look like the busted booms we see in the candidate's backyard after the vox populi has been heard. As a sensation the king's address fell in the soup. The newspapers condensed it to a stickful of nonpareil and printed it among the estray notices, while extracts from "Common Sense" were leaded with shooting-sticks and 48-point furniture and inserted on the local page. Paine kept jabbing away, pointing his observations with texts and italics and capitals, until the king could not find a paper on this side of the Atlantic that would accept his articles, although he had read them to his friends and they advised him to hav them published. At the same time Washington's soldiers were subsisting on bacon and baking powder bread and eating snow to relieve the sour stomach. Between meals they fought in the Revolutionary war and made notes of incidents for veterans of the Civil conflict to relate when recalling their personal experience at post meetings of the G. A. R. When they needed literature to offset the effects of the snow, Paine gave them hot stuff in the Crisis, which they used for wads, discharging the same at the rumps of retreating redcoats and Hessians. Several patriots remarked that they would never hav rammed their powder home without that wadding. They did not inquire into the religious belief of Mr. Paine.

These are the inferences I draw from Paine's autobiographical sketch. It would be interesting to know why Mr George Bancroft so long kept the matter from the public; also whether other historians equally distinguished for piety hav felt it their duty to make similar concealments. The work of bringing Thomas Paine before the world in the bright light of truth goes on with the persistency of a natural process; and, as the author-hero said concerning another matter, what it lacks in speed is supplied by time.

They say that when a man grows up
  Of no account to foe or friend,
He's justified, with steel or cup,
  In making of himself an end.
When times were dull and days were dark
I've felt the force of that remark.

When pessimist talks doleful truth,
  And his conclusions I perpend,
Life seems illusion, and in sooth
  I hav no doubt that mine should end.
If reason I were asked to giv,
I could not tell you why I liv.

Why should I linger? Let's reflect:
  I wrote this day some jolly squibs;
I'd like to notice their effect
  On the hilarious reader's ribs.
Perchance 'tis best to pause a bit,
And see how many folks they hit.

Then there's that little chap of mine—
  Last week we "put him into pants"—
Though tired of life, I sometimes pine
  To know what Fortune, Fate, or Chance
Reserves for him. Who'd guide him right
If I passed in my checks to-night?

His mother, too; when we got tied
  I asked, as 'twere to hide my joy,
"Forever, sweetheart?" She replied,
"I'll always and always love my boy."
Think you she told it to me straight?
To test that matter I will wait.

The sunset givs to close of day
  Peculiar beauties all its own;
They are not seen by noon, and they
  To fairest morn were never known.
So may the close of life be blest
And who dies young miss all the best.

The English Secularist has more fortitude, or assurance, or nerve, or sand, than his American brother. Otherwise Mr. Charles Watts would not be standing for an electiv office on a Secular platform. They "stand" over there, while with us the candidate runs. The purpose of each, however, is to get there. But to return to Mr. Watts; he is candidate for a seat on the London school board, and is making the canvass as though he expected to be successful. His platform is the inculcation of sound morality and the promotion of education free from religious teaching or Bible reading—a declaration of principles that would defeat him for election or even nomination in almost any American community, and I notice that in England he is an independent candidate. Here he would hav against him all Protestants, including members of the American Protectiv Association, who would reject any man not an anti Catholic bigot; and all Catholics, who, though they might not complain of his platform, would vote for the man most likely to make a failure in an official capacity and so cast discredit on the system. The Freethinkers except such as are Republicans, or Democrats, or Populists, or Socialists, or Prohibitionists, or Single Taxers, or Philosophical Anarchists who don't believe in voting, might giv him their support. He would get two votes—his and mine.

Mr. Watts's attainments qualify him in a unique manner for a school official. Even as a teacher I doubt if he could be excelled, at least not in elocution. I once heard him, at the Liberal Club, in a recitation entitled "The Maniac," which he gave with such effect that it still lingers in my memory. I would like to hear him repeat it on the day after the election.

The clergymen who hold that the doors of the public theater open hellward from the earth cannot hav had any experience of those pleasure resorts provided with the modern roof garden, which is in quite an opposit direction. Even mossbacks, however, ought to except theaters provided with fire-escapes. Consideration of this question recalls the circumstance that the other day I read a discussion of Lincoln's religious views wherein the person conducting the pious end of the debate claimed that hell-bent unbeliever as a Christian on account of language used in a Thanksgiving proclamation written by Secretary Seward. His opponent might, I think, hav instanced with good effect the fact that, instead of observing the day as others were requested to do, Mr. Lincoln shook his trousers'-legs down over his boot-straps and went to the theater.

I heard a sermon on the Resurrection,
  Wherein the Preacher sought by verse and text—
Albeit wrested from their right connection—
  To demonstrate that Christ was crucified;
Did suffer for our sins; was dead and buried,
  And did within the sepulcher abide
For three full days; then for another tarried,
  And passed from this world skyward to the next.
Here was the tomb, and there the burial linen
The which the body formerly had been in;
And thus the evidence of grave and clothes
Would seem to indicate that Christ arose.
  But who could testify that Christ was dead?
(The Preacher's words awakened a misgiving)
Disciples met him afterwards, they said,
  And that they spoke the truth was not denied.
  I listened, but am yet unsatisfied;
For when he proved that Jesus still was living
  He also proved that Jesus had not died.

The licensed merchants of this city who keep places open on Sunday continue to be subjected to surveillance, arrest, and fine or imprisonment This is carried on under the spy system, policemen being dressed in citizens' clothes, making purchases of goods, and then taking the seller into custody. The public generally, and many of the judges, denounce the system as contemptible, but the law seems to sanction it. The observing reader has doubtless previously noted that when religious and other hypocrisy enters into the provisions of a law, it can be enforced only by agencies more criminal and twice as contemptible as any possible offenses against it. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Plain Words About Meddling Preachers.

Washington Hesing is postmaster at Chicago. He is a German, editor of the Staats-Zeitung, and he is likewise a Catholic. He recently arranged for a parade of the letter carriers on Sunday and for this he is being savagely attacked by the puritanical clergy of Chicago. These denunciations do not in the least frighten Mr. Hesing, as will be seen from the excerpts we giv below from an interview printed in the Chicago Evening Post. Referring to a sermon by Rev. Mr. Meloy, Postmaster Hesing says:

He says that the carriers are not required to hav two uniforms a year. That is a lie. The law requires them to do so. It is no rule of mine. Furthermore, the law requires them to work every Sunday morning. They must do it. If the carriers did not work on Sunday Mr. Meloy could not get his mail, and I know he gets his mail on Sunday, for he told me so himself. He came here to protest against the inspection, representing, as he said, the Christians of this community. I asked him who authorized him to do so and he said no one had. I told him he was entitled to protest as an individual, but had no right to say that he represented the Christian community when, as a matter of fact, he did not. I am an integer of the Christian community, and I am quite sure he did not represent me.

I despise these preachers. They are vile misrepresenters and hypocrits, scribes and pharisees. I do not condemn them as religionists, for I am a religionist myself. But I despise their sanctimonious, hypocritical, pharisaical, sycophantic, parasitic mouthings, and I hav no patience with them. They howl about Sabbath observance, but if a Jew were to upbraid them for breaking the Sabbath on Saturday they would tell him that it was none of his business, which would be perfectly proper, and that is what I tell them. They will not read the Sunday newspapers, but they read the Monday papers. Oh, they read the Monday papers, be assured, because the Monday papers print their Sunday sermons. I hav had many of them come down on Sunday to my editorial rooms in the Staats-Zeitung and giv me the manuscript of their sermons for publication. It was translated in my office and printed in my office on Sunday, and yet, knowing that, they got the paper on Monday, the work of which was done on Sunday, and wrote me crawling letters of thanks for doing that work on Sunday just because it advertised them.

They prate about politics in religion and religion in politics, and if they are not giving us religion in politics I wonder what it is! If they want to open a fight of that kind they can get all they want of it. I am willing to meet them before any audience or on any platform and discuss these matters with them as far as they dare go. I offer this man Meloy a challenge. I will trade places with him. Let me preach a sermon from his pulpit and I will tell his congregation truth and fact about these matters. In return I will giv him my pen and two columns of my paper to say whatever he desires to say therein. That is a fair exchange.

I am a servant of this government and am trying—with a reasonable amount of success, I think—to giv a good administration in the Chicago postoffice. I am working within the lines of the law and if the mailcarriers work on Sunday it probably givs Dr. Meloy a chance to get some good sermon from somebody that he can read to his congregation.

There is not one carrier in the service who objects to the Sunday inspection parade. Not one. I was at station F at 6.30 o'clock this morning and made the carriers a speech. I told them that if there was one among them who, from religious scruples, did not care to attend, it was perfectly optional with him. Why, they received the speech with enthusiasm, threw their hats up and everyone said he'd be there.

I am amazed that in this enlightened age a sermon such as Meloy preached yesterday could emanate from any pulpit to any congregation. I am against religion in politics, and I will join any movement with anyone against any religion, I don't care what, that tries to tangle up church and state.

News and Notes.

A crowded assembly was present at the memorial meeting in honor of Gen. M. M. Trumbull. Letters were read from Judge Waite, Dr. Paul Carus, and others who could not be present at the gathering. Mrs. M. A. Freeman made the opening address. By long association in the Freethought and Reform work with General Trumbull and by intellectual sympathies, Mrs. Freeman was able to giv a most appreciativ review of his life and its heroic meanings. She was followed by Mrs. Lizzie M. Holmes, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Mrs. Woodman, Mrs. Sarah E. Ames, and C. S. Darrow, and a poem by S. P. Putnam. Music was furnished by Mrs. Gruber and Mrs. Kinsella. Mr. Darrow, who is well known for his brilliant work in reform in this city, and who was associated much with Mr. Trumbull in his labors, closed the meeting with an eloquent tribute to the honesty and self-sacrifice of our dead comrade. Mr. Trumbull was indeed a man of great courage. He was not afraid to front the world in the defense of his convictions. He might hav occupied a much larger place in popular estimation had he concealed his honest thought; but neither fortune nor fame had any influence when the right was to be maintained. He cannot be forgotten by the few who now honor and appreciate his unselfish motivs; and his memory will grow and become more bright as the years sweep on. Thousands will hold him in noble remembrance.

I hav just read Mrs. Etta Semple's article in reply to my protest. Of course I sympathize profoundly with Mrs. Semple in the spirit of her reply. There are great and terrible wrongs in human society, and our hearts are deeply pained by the sufferings that are in the world. There is no difference so long as our aims and sympathies are the same. It is simply a difference as to the best way to reach the great purpose we hav in common. It must be admitted that we must specialize our work so far as organization is concerned. Freethought is organized for a special work—the secularization of the state. Is it not better to confine ourselvs to this one supreme work? In this way we can concentrate our forces. We can attain greater power. It seems to me that this is plainly a matter of common sense. A Freethought organization cannot hav a universal function. The old adage comes into play, "Jack at all trades, and good at none." To succeed in life, in business, in anything, we must specialize. Do not all political parties do this? Do they not make a special platform and confine the issues of the campaign to that platform? We must do the same. Our platform is the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Let us organize and work along that line. Success is not possible unless we do this. There is no need of prolonging this controversy. The point I make is understood, and that is all I desire, for I am sure that the sober second thought of all Freethinkers will justify my purpose. I hav nothing but the greatest sympathy with Mrs. Semple and her associates in their untiring labors. We shall understand each other better after this, and no doubt work harmoniously together.

It will be seen by our program that we shall hav a broad field of thought and discussion before the national Congress of Freethinkers, and a representativ array of speakers who stand for a vast variety of opinions. But at the same time it will be seen that the whole drift and purpose of the Congress will be for state secularization. The elucidation of this great subject, the best means by which to secure the end in view, is the one grand object of the Congress. The total separation of church and state must come as the all-important reform in politics. We hav a tremendous contest before us. We hav not chosen an easy path, nor a popular movement. We are in the very advance ranks. Not one single political party has dared to indorse our just demands. Ours is really fundamental work, and it requires self-sacrifice to devote one's self to it with unswerving aim. The temptation is great to plunge into more popular reforms, and trust to chance, or "blind evolution" for the success of pure Freethought principles. But this will not do. Freethought will not succeed by chance, nor by any "divine providence," nor any "blind evolution." It will succeed only by the earnest, devoted, uncompromising efforts of Freethinkers themselvs. We must keep battling on. We must keep at the front, be there few or many. We must hold our forces ready for action. Some, at least, must make Freethought reform the supreme work of their lives, and devote to this every energy they possess. There must be a pionneer band who will never haul down the flag under any circumstances whatsoever.

I hope that friends will realize how much we hav to do; that sacrifices are necessary to carry on this campaign; that it is not for a temporay purpose, but for a purpose as enduring as the republic itself. A Secular government is absolutely necessary to the settlement of all the other great political questions now before the people. A special, long-continued, and unwavering effort must be made in this direction. There can be no compromise.

We must not giv up, no matter how vast the difficulties. The final great battle for human rights which has been going on for centuries is now on our our hands; and we must be true to the call, and take no backward step, nor be careless and indifferent because others are so. I desire all friends to write me at once, and cooperate and help to the best of their ability. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

This is the last call to the friends of Freethought to send their mites to help to defray the expenses of the coming Congress, Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th. We will mail to all members a program of the Congress this week, also to all who will send us the names of Freethinkers. Please send us names so we can send them invitations to the Congress. We ought to hav at least twenty thousand names on our books as members of the Federation. We can do it with your assistance by sending us names so that we can ask them to join. We must hav them so we can post them as to what is going on. The churches are united; they are pushing for their Puritan Sunday with vigor, which we must oppose with equal zeal, and this we cannot do single-handed. We must hav the support of all Liberals in the land to stand by us, for in union there is strength. I must thank the Liberal women for their support; they are sending in more names to enroll than the men. Let the good work go on.

LAST Friday evening Gen. E. M. Lee spoke to the Manhattan Liberal Club on "A Helpmeet to Man." It was a queer mingling of orthodoxy and woman suffrage. When not saying that woman should hav all the rights men hav, that she outshone the stronger sex in intellect and cultivation, and that wherever she has had the right to vote the best moral candidates were always chosen, he talked abont the virtues and greatness of orthodoxy, and what it has done to put hope in the breast and to make civilization possible. Dr. Foote, Jr., taking a part in the discussion, said that General Lee was walking forward while looking backward. Wilson Macdonald said that there was really nothing to answer, and he was reminded during the lecture of a good old Methodist meeting.

In answer to Wm. Slater Mowry, I can tell him that unless he is a Theist, he can not consistently be an American Freemason. It seems they are way behind the times compared with the French.

Revelator and Disseminator.

BARLOW, OR., Sept. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best revelator and disseminator of unanswerable facts of any paper in the world. But these glorious Democratic times make us scratch to pay taxes. I am now seventy-two years old, but can read and think as well as ever. Send on the paper.

The Books Made Him a Subscriber.

BROWNSVILLE, OR., Sept. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. I hav read several of Robert Taylor's books and the last book I hav read is D. M. Bennett's trial and conviction, and I came to the conclusion that I would subscribe to your paper. To read Bennett's trial is enough to make a man, if not prejudiced, change his views both religiously and politically.

Make a Sure Success.

GREEN ISLAND, Sept. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to renew my subscription for another year if I don't die or if I do die; eight copies of "Age of Reason"—for whoever you think best, for I know of no one here that would touch it—and $1 for the Freethought Federation.

Why will not all the ten thousand Liberals put in $5 each and make a sure success? The Christians would do ten times that much if they had as good a cause as we hav. HIRAM WILBUR.

In Atonement, Not Humiliation.

COVINGTON, IND., Oct. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say I am ashamed of myself. True, the times are a little close, but that was not the whole trouble; it was the lack of "hustle," that's what's the matter with me, and I fear it is the same with too many of the supporters of our paper. Right here I will drop my pen and go for a new subscriber. . . Oct. 2d.—I hav got him and a good one, too. Now, I think every delinquent subscriber should go and do likewise, in way of atoning for his carelessness, or cussedness, if you please.

Inclosed find $8—$5 to apply on my subscription, and three for the new subscriber. SCHUYLER LATOURETTE.

P.S.—Respects to the Observer. Tell him to come out and go fishing with me in the placid (I think that's what they call it) Wabash. S. L.

Real Nourishing Substance.

BALTIMORE, MD., Oct. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly send me the inclosed list of books? Hav arranged with my newsdealer for the paper. I am so little able to make compliments that I shall use none to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I must say that it contains real nourishing substance, and not the fatty degeneration of an ignoramus's brain. If belief were the sole criterion of virtue, and that belief exclusivly the Christian, what a small section of philanthropists there would be to mitigate the sorrows of this harsh world, even if every professor were consistent in his practice. FRED. H. POND.

Be Watchful and Work.

SWAN, UTAH, Sept. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As the time is approaching when Utah will enter upon her career of statehood, and as a constitutional convention will soon be held in Provo City, I respectfully ask you to do anything that may be in your power for the good of the coming state. I cannot at present giv you the names of the delegates. You will find inclosed $1 to aid in supplying them with the proper literature. I hope the Freethinkers of Utah will see the necessity of prompt action in this emergency, as Professor Holden has been lecturing on the necessity of sending only good Christians to the convention. GEO. LARSON.

Of Conrse He Is Pleased.

MUNCIE, IND., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Old Testament Stories," and please accept thanks for same. To state that it is grand would be putting it mildly. I bought "The Pictorial Text Book," and it has been all over the neighborhood and caused many straight-faced bigots to laugh in spite of themselvs. As for their refuting the arguments of it and "The Old Testament Stories," bosh! They hav nothing to argue upon, and when we know which denomination they are members of we can foretell what they contend for. However, excepting their faith, which they always fall back upon, their talk is like a babbling brook.

Please accept my best wishes, and that you will succeed in converting many souls is my fervent wish. WM. H. YATES.

No Wonder He Is Surprised.

NEW YORK, Oct. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read the letter of Mr. H. L. Green published in this week's issue and am surprised at its contents. It is called a remarkable article, and so it is, emanating from a Liberal and calling on Liberals to desert J. B. Wise in his time of need. THE TRUTH SEEKER'S remarks on Mr. Green's notion of obscenity are well timed.

If the jury on the trial convict Mr. Wise they must also convict the Bible of obscenity. I am sorry that Mr. Green should take sides with the enemy. I read his magazine with a great deal of pleasure, but think he has lost his head in this case. The outspokenness of THE TRUTH SEEKER is approved by all who do not want to see an old man sacrificed for the glory of superstition. S R. THORNE.

His Eye Is on the Polestar.

PORTLAND, KAN., Sept. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I notice quite an amount of wrangling over politics in our Freethought papers; these, to me, seem to be side issues. The main fight is against ignorance and superstition. My idea is this: A real Freethinker may be a single tax man or the reverse; a free trader or a protectionist, a Populist, a Republican, or a Democrat, but he cannot be a believer in ghosts—Bible or otherwise. As you said in a late issue, we need to concentrate on one thing, viz., keep church and state separate.

Our children to-day are taught that the cyclone is a special providence; that there is a devil, a Savior, a Holy Ghost, an all-seeing-eye; that they must depend on Christ to be saved, etc.—all taught in our public schools.

If there is a God, he has made a great botch of his work. He recognized this when he repented that he had ever made man, but kept right on with very little improvement. S. F. DAVIS.

The Outlook Is Encouraging.

WARREN, O., Sept. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith $3 to renew my subscription to the old reliable TRUTH SEEKER. I am in my 83d year, and some day my remittance will be wanting, but I do not falter in my zeal and love of truth and justice, though I often fret and become impatient that progress is so slow. The change from year to year can hardly be discerned, but when I compare our day with what it was in my youth, the advance is immense, continuous, and encouraging. Speed the day when the light of intelligent Freethought may illumin the whole world. There are evidences that the leaven of science is fermenting in many unexpected quarters.

Even the muddling god idea, the germ out of which nearly all the blighting orthodox theories spring, has been touched with more rational interpretation in the churches of late, especially those that are not in the backwoods of intelligence.

Very truly yours, THOMAS DOUGLASS.

Enriching Themselvs by Taxation.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Sept. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 in payment for two years' subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

What nonsense it is to restrict the personal rights of men, and create by law evil, sin, a hell and devils for the torment of men. The ministers of the gospel tell us to observe the Sabbath. Suppose our legislature by law declares Sunday observance a crime. The Sunday observer thereafter would be considered a big sinner; he would be considered a fit subject for hell and its devils. We talk about sin; hav you an idea of its origin? It originates in the halls of Congress, in the halls of legislation. Just think of it, to allow public servants to wring from the public an income tax, or any other tax, for the support of themselvs and their families. They then palm off the device as a scheme for the general good of the public. Is that honest? Is that Populism? Is that Democratism? If so, down with Populism and down with Democratism.

Respectfully, AUGUST BUESING.

Must Hav Read It Closely.

VINELAND, N. J., Sept. 21, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You tell us the time is near when J. B. Wise must appear for trial in the United States court at Topeka, for sending through the mail a transcript of a verse of the Bible. If that trial is properly conducted by just men, who know the Bible, it will end in pronouncing the Bible obscene and unfit to be read.

I am now in my ninety-fourth year; thirty-five years of the time was spent in a large city where all kinds of books could be had, and the Bible contains more falsehoods, filth, nastiness, and obscenity than all other books I ever had in my hand. With thy money thou mayest buy wine or strong drink or whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, says the Bible. Thousands read this and flocked to saloons to squander their money and brains; thousands lost houses and farms by their rum, and yet the old Bible still reigns.

With thy money thou mayest buy bondmen and bondwomen of the heathen round about thee, says the Bible, and if thou beat thy bondman that he die, nevertheless if he liv three days after the beating it is nobody's business, for he is thy money. In accordance with this command some of our pious fellow-countrymen sent to Africa and bought and stole men, women, and children and brought them here and sold them on the auction block like brutes—separating husbands and wives, parents and children, and brothers and sisters for life. After holding them in bondage some generations the two pious ends of our pious nation got up a war—one party to kill slavery and the other to keep it alive; one million stalwarts were slaughtered in that war. Another full million are limping around for whom sixty millions in pensions are found. A book that will cause such a slaughter as that should be fried in a furnace with brimstone for fat, and the ashes made coffee for treacherous priests when they meet at church frolics and gluttonous feasts.

Amen! Selah! J. HACKER.

What Is Progress?

PETERSBURG, IND., Sept. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: A. Augusta Chapman desires to learn

(1) What Atheists mean by "progress" "when applied to the human race?"

(2) "And what is the goal that must direct and inspire progress," claiming that

(3) "Absolute perfection certainly cannot be predicated of the human race," etc.

I would suggest

(1) The word "progress" as used implies continuation of "the human race" as stated, and not as she would hav it, a future life of an individual after he is dead.

(2) The goal of the tread-mill horse is to keep moving that neglect to so move may not crowd him down in a corner, or why should A. Augusta Chapman continue to eat day after day if she doesn't want to increase in capacity? The object or goal is not to retain the food and constantly add thereto; but she eats to keep up the fire of life progressivly from day to-day, or until the pleasure of eating ceases.

(3) Place civilized man among rude savages. As individuals, neither agree nor enjoy to the full that condition; yet their offspring become adapted to conditions; the savagery of the one and the refinement of the other are modified—the old changeless individuals die and disappear, while the new and harmonious take their places. The perfection problem "of the race" is solved in the very enjoyment of self-stultifying worship. Self-adaptation to environment is the ultimatum of perfection, the goal of progress.

She claims further:

(4) "He who worships truth worships God, for God is truth; he who worships love worships God, for God is love." And he who roars worships God, for God is a roarer (Hosea xi, 10), or the devil, who does a little roaring on his own account. But it is better to be honest, loving, truthful, progressiv, and roar a little, than to abstain from these, and just worship.

The Folly of the God Superstition.

JUNCTION CITY, KAN., Sept. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5—$2 to apply on my subscription and $3 for a new subscriber whose address I inclose. This is the fourth name I hav sent and entitles me to "Four Hundred Years," which I am very anxious to possess. I should be proud to see my name among the subscribers for this great book, if I am entitled to be numbered there the same as one paying $5 for it.

The old TRUTH SEEKER is just "out of sight." The article in the issue of September 15th, under the heading, "God's Loving Providence," is indeed a plain presentation of hard, cold facts thrust before believers in that old time myth, born in an age of ignorance and superstition. I claim that if any of the everyday affairs of this old earth and of human beings are controled and directed by a "divine providence," then all must be, which in the case of the Minnesota calamity, and others as bad and even worse that hav visited this "footstool," would make the "being" responsible for it all anything but a "loving" father for human beings to worship. This "loving providence" has evidently been "laying off" (as railroad men call taking a vacation) about two years, taking western Kansas as evidence in the case, as on about one hundred miles of prairie through which I run on the Union Pacific railway there hav been no crops worth mentioning except sand burrs and sunflowers for that length of time, for want of rain. And we are taught to believe the Bible God infinit in love, infinit in mercy, and infinit in power, and that he brought the universe into existence by simply saying, "Let there be," etc. Why don't he say, "Let there be enough rain in western Kansas?" Ministers please answer.

"God's ways are not our ways." Oh, I expected you would answer with those very words! Thank you, but I am not fully satisfied by your explanation, for if his ways are not our ways, and he is so above human beings in all the attributes that go toward making a perfect being, I then all the more think that he is anything but a "loving father," or he would make the lot of western Kansas farmers a somewhat more desirable one than it has been for two years past, because I, only a human being, had I the power would quickly do so. When will people drop this foolish, superstitious idea?

Your "missionary scheme" is grand, and I intend to hav eight of my Christian friends receive a copy "Paine's Bible" just as soon as I can spare the dollar so that they can learn something of that grand and good Humanitarian who said: "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

With best wishes to you and Heston, I remain, Yours fraternally,

J. J. BARNES.

The People Mean Well; Fight the Creed.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Sept. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading "Ingersoll on Suicide," also the (so-called) replies. I hav read many attempts to answer Ingersoll, but I hav never read an answer to Ingersoll. Mr. Ingersoll is a man of great merit and power, an exceedingly correct man. The clergy can no more answer his argument than they can reverse the rotary motion of the earth, or render the false true. About two years ago I read a letter written by an Infidel to his wife and children just before committing suicide; a kind and affectionate letter, giving the reasons and causes that prompted the act. I read it to a Christian lady. She was very indignant, and said it was a good thing that he killed himself, that the world was better off without him. After all, she agreed with the suicide; he thought the same, and for that reason killed himself. Why should infinit wisdom create a failure? We should not hate the suicide; as Ingersoll says, "Let us be merciful." A certain Christian asked me the other day if I thought that Jesus Christ would ever come back to preach, to which I replied: "Of course I know but little about the man called Christ, but according to the New Testament he was put to death by people who were far more religious than Christ was himself; that is to say, they chastised him for permitting his disciples to pluck corn on the Sabbath, for placing himself on an equality with God; and lastly, they condemned him to death upon the charge of blasphemy. No, you will not fool him again; if Christ should appear in this city to-day, before to-morrow night some Christian (so-called) would insist that another Infidel had come to town."

I had quite a time with the picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER representing the execution of the three negros. I showed the picture to a Christian, and it made him angry. I said: "Why should you be offended? That is a correct delineation, a correct photograph of your doctrin; it is not mine, it is yours. Did not that minister impart to them the religious consolation? Did they not accept it? Were their statements in conformity with the acceptance? Did not the minister who stood there accept it as such? If not, why did he not say so, and preach something else? I am sorry you don't seem to hav even a desire to understand your doctrin; and the moment you see a correct picture of your position it makes you indignant." Of course I am persecuted; I expect to be. When I lived at Clinton, a certain minister's wife said to me, "Mr. Williams, I see the Christians don't patronize your harness shop very much." "No," said I, "that is true; still I do not blame them; no doubt they think they are doing right; some of them are good people; I hav nothing against them; I hav a little flour, a little meat, etc., in the house; but if I should starve to death, an appropriate epitaph might be something like this:

"'Persecuted by Christians. Died for liberty, that all mankind might be free.'"

When I got acquainted with them I found they were good people, good neighbors; the people are not to blame. We must fight the creed—the superstition.

C. V. WILLIAMS.

Pious but Rascally Councilmen.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Sept. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Very glad to see your announcement of Putnam's "Four Hundred Years" being ready for delivery next week, and now that the cool weather is approaching and the mosquitoes—which God in his wisdom has created to annoy us poor mortals seven months out of twelve each year—will soon bid us farewell, I shall spend the evening hours reading his great book.

Some months ago five or six gentleman and myself concluded to circulate a subscription list to secure Mr. Putnam to deliver a course of lectures here, but we met with such poor success that we had to giv up the idea, for the present at least; subscribers were too few and far between. Other Liberal-minded people would not allow their names to appear on the list, fearing apparently it would hurt them socially, financially, or otherwise. A few members of the Unitarian church, as also their minister, were approached, but with the same result. Nevertheless we shall try again this fall.

You will remember that in one of my letters, some nine or ten months ago, I mentioned that our city council passed an ordinance prohibiting the belting and switching of cars in certain parts of the city during the morning hours on Sundays, apparently for the purpose of not disturbing the worshipers at church in that locality. Well, some eight or nine of these good Christian officials hav been indicted by the grand jury for bribery, etc., with more to follow, and one of them has already been convicted, and impeachment proceedings are also pending against the mayor. This does not speak very well for our city fathers who hav the welfare of the church so much at heart, so much so indeed, that they pass laws to stop the wheels of commerce so as not to disturb the worshipers of superstition.

At our late legislativ session the repeal of the obnoxious Sunday-law passed the house, but failed to pass the senate, due apparently to a committee of pious Sunday-law advocates, who were hustled off to the state capital to influence a sufficient number of members to kill the bill, and they succeeded; but the law has never been, is not now being, and never will be, enforced. Another bill to tax all property not directly used for religious purposes was introduced. I did not very closely follow the proceedings at the time, but I think it failed to pass. Still another bill was introduced prohibiting teachers of public schools from appearing in their religious garb; this bill passed. Messrs. Dolluth and Mouton were the fathers of these reform movements.

A few clippings inclosed will show that my communications sent to the local dailies lately are not being rejected so often, when short and not too severe in expression.

ERWIN AUFFURTH.

For Religious Liberty.

NEENACH, CAL., Sept. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: At last it has come to pass that a polititcal party in the state of California applies the religious test in politics. The American Protectiv Association has full control of the Republican party in this state. In this county it defeated one of its most honored members for chairman of its convention for the well-known reason that his wife was a Catholic and himself, being a liberal-minded man, was opposed to the dark-lantern methods of such an organization as the American Protectiv Association. The principle of religious liberty is at stake. The American Protectiv Association to-day is opposed to Catholics, to-morrow it will probably boycott the Freethinkers. I say, Down with such an organization, and down with the party that upholds it; there are very few, if any, Liberals that belong to it; all the members of the American Protectiv Association that I am acquainted with belong to some one of the orthodox Protestant churches.

Being a member of the Freethought Federation of America, I believe in voting as I believe. Of all the political parties in California, the Democratic party is the only one which comes out squarely in favor of religious liberty. It defines its position in unmistakable terms by the following plank in its state and county platform:

We declare our continued adherence to the great principle of religious liberty as enunciated in Article VI of the Constitution of the United States in the following language: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any public office or public trust under the United States." And we hold that the same principle shall be applied to all state, county, and municipal offices.

The same plank was presented in the Republican convention, and was voted down amid howls and hisses. Having had the honor of attending Democratic conventions in this state, I can say with perfect truth that there are more Liberals affiliated with the Democratic party than all the other parties combined. The Liberals of this state are indebted to the Democratic party that we hav no Sunday laws at the present time in California. As a party it has always been consistently opposed to them. Let the Liberals of this state, regardless of party lines, vote for the party which advocates religious liberty. If the Republican party can be defeated this election the old proscriptiv know-nothing spirit will hav its very short day and die a disgraceful death and fill a dishonored grave.

H. SANDBERG.

Teachers Forced to Use the Bible.

CODORUS, PA., Sept. 29, 294

MR. EDITOR: Some time since I had an argument with a brainless theological ignoramus at a crowded place, and beat him so badly on his own ground (scriptural) that he resorted first to abuse and, when that had no effect, then to flight. Being meek and lowly, and like his master having a disposition to love even his enemies, he got his revenge by informing the superintendent of schools that I was an Atheist and taught Infidelity in my school. The consequence was that my certificate, which I hav held for a number of years, was annulled on the ground that an Atheist, Agnostic, Infidel, or even a Freethinker, does not possess a moral character.

I at once applied for a re-examination, which was granted. I passed favorably, but the superintendent refused to sign it until I promised not to hold an argument with any of God's specially appointed servants, commonly called "preachers of the gospel." The demand was also made that I should read the holy Bible in my school every morning. Proving the Bible unfit for the school-room, I compromised, promising to use the New Testament.

Dear friends, this was a bitter dose for me to swallow, living, as I had thought, in a free country, and teaching a secular school, maintained by state funds. I hav a family dependent on me for their daily bread, and am cognizant of the fact that all the prayers ever uttered by man, woman, or child never brought a crust of bread to sustain life. I love my wife and children, as I suppose all Freethinkers do, and this is what urged me to make the promis

This spring a good deacon in one of our churches cheated me out of $140. Another, a kind hearted Sunday-school teacher, defrauded me to the extent of over $30, which was done for Christ's sake. When they again partake of the Lord's supper, will they quiet their consciences by saying "Jesus paid it all?" He may pay their debts; I am out of pocket all the same.

How long will it be before I am placed on the rack? How soon will they apply the thumbscrew or something worse in order to giv their God pleasure and to induce me to bow down to superstition? I would sell my little home if I knew where to find a place where liberty is not a mockery; where science rules, and superstition is a thing of the past. Yours for truth,

J. W. F. COPENHEAVER.

Mortuary—Cyrus T. Collier.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform you of the death, August 22, 1894, of Cyrus T. Collier, of Townsend, Mont. He had been a subscriber to your paper for many years. He died as he lived, a fearless unbeliever in Christian doctrins. He was not afraid to meet death, though life had full interest yet. According to his wish his funeral was purely secular, a leading friend, Judge J. R. Weston, reading an excellent address, which I subjoin. During his long illness (of heart disease), he spent much time at St. Peter's Hospital, Helena, Mont., an Episcopal institution, and I got a glimps of the bigotry of even intelligent Christians. In the hospital was a Mr. Morton, who had been confined to his bed for months with a broken leg. He was an old man and a thorough Freethinker, so I took him some of Mr. Collier's TRUTH SEEKERS, as he wished them; some of the nurses must hav acted as informer, for the same day came the matron to my room, bearing the obnoxious sheets, saying "the bishop would go for her," if he knew the papers were allowed in the ward. I hav some doubts about the bishop, as he is a very liberal fellow, and not hurt with religion, but the fact remains that a grown man cannot choose his reading if he happens to be a patient in St. Peter's.

EVA WARREN COLLIER.

ADDRESS OF JUDGE WESTON.

FRIENDS: The great bond of human brotherhood causes us to assemble here to-day to perform the last sad duty, the last solemn rite due from man to man. The chill shadow of death has swept through our quiet community, and the finger of fate has been placed on one who has for many years been a familiar figure in our midst. When our race is run, when our task is performed, and our friends gather around all that is left of our once breathing, living, emotional, sympathetic, we hope conscientious existence—then we can reasonably expect that our accounts will be justly settled, and that our friends who knew us best will at least place upon the credit side honest intent in life's struggles, sympathy for our race and of having caused more joy and happiness than disappointment and sorrow; will accredit to us that inward valor of conscience, of honesty, of self-denial, of self-sacrifice, daring to do right even in the face of the world's contumely, of striving ever to the fulfillment of our honest convictions of duty. The honest man is not incited by physical deeds of daring as is the soldier hero; the arena on which he acts is not that of aggression and bloodshed, but of sympathy, self-denial, and self-sacrifice; though he may err in judgment, never in intent; though his views may not harmonize with the views of his neighbors and the world at large, yet he is true to his own heart's teachings; he knows that belief is involuntary, as much so as the beating of the heart, and if it was possible for him to formulate a theory of belief exactly suited to his taste and wishes, he would at once set his imaginativ genius at work, and invent a plan by which all mankind, both here and hereafter, would be superlativly happy. But he cannot believe, therefore without belief he cannot formulate. He cannot change his opinion without evidence, and in the absence of evidence he must submit to the inevitable; though he might even wish it otherwise, but the certainty of one thing exists everywhere and that is the sovereignty of duty; whatever may hav been in the past, whatever may be in the future, whatever may be in the mysteries that encompass him, one thing is certain, he must do right! The moral laws of our being are imperativ; in the deepest perplexity they do not cease to assert themselvs; whatever the clamor about us, their voices pierce the din like the blast of a trumpet. Let us fly to the ends of the earth, they are with us. God or no God, we dare not do that which will smirch our honor or degrade our manhood. Heaven or no heaven, yet there is a kingdom on earth which is duty rightly performed. Soul or no soul, our own conscience demands that we be just and helpful to our fellowman. Duty is confined to the present moment; our task is not to shape the entire future; the duty that the instant presents is the thing to be done. We may not be able to see beyond it, yet do it faithfully, and the way will open. He who takes care of the present is taking care of the future. He who solves the problem of the moment at hand solves the problem of eternity.

All that is left of our friend Cyrus T. Collier is before us. A noble man has gone. A man who since we knew him has never been known to tell a lie, a man who by his association with his fellowmen forced respect, and though his lack of faith in mythology may hav caused some to censure and some to avoid, yet all will admit that he was a noble man, that his faith in duty, faith in everything, in himself, faith in the ultimate intelligence of mankind and their final allegiance to the principles of just and true morality, faith in the theory that freedom of thought and action will eventually make life more perfect and desirable, has been his undying wish. So far as I know there never was a single thought tainted with impurity or any suggestion of vice entered his noble brain; no act of his ever caused us to consider anything in him but simple virtue clothed in rugged exterior. He is gone, and now be not afraid to follow his example; strive to know and then believe, but be ever watchful over your acts and obligations to your fellow creatures. Liv this life perfect and fear not.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Bull-frog.

In the warm summer time, on a water-soaked log,
Sits the boss of the pond, the croaking bull-frog—
Perchoog.
All signs of wet weather inspire the bull-frog,
And his great voice is heard through rain and the fog—
Perchoog.
When frogs of all tones sing in chorus at night,
He leadeth the choir with his key-note all right—
Perchoog.
On the brink he will sit, in a fatherly way,
His bulging eyes watching the polywogs play—
Perchoog.
When the sun is too hot he seeks a good shade,
Where he'll watch flies and croak 'midst leaflet and blade—
Perchoog.
When a boy throws a stone that startles his fears,
How quick under water the frog disappears—
Perchoog.
In the late autumn-time, when cold winds begin,
His croak becomes feeble, and we seldom hear him—
Perchoog.
Then in mud of the pond he sleeps safe from wrong,
Till we almost forget that natural song—
Perchoog.
All through the long winter, when the pond is ice-bound,
We listen in vain for that musical sound—
Perchoog,
But when the warm breeze melts the ice in the spring,
Again comes the bull-frog to croak and to sing—
Perchoog.
Who knows that frogs hav not a worshiping hour,
When they sing to the gods with all their power—
Perchoog.
When they pray the moonman to keep them from harm,
And chain the boy-devil that roams o'er the farm—
Perchoog.
For the frogs know as well what they are about
As does priest whom they mock when they croak and shout—
Perchoog.
Then let us remember the tuneful bull-frog,
The boss of the pond on the water-soaked log—
Perchoog.

The Inquirendo Club.

VI.

At the next meeting Florence produced three queries from the query box, and read them as follows: "In a criminal case, is a plea of 'not guilty' necessarily an assertion on the part of the prisoner that he is innocent?"

"In what country do members of a certain order take an oath that to the utmost of their power they will 'make concord where discord is?'"

"What English official ranks next to royalty and crowns the sovereign?"

"The answer to the first query involves a technicality in legal procedure known as 'burden of proof,'" said Florence; "and that is 'an obligation to establish by evidence certain disputed facts.' And as this 'burden of proof' lies on the party asserting the affirmativ of the issue to be tried or question in dispute, the plea of 'not guilty' is not necessarily an assertion by the prisoner that he is innocent, as is commonly supposed, but that he wishes to be tried, and that the burden of proof is on the prosecutor, while he has the presumption of innocence in his favor.

"The second query," she continued, "has reference to a quaint form of oath that a body corporation—the burgesses—take in Scotland upon their election or admission to the privilege of magistrates of the burg—an oath involving loyalty to the Queen, to the provost and bailies of the burg and their officers. Pledging and confessing a deep regard for the religion of their country, they resolve to 'make concord where discord is,' to the utmost of their power.

"The answer to the third query is simply, 'the archbishop of Canterbury.' He is primate of all England, metropolitan, and first peer of the realm. He has the honor of placing the crown upon the head of the heir to the throne when that party ceremoniously takes the government of a nation into his hands and listens to the counsel from his archbishop. While the latter is possessed of £15,000 a year, he is also patron of 149 livings.

"The great glory of the English city of Canterbury is its magnificent cathedral. It is a very old institution, and rich in relics. It is very beautiful in design and interesting to visit, particularly so if one feels disposed to take an interest in ancient legends and traditions."

Pausing for a moment, Florence next unfolded a manuscript, and read by request an essay of her own composition entitled:

THE POWER OF IGNORANCE.

"'Knowledge is power!' This oft-repeated axiom has become so universally accepted as a self-evident truth that its usage has grown to a careless assertion of the superiority of knowledge, while no one seems to question whether ignorance has a power or not. Yet ignorance has power—the brute-like force of a blind giant, who, left to roam at will, would make it a sport to seize the pillars that hold up the temple of human good and turn all the palaces of joy dark as a buried Babylon. Its presence has obscured the light of reason for countless ages, and enveloped the world in a cloud of Stygian blackness. Its demoniac despotism was shown in its cruel act of torturing and killing Alexandria's beautiful teacher of philosophy, Hypatia. It took centuries of patient, frugal work on the part of philosophy to substantiate its statements, but ignorance caused them to be all overthrown in a single hour. In view of this, philosophically considered, ignorance is the true bond between events, connecting the past with sequent facts of the future; and its power consists in dissolving the wrought fabric of knowledge. Knowledge, with slow, laborious effort, spends his six days in erecting a foundation, only to hav ignorance come, drunk on the seventh, with a firkin of oil and a match—with an easy 'let there not be,' and the whole work is quickly destroyed—leaving naught of the toil of knowledge but a few ashes.

"And yet, barring the fact of its destructivness, ignorance has assisted progress—not very materially, still in a degree. It is related of Gen. Zachary Taylor that he won the battle of Mexico 'by sheer pluck and awkwardness.' But in reality he was too poor a soldier to be conscious of his own defeat, and continued fighting. His adversaries, astonished at his persistency, thought he had hidden resources, and incontinently ran away. And thus Taylor captured Mexico.

"The old proverb that 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread,' thus brings an unexpected argument in favor of the fools.

"But the limit of the power of ignorance carries us far into the past and farther yet into the future. Its van reaches us here and its wheels are lost in the distant clouds. The rumble of its dread approach is heard throughout the land, and the philosophers who understand its import blanch with fear when they hear the ominous sounds. Woe to the nation when ignorance seeks recruits among ill-clad, ill-fed, starving, desperate people, to storm the palace walls with the motto upon their banner, 'Bread or Blood.'"

Following Florence's essay came a poem from Ernestine:

INDIAN SUMMER.

A hazy mist obscures the dawn
Slow flushing in the east,
While softly sinks the drowsy moon,
Proclaiming night hath ceased.

Delicious freshness greets the sense,
Diffusing perfume rare,
And crisply blows the morning wind
Across the meadows bare.

A thousand gleams of burnished gold
Enrich the dewy sod,
O'er mountain peaks and valleys fair,
The fragrant golden rod,

Sweet harbinger of autumn drear,
That blossoms in September,
To liv, ere blows the northern snows,
Which usher in December.

Stanch members of true brotherhood,
Thy motto faithfulness,
Ye linger long upon the soil
The barren land to bless.

So may we, when our life shall close—
Our form lie 'neath the sod—
Yet leave a memory beautiful
As the faithful golden rod.

"Very good," observed Aunt Margaret; while Florence said critically, "It is not as good as some you hav written, but contains a good moral which more than compensates." Ernestine smiled, but, as it had now grown so late, was unable to retaliate upon Florence's production, so the meeting adjourned.

IDA BALLOU.

Why?

Charley wants to know why he should not take a glass of beer as well as his father. Better let it alone, Charley. It is better for your health, your temper, your morals, and your pocket. There was once a printer who, when his brother workmen went out to get beer and other drinks, carefully laid aside an amount like to which they would spend, putting it in the bank. When five years had gone by, he examined his bank book, and how much do you suppose he found there? Just $521.86. In the five years he had been perfectly well, and had lost no time from his work, except now and then a holiday. Three out of the number who had worked with him had meanwhile become intemperate, and were n. g., no good as workmen. The young man who had been laughed at for abstaining from liquor after awhile bought the printing establishment, increased the business, and in twenty years' time after he began saving his drink money, as he called it, had accumulated $100,000. An obvious lesson.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED. Published by the Oriental Publishing Co., Philadelphia. Price, $1.50. For sale by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

In some respects this is one of the most remarkable works of the present century, whether viewed as the offspring of a deluded mind, as some have pronounced it, or as what it claims to be, viz.: the testimony of the spirits of departed ancients who "disclose the most startling revelations proving Christianity to be of heathen origin." Whatever may hav been the real inspiration of the work, the evidence it presents is directly in the line of Mr. Lillie's latest work, the author of which certainly cannot be charged with a belief in or sympathy with the theories of modern Spiritualism. It is also strictly in harmony with the conclusions of many learned, thoughtful men (except in one feature, which will be referred to later on) who hav given church Christianity thorough and unprejudiced study in the light of the latest historical discoveries and translations of the philosophical books of the East. In short, the convictions reached by Mr. Lillie, Baron Harden Hickey and others, through what are considered the legitimate channels of scientific research, are fully corroborated by the compiler of "Antiquity Unveiled," who can hardly be accused of borrowing his ideas from the authors referred to. This is a singular fact in itself, and while it cannot be taken as conclusiv evidence of the correctness of the Spiritualistic theories, it givs the work a claim to careful consideration which it might not otherwise possess. Truth should be recognized wherever found, and prejudice should never be allowed to stand in the way of a respectful examination of apparently logical and rational claims and arguments.

This work is a compilation of a series of communications said to hav been made through a spirit medium to the late J. M. Roberts, Esq., of Montgomery county, Pa. The spirits supposed to hav made the starting statements contained in the book were those of Apollonius of Tyana; his pupil Damis; Deva Bodhisatwa, a Buddhist prophet; Plotinus; Pope Gregory VII; Euthalius, a Greek theologian; Vespasian, a Roman emperor; Felix, procurator of Judea; Pliny the Younger; Origen; Flavius Josephus; Pontius Pilate; Quintillian; Urban the VIII, a Roman pontiff; Aquila, a Cappadocian philosopher; Gregory, bishop of Constantinople; Marcion, the father of Church Christianity; Constantine the Great; Tacitus; Ignatius of Antioch; Porphyry; Clement Alexandrinus; Hermogenes, the Essenian rival of Paul; Pythagoras, the Samian sage; Ammonius Saccas; Euxenus; Strabo; Moses Maimonides; St. Chrysostom; Charles Martel; Lucius of Cyrene; St. Dominic De Guzman; Celestine III, a Roman pontiff; Pope Innocent III; Albertus Magnus; Socrates Scholasticus; Gabinus, governor of Judea; Lactantius; Iamblicus; Anastasius, librarian of the Vatican; Pope Nicholas IV; Zoroaster, and a number of other men well known in ancient history who would be most competent witnesses to the truth or falsity of church Christian history if they were alive to-day If they were with us at this time and testified to what it is claimed their spirits hav declared, it is quite certain that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand church Christians would denounce them as conscienceless liars.

Probably the most surprising declaration in the book is that accredited to the spirit of Apollonius of Tyana, who avers that he was the person who is known in church Christian history as Jesus of Nazareth, and that the latter was a myth; that the works performed and the teachings enunciated by him (Apollonius) were accredited to Jesus. This remarkable assertion has been made by others who pursued their investigations on the regular scientific lines and who hav asserted as capable of absolute proof that the history of the deeds and sayings of Apollonius and of Pythagoras was made to do duty as that of Jesus of Nazareth, who never existed. This, however, we do not consider to hav been proved by sufficient valid evidence. It is in this feature that "Antiquity Unveiled" differs completely from the works of other writers upon the same subject, who claim that Jesus really lived and taught, but that he never constructed, nor gave any ground for the construction of church Christianity.

We feel free to say that "Antiquity Unveiled" is worthy of the perusal of any seeker after truth who is capable of forming and holding an opinion without the aid of the church authorities, if for no other reason than that its comparison with the opinions of the scientific investigators is deeply interesting and instructiv.—Moslem World.

To be trusted is a better compliment than to be loved.—George Macdonald.

I WISH men to be free

SELF-SACRIFICE is impossible as an aim in itself; self-development is possible, reasonable, and consistent.—Grant Allen.

TRUE science will continue to fulfil one of her most beneficent functions; that of relieving men from the burden of false science, which is imposed upon them in the name of religion.—T. H. Huxley.

COMMAND is a blight to the affections. Whatsoever of beauty — whatsoever of poetry, there is in the passion that unites the sexes, withers up and dies in the cold atmosphere of authority.—Herbert Spencer.

INSIGHT and culture are not inevitable allies. The man who spends his days collecting data too often finds in his hands a dead weight of facts whose laws are hid from his vision. One man may be expert in collecting material and another expert in using it. The final solution always rests with those higher powers of imagination and prophecy upon which the formal self-elected leaders in our civilization can not set the seal of their aggrandizement or monopoly.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE evidence, and the only evidence, to which it [science] appeals or which it admits, is that which is in the power of everyone to judge—that which is furnished directly by the senses. It deals with the actual world about us, its objectiv realities and present activities, and does not relegate the inquirer to dusty precedents or the mouldy maxims of commentators. The only conditions which it enjoins are that the imperfections of the senses shall be corrected as far as possible and that their observations shall be interpreted by the laws of local induction.—Daniel G. Brinton.

IT seems to me that moral principles are neither self-sustained, nor supernaturally revealed or inspired, nor a matter of predilection; but that they are grounded on our social nature, and this again on the organic solidarity, past, present, and future, of all individual members united in the social life. The progressiv realization of the ethical ideal consists, under this aspect, in the more and more thorough recognition of the super-individual significance of our social relations, and in the rational transformation of the social medium in accordance with such recognition.—Dr. Edmund Montgomery.

WHETHER you believe that creation was the work of design or of inconscient law, it is equally difficult to imagin how this random collection of dissimilar materials came together. To the riddles which nature propounds to us the profession of ignorance must constantly be our only reasonable answer. The cloud of impenetrable mystery hangs over the development and still more over the origin of life. If we strain our eyes to pierce it with the foregone conclusion that some solution is and must be attainable, we shall only mistake for discoveries the figments of our own imagination.—Lord Salisbury.

EVERY man's nature is a sufficient advertisment to him of the character of his fellows. My right and my wrong is their right and their wrong. Whilst I do what is fit for me, and abstain from what is unfit, my neighbor and I shall often agree in our means, and work together for a time to one end. But whenever I find my dominion over myself not sufficient for me, and undertake the direction of him also, I overstep the truth, and come into false relations to him. I may hav so much more skill or strength than he, that he cannot express adequately his sense of wrong, but it is a lie, and hurts like a lie both him and me. Love and nature can not maintain the assumption; it must be executed by a practical lie, namely by force.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

THE names given to the different eras of culture indicate generally the character of the influences which hav contributed most to the development of humanity. Industrial art, accompanied and aided by inventiv genius, has always been the chief civilizer and benefactor of mankind. The arts of working stone, bronze, and iron, and the invention of movable alphabetic type and the steam engin, hav made the chief epochs in history. Science is now crowding closely upon the heels of industry, but is rather its handmaid than its rival. Polity, society, morality, religion, literature, and art, are very important to human happiness, but they hav, in all ages, followed in the train of mechanism. The orators, preachers, and poets did not exist as separate classes until the mechanics had provided means for their support. —John S. Hittell.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquet'e—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

BOSTON GIRL: "Do you know, I fahncy heaven will be much like Boston." Chicago Girl: "Why? Because there will not be men enough there to go around?" —Life.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER said that the difference between the "faith cure" and the "mind cure" is that "the mind cure doesn't require any faith, and the faith cure doesn't require any mind."

VISITING CLERGYMAN: "And did your faith bring you to this?" Salvation Army Bill (serving his third term for disorderly conduct and drunkenness): "No, not my faith, but my convictions!"—Life.

TIMOTHY: "Say, ma, did our baby come from heaven?" Ma: "Av coorse he did." Timothy: "Well, he was a durn fool to leave heaven for a place like this, and then run the risk of never gittin' back again."

HUSBAND (all ready for the theater): "I declare, dear, it's raining hard." Wife: "Well, what about a little rain? One would think, from your tone of voice, that we were about starting for church."

THE other night, over a dram, two old cronies were discussing the merits of their pastors, when one remarked: "An' oor minister disna read his sermons, aither." "If I am credibly informed, Peter," observed the other, "he reads ither fowks."

"PAPA," asks Tommy Goodman, "who was Cain's wife?" "Caroline," said the Rev. Dr. Goodman, after an ominous pause, addressing his wife, "will you please hand me my heaviest slipper and leave the room? There is going to be a trial for heresy right here and right now." —Chicago Tribune.

GABRIEL: "Well, what can I do for you?" Applicant: "I want to see St. Peter." Gabriel: "Engaged on important work and can't be bothered just now." Applicant: "What is he doing?" Gabriel: "Making up his report on how many sparrows fell to the ground during the past month."—Puck.

COUNTRY PARSON: "You hav no idea how hard it is for me to perform my duties here." Visiting Bishop: "What are some of your difficulties?" Country Parson: "Take this week, for instance. Just as the piece of swamp they allow me for a garden got dry enough to make my potatoes thrive, the congregation requested me to pray for rain."—Puck.

JENKINS: "Great stroke of luck for Brownley. I knew him when he was a poor theological student, and he has just been selected as pastor of one of the most fashionable churches in the city." Mrs. Jenkins: "So I understand. Rich congregation, isn't it?" Jenkins: "Rich? They hav special monthly prayer-meetings to pray for a tight money market."—Puck.

ONE Sabbath afternoon a Scotch minister, in his closing prayer, earnestly besought some seasonable and much-wished-for rain. Immediately rain began to fall —the first for many weeks—and for a short time it fell in torrents. Meanwhile the congregation was dismissed; and then came the scramble for umbrellas. One lady, who had no umbrella, commenced gathering the skirts of her gown over her head before quitting the church vestibule, at the same time remarking to a neighbor: "Eh, wumman, isn't it too bad o' the doctor? He might ha' letten us hame first!" London Freethinker.

MR. W. R. LE FANU, in his "Seventy Years of Irish Life," gives the following testimony of an invalid who had been to Knock chapel, in the hopes of securing the services of Our Lady of Knock. "Indeed, sir, I took all the rounds, and said all the prayers, but it was of no use; not but what it's a grand place. It would astonish you to see all the sticks and crutches hanging up there, left behind by poor cripples who went home cured. It's my opinion, sir, that for rheumatism and the like of that, it's a grand place entirely; but as for the liver, it's not worth a d——n." —London Freethinker.

SEE, see auld Orthodoxy's faes
She's swingein' thro the city;
Hark, how the nine-tail'd cat she plays!
I vow it's unco pretty!
There, Learning with his Greekish face,
Grunts out some Latin ditty;
And Common-sense is gaun, she says,
To mak to Jamie Beattie
Her plaint this day.

But there's Morality himsel',
Embracing all opinions;
Hark, how he gies the tither yell,
Between his twa companions.
See, how she peels the skin and fell,
As ane were peeling onions!
Now there, they're packed aff to hell,
And banished our dominions,
Henceforth this day.

ARGUMENT
IN THE
Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,
At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth, 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

AMOS HAS MORE TROUBLE WITH HIS JOSS AND CAUSETH HIM TO REPENT.—Amos vii, 4, 5, 6.

News of the Week.

AT a lodging-house fire in Boston one man was killed and several injured.

IT is reported that the czar is hopelessly ill and that a regency is about to be established.

AT Ironwood, Mich., while some dynamite was thawing in a stove, it exploded and killed five persons.

ONE of the boodle councilmen of New Orleans has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

THE Massachusetts Democrats indorsed the income tax, denounced the A. P. A., and nominated John E. Russell for governor.

THE Supreme Court of South Carolina, by a vote of two to one, on party lines, decides that the state dispensary law is constitutional.

ON October 11th an east-bound overland train was held up near Sacramento and the express car robbed of gold to the amount or $51,000.

THE carelessness of a carpenter in carrying a naked lamp into a colliery shaft at Shamokin, Pa., caused the death by fire of five miners.

TREASURY receipts for the first ten days of October make the outlook for government finances under the new tariff law quite favorable.

DR. A. B. DOBSON, a very popular Spiritualist physician, formerly of Maquoketa, Ia., and later of San José, Cal., died recently in the latter city.

THE official canvass of the votes cast in the Georgia election shows that the assembly will contain 3 Republicans, 50 Populists, and 166 Democrats. About thirty seats are contested.

AT the parade of the striking cloakmakers in this city on October 11th the police did some clubbing which is declared to hav been wholly unnecessary. The affair is being investigated.

AS THE Lexow committee's investigation of the police department of this city proceeds more and more astonishing revelations are made. Still the press urges the committee to go "higher up."

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, Moncure D. Conway, and other prominent reformers, recently addressed a large meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, in condemnation of lynching in the South and elsewhere.

THE strong wind which blew over New York on the morning of October 10th prostrated an eight story building in course of construction and buried two tenement houses in its ruins. Nine people were killed and thirteen injured, several of them badly.

CHIEF-JUSTICE LEON ABBETT of New Jersey charged the grand jury at Trenton that the officials of the state fair and the police who were on the ground at the time were guilty of a crime in permitting gambling and should be made to suffer for it. The managers of the inter-state fair include nearly all the leading business men of Trenton, some of whom hav very prominent church connections.

THE Jewish-American press the country over condemns the A. P. A. and numerous Jewish social organizations hav adopted resolutions in favor of religious freedom.

AN express train was robbed on the 12th inst. near Quantico, Va. A large sum of money was obtained. The robbers cut the engin loose and made their escape on it, afterward letting it go wild, and it would hav run into another passenger train had it not been for a signalman who managed to sidetrack it.

THE Chinese-Japanese war drags slowly along. The Japanese hav recently won a few small victories and are slowly pushing their way toward Pekin. It is rumored that the Chinese government has sued for peace through the British minister, offering to guarantee the neutrality of Corea and to pay Japan a war indemnity.

EARL GREY, the third of the title, died in England last week. In 1841 he was celebrated for his debates in Parliament in opposition to the protectionist policy of Peel's administration. He was in Melbourne's cabinet, was a frequent writer to the London Times, and was the author of several books. He was born in 1802.

COLONEL BRECKINRIDGE made public confession to his church at Mount Horeb, Ky., and his repentance has been accepted, but the officers of the church hav suspended him from communion until Feb. 1, 1895. On the same day that this was announced Colonel Breckinridge presented a banner to the precinct of Harper's Ferry in Henry county. It had been offered previous to the holding of the primaries by the Breckinridge organization of Lexington to the precinct which should giv the colonel the largest proportional vote, and Harper's Ferry gave him 139 of its 179 votes. Most of the address dealt with national issues, but the first part "fairly bristled with ingeniously contrived flings at those who had been the means of defeating him."

LUTHER COLBY, the editor of the Banner of Light, died at the Crawford House in Boston on October 7th. He was born at Amesbury, Mass., Oct. 12, 1814, and for thirty-seven years had been editor of the Banner of Light. His funeral took place on October 10th from the Spiritualist Temple.

IT has just been discovered that the government has been the victim of a plot in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by which it has lost perhaps two hundred thousand stamps. The stealing has been going on for thirty days and it will take weeks to ascertain the exact amount of the loss, as no one can tell until they make their quarterly reports how many postmasters hav received short packages.

THERE are eleven Scandinavian papers in Minnesota and they hav heretofore supported the Republican nominees, but this year ten of them hav bolted the nomination of Knute Nelson for governor on the ground that he is merely a tool in the hands of the railroad corporations. They hav run up the names of Sidney M. Owen, Populist, for governor, and Adolph Biermann, Democrat, for auditor. The other Republican candidates are accepted.

THE central committee of the New York Democracy filled the vacancy on the state ticket caused by the resignation of Judge Gaynor with the name of Justice Charles F. Brown. The Shepard Democracy of Brooklyn has put a third ticket in the field, substituting Everett P. Wheeler for Senator Hill for governor and accepting the regular Democratic nominee for lieutenant-governor—Daniel E. Lockwood—and the regular Democratic nominee for judge of the Court of Appeals—Charles F. Brown.

IN New York all the elements of opposition to Tammany hav united on the Strong ticket. The latter organization has nominated the philanthropist, Nathan Straus, for mayor. For Congressmen it has put up its own members, refusing to join with the other elements of the Democratic party, and "turning down" all the present Congressmen who voted for the Wilson bill. This will probably lead to the nomination of other candidates by the anti-Tammany Democrats and the election of Republicans in some of the districts.

THE first parliamentary election in Belgium under the new universal suffrage compulsory voting law took place last Sunday. All men over twenty-five years hav one vote; all married men and widowers who pay taxes to the amount of five francs hav two, while the class of highly educated hav three. In the last class are included all the priests, numbering ten thousand, so that the clerical party received thirty thousand votes from the priests alone, with the result that that party shows large gains at the expense of the party called "Liberal," which also lost to the Socialists. Large numbers of men had to be dragged to the polls to vote and many of them put the names of imaginary candidates on their ballots and this has much delayed the counting of the vote.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

Prince of Peace or Patron Saint of War?

B. O. Flower, giving in the Arena a partial list of the armories in Massachusetts and New York, says:

"They, of course, do not represent all the bastiles of death, which speak in such an unmistakable manner of the real materialism of the age and the absence of soul kinship with the Prince of Peace."

That has a soft, alliterativ sound, but how much truth does it express? This is called a Materialistic age chiefly because machinery has to a great extent supplanted metaphysics, and men are more and more inclined to make critical examination precedent to belief. The ages of war were the ages of unquestioning faith, and the ferocity of the wars which then prevailed was immeasurably greater than that of those which occur in these "materialistic" times. Economic considerations are more powerfully operativ to prevent war than are all other influences. It is seen that war does not pay, and the mighty armaments that are maintained are maintained to prevent war rather than to provoke it. Every resource of diplomacy is exhausted to obviate a resort to arms. All governments are anxious to leave undisturbed the balance of power. Why? Because they fear the terrible destructivness of the modern war. This age of "materialism" has armed the nations with such unprecedented annihilating forces, and it costs so much to replace what is consumed and destroyed, that every government is compelled by monetary necessities to hold the dogs of war in leash as long as possible.

This talk about the "Prince of Peace" is nauseating. It is only pious spreadeagleism. If we are to accept the New Testament narrativ—its non-miraculous features only, of course—as authentic history, we will be as fully justified in calling the Nazarene the Patron Saint of Holy War as the Prince of Peace. The teachings imputed to him are contradictory and confusing. But there can be no doubt that when he and his immediate followers made belief in him and his "gospel" a virtue, and non-belief therein a crime against man and "God," the virus of persecution was implanted in the Christian blood, and it has remained there to this day. Many of the wars that desolated the world during the distinctivly Christian period were caused by the dogma of exclusiv salvation, while all that occurred in Christian lands were intensified in ferocity and cruelty by the influence of that dogma and its corollaries. Whatever Jesus may hav meant when he said, as reported, that he came to bring a sword, his followers hav ever taken him literally and rendered him the homage of imitation in this respect.

The old spirit of Christian hatred of the "heathen" is by no means dead. No longer ago than last August the Philadelphia Times, referring to the Japanese-Chinese war, said that "it is of comparativly little consequence what these pagan nations are going to war about. The most important thing is to see them fairly launched in the conflict that must vastly benefit both. · · · The Bible can fight its own battle in Christian countries, but when it is confronted by the unbelief of the pagan, the sword and the battle-ax are the most important handmaids of Christian civilization." There spoke the old evangelizing, crusader spirit that has made the Christian nations the bloodiest on earth. Mr. Flower is welcome to such "spiritual" or "'soul' kinship with the 'Prince of Peace.'" We prefer something a little less inflamed with the sanguinary hue of the missionary.

The Secular Principle of Government.—II.

The Christian Reformer quotes from our article of September 22d the sentences which follow: "The question of Sunday observance is one for private determination wholly, equally with that of baptism, partaking of the communion, respecting fast days, making pilgrimages to shrines, shaving the head, or saying grace at the table. The state has nothing whatever to do with any of these rites, ceremonies, and observances, beyond protecting all in the equal right to engage in or abstain therefrom." No attempt is made to prove that Sunday observance is not a religious rite, or that the other religious duties mentioned should not be made legally obligatory on dissentients, as the theocrats wish to make Sunday abstention from work and play. Instead of trying to show that they do not desire to violate the rights of conscience these representativs of the church party make a fierce onslaught on the principle of Secularism, without which, practically applied, there can be no security for those rights. Mattie A. Freeman's protest against "Christian dominance" and "Christian privilege" is quoted, but we look in vain for a word in disclaimer of the imputed desire to dominate over their fellow citizens, or to be the beneficiaries of privilege. It is plain that they are eager to lord it over those who do not share their belief, and to get for themselvs all the special favors they can wheedle or frighten the servants of the people into giving to them. Our readers will be interested in examining some of the Reformer's assertions concerning Secularism. It says:

"It would be folly for us to attempt to prove that the Constitution and government are Christian. Our opponents cannot be dislodged from the position they hav taken behind the Constitution. We must candidly admit that the fundamental law of the land is a secular instrument. It is constructed on the theory that government has nothing to do with God or his law. But after making this admission we must turn our guns on the theory of secularism. This theory is as false as anything ever promulgated by the father of lies. It is false whether viewed from the standpoint of political science, of history, or the Bible. The secular theory of government has not a single scientific truth to sustain it. No sound writer on politics believes it. All history is against it. No government could be formed on a purely secular basis. Constitutions may be written as though this theory were true, but practically no such constitution can be put into operation without virtually amending it by adding in practice portions of the true theory. Secularism never presided at the birth of a single nation, nor has it ever rendered service in rearing, guarding, and developing the institutions of any government. Secularism is a theory of anarchy and national ruin. While there is no thoroughly Christian government on earth to-day, there is none that is thoroughly secular. Such a monster could not exist. The only reason why existing governments do not fall to pieces is because there are in each of them some elements of the true theory of government by which they are held together. The chief thing for us to do is to demolish the secular theory of government, and reconstruct the Constitution on the Christian theory."

It is scientifically true that the mind of man can believe only as it is convinced by evidence. A man may profess to believe, but he does not really believe at the command of authority. This is the basic scientific fact that makes a state religion a crime against humanity. The chief function of such a religion is to breed hypocrits, that is, to promote immorality. It cannot be scientifically demonstrated that it is a legitimate and beneficent purpose of government to make men vicious and criminal, yet this is what it inevitably does whenever it tries to contravene the immutable laws of nature by putting its citizens in a position where they are expected to believe what appears to them to be unreasonable, absurd, or immoral. Men must grow into the truth if it is ever to become theirs. There can be nothing more unscientific than the attempt to legislate it into them. It is an aggravation of the evil to try to make them believe that which is doubted by some of the best thinkers, and to punish them if they cannot believe it.

Whether "any sound writer on politics" believes in the secular theory is a matter of opinion. It is our opinion that no writer who does not accept it can be thoroughly sound, but these two antithetical opinions should settle the question for no man or woman. Each must weigh the opposing arguments for himself.

All history tells us that the partnership of the ecclesiastic and the politician has been a robbers' league, a combination for wrong, first, last, and all the time. It has made of the priest an insolent inquisitor, of the official a torturing tyrant, of the people hypocrits, paupers, and slaves. The union of theology and politics has ever brought misery to the masses and swollen the unrighteous power of the few. That union has corrupted the priest and debased the politician. Such is the unvarying testimony of the ancient states, of Spain, of Portugal, of Germany, of France, of England, of Scotland, of Russia, of Mexico, of the United States.

This government was formed on a purely secular basis; its Constitution, as even its bitterest foes acknowledge, was written by those who had a clear perception of the ideas that are the roots of the tree of secular government. That this Constitution has not yet become practically operativ in all cases is due to the fact that we are not yet unburdened of the incubus of citizens who cling to theocratic ideals. The men who gave us the Constitution were exceptional men, men ahead of their age and of this age as well. Most of them knew what the union of church and state was and they were determined that the new nation should start right. Had they not feared the machinations of such traitors as are now striving to nullify their grand work they would not hav taken the remarkable precautionary measures that they did. They knew what the political priest had done and they knew that he would do it again if he could grasp the sword of power. The secular principle has been vindicated by our experience as a nation, although, as we are well and sadly aware, it has been "virtually" amended "by adding in practice portions of the" Christian theory, but that adulteration does not invalidate the secular principle. It merely proves that too many of the people are still dominated by superstition and that priests yet lust for the power which time-serving politicians are only too willing to giv them. No evil results hav followed the secular experiment except in so far as the secular principle has been disregarded and trampled at the instance of such marplots as the editors of the Christian Reformer.

Secularism has rendered a vital and inestimable service in developing and defending as well as in equipping this government with a model Constitution. It has done all for the nation that the ambitious and jealous priestly caste would permit it to do, and to-day it is menaced by that caste with more formidable weapons of siege and assault than they hav ever before been able to bring into the field. They keenly realize that they must overthrow the secular government soon or never.

Secularism is a theory of liberty and justice, therefore of order, peace, and individual and national prosperity. We say "therefore" because liberty and justice are the fundamental conditions of social order, and the "Christian theory" of a state-supported and state-enforced religion flatly denies both liberty and justice.

No, there is "no thoroughly Christian government on earth to-day"; if there were that nation would be a fearful illustration of what the whole of Christian Europe was in the "midnight of civilization," the Dark Ages. No, there is no government that is thoroughly secular, for there is no nation that is not infested with a self-seeking priesthood that is sure, or pretends that it is sure, that no people is safe which does not tax and coerce the heretic for the good of his soul and the aggrandizement of his persecutors.

The reason existing governments do not fall to pieces is because society is a primary necessity of man, and the poorest government performs in a very bungling and costly way some few of the functions of an orderly society. There can be no doubt the most despotic governments are held together to a great extent by the chains of superstition. But exactly in proportion as a people are intelligent and prosperous is a just government really strong, and the more intelligent a people are the more nearly secular their government will be. If the world is to continue to progress, the truth or falsity of religious dogmas must cease to be determined at the polls.

Christian Outrages in Maryland.

"The Signs of the Times, a Seventh Day Adventist paper, wants to know what we think of the fact that three men should now be lying in jail in the Commonwealth of Maryland for 'doing bodily labor on Sunday' in obedience to the dictates of their own conscience and their religious faith—one of them having been discovered plowing in his own field, a second setting out tomato plants in his own garden, and a third chopping wood at his own door. We answer that if it be true, as our contemporary tells us, that these were men who conscientiously observed the seventh day as their Sabbath, and who, in doing this work, disturbed nobody else, and were discovered at it only by persons spying out for the purpose of inquisition, then it is an outrageous injustice, an offense against freedom of worship, and ought not to be allowed by the laws of a reputable state."—New York Independent.

There are too many provisos in the Independent's answer. We now ask it to answer these questions: Can there be any real freedom to worship when the freedom to abstain from worship is denied? Is not the freedom to abstain from worship in effect denied when men are forbidden to do on Sunday those things which disturb "nobody else"? A necessary implication of freedom to abstain from worship is the liberty to do, on the day or days when others worship, such things as we wish to do instead of worshiping, subject to the same limitations that circumscribe our actions on the other days of the week and to such limitations only. If this is not based on equity, will you tell us why? If it was an "outrageous injustice" to imprison those three men in Maryland for working on Sunday if they had worshiped on Saturday, but was a just punishment of them if they had not worshiped on Saturday, what can you call laws that make such discrimination inevitable but laws directly designed to encourage and reward worship and punish non-worship? And is this anything other than union of church and state, and does the Independent champion such union? Do you still say that these men were punished not for failing to worship but because they worked on that day? But if the law under which they were punished was enacted in the interest of the church and to discriminate against people not holding to the strictly orthodox faith—as it was—what hav you gained by taking this line of defense? It still remains true that the law discriminates in favor of certain persons and against other certain persons, and all because they differ in religious belief or concerning religion. But if we cease to regard the religious aspect of the question we are at once prompted to ask what equity there is in imprisoning men for working on their own premises and confessedly without disturbing others? Will you say that they violated law? But it is the law that we are attacking and that you are defending, and we should hardly expect the Independent to try to escape from the consideration of the fundamental principle involved by pleading that the law punishes people for acting in a way that is perfectly innocent in itself. Christian martyrs were tortured in accordance with law, and slavery had the sanction of law, but that fact did not make either torture or slavery right. Those Adventists wronged no one, and as the essence of all crime is the wronging of others, it follows that they committed no crime, and therefore should not be punished.

The Independent declares that if the three Adventists had kept Saturday their imprisonment was "an offense against freedom of worship." Whether they had or had not kept Saturday their imprisonment was an offense against freedom of worship, and, still more broadly and inclusivly, it was an offense against the equal rights of the citizen, which rights include the right of freedom of worship.

Neither is it material whether their actions were discovered by "persons spying out for the purpose of inquisition" or by the people who were casually passing. The churchman need not say that the sight of the man working in his garden "disturbs" him on his way to church, for it is quite possible that the sight of the churchman on his way to the chapel "disturbs" the man at work in the garden. The law cannot properly take cognizance of such kinds of "disturbance" as this. In whatever light you view the persecution of the Adventists for Sunday working that persecution is seen to be "an outrageous injustice," "an offense against freedom of worship," and it would "not be allowed by the laws of a reputable state."

Four New Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty-five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also in press, and will be ready soon. The price of each will be twenty-five cents. They will be printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. Every one will want copies of these splendid addresses, and orders may be sent to us at once, and will be filled as soon as we get the books from the publisher.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week try to convince George Martin, editor of the Gazette, of Kansas City, Kansas, that he does not understand what Freethought is. In that paper of October 15th we are informed that Freethinkers compose "a bigoted, intolerant sect," whose objects are to abolish the church and the state and to abuse people who do not think as they do. Show him that we seek to educate Christians out of Christianity, not to abolish the church by law; that we wish to make the state absolutely secular in order that the equal rights of all may be secure, and that we discourage abuse, vituperation, and defamation. Send him the Demands of Liberalism and point out the encroachments of the church that render the Demands necessary. Let your letters, as always, be clear, courteous, and accurately written.

"The incarnation brought righteousness out of the region of cold abstractions, clothed it in flesh and blood, opened for it the shortest and broadest way to all our sympathies, gave it the firmest command over the springs of human action by incorporating it in a person, and making it, as has been beautifully said, liable to love."—Hon. Wm. E. Gladstone.

This is very well written, but it does not mean anything. Mr. Gladstone is an adept in that kind of composition when he attempts to elucidate theological problems.

Under the head of "Critical Notes" the Sunday School Times tells us that "the letters of the Greek word 'Ichthus' (fish) are the initials of the phrase, 'Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior.'" The story has certainly a fishy flavor, but we imagin that a really "critical" examination of the early history of Christianity would discover—yes, has discovered—many more mythological elements than the one indicated by the Times.

In England an attempt was made to revive a statute of George III. which made it an offense to lecture on Sunday if an admission fee was charged. The case was dismissed, Judge Mathews substantially deciding that the law is out of date. So one by one the old cob houses of superstition and privilege get rudely shaken. But disregard of bad laws is not repeal of them, and a foolish or bigoted judge and jury may put life into them at any time. They are harmless only after they are wiped off the statute books.

At the Christian Evidence meetings in Hyde Park, London, a letter, full of belief in the religion of the Christian, was read and then the audience was asked, "Do you know who wrote that?—Abraham Lincoln." The extract was from a letter written by Lincoln to his mother when he was nine years old! It thus appears that the same persons who reject the Freethinking ideas of Lincoln's manhood, on the plea that such notions were formed during the "veal" period, hav no hesitancy in accepting his judgment as a kid. The London Freethinker exposes this characteristic Christian "evidence."

The World thinks that it is nonsense to talk of having compulsory voting—"If good men and good citizens can be manufactured in that way, why not hav compulsory church attendance?" Well, that is what they did hav in the old Puritan days in New England, and it is what we shall hav again if the theocratic, Sabbatarian party is permitted to hav its way. Cannot the World see that there is but one step and that a short one from our present laws forbiding work and recreation on Sunday, which is done for the purpose of increasing church attendance, to laws directly compelling people to attend religious services? And more than this—the World should know that at least nine-tenths of our municipal corruption is due to the fact that we hav permitted the old Puritan spirit to dictate legislation. This is an age in which the people circumvent the attempts to make them moral and religious by law, and the way they do it is by bribing the officials.

One day last summer the Australian bushmen of Barnum & Bailey's circus wandered into a vacant lot at Bridgeport, Conn., and began throwing boomerangs in their marvelous way. It was Sunday, and thousands of people were on their way to church; they were attracted by the unusual display and stopped to look on, apparently temporarily forgetting all about their souls' necessities. But the police were not so absent-minded, for they stopped the playing and drove the crowds toward the churches. So the people went along meekly and listened once more to "the old, old story," although it is very probable that most of them would hav preferred to hav the show go right ahead. Each no doubt felt that he was able to take care of himself without the assistance or prompting of the police, but he doubted his neighbor's ability to attend to his own affairs, and so he was willing to let the Sunday law stand and see the ministers' rivals driven away. But when the police judge begins to fine him when he fails to go to church regularly he may conclude to wake up and assert his rights as against all the priests in Connecticut.

In the paper of this city formerly known as the Christian Union, but now called the Outlook, there recently appeared this advertisment:

"WANTED—A minister for a progressiv country parish. Must be young and married, a Republican, and interested in social and club work. Salary $1,200 and parsonage. An overgraduate preferred. Address Supply. Committee, Hartford, Vermont."

Not a word about his religious belief! His politics and his social qualifications alone seem to be of any interest to those Vermont Christians. Verily latter-day Christianity is of the world worldly. This advertisment seems to hav shocked the Christian Advocate and amused the Christian Register. The first mentioned paper says:

"Nothing is said about his success in saving souls, but he must vote the Republican ticket, and stand by that party even if it stands by the devil; and he must be interested in club work! How many churches are there that are advertising for the same sort of a minister nowadays, though a little less openly?"

The Christian Register thinks that the responses in that church should be altered to read: "God be merciful to me a Republican and a sinner!"

Katie Kehm Smith's report of the proceedings of the late Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union should be read by all Freethinkers. Our friends out there on the Pacific are taking hold of the work in a very practical way. They seem disposed to act as well as talk and, what is still more to the point, most of their talking is descriptiv of what they hav done. They hav been crippled by the lack of money, but they hav not allowed this to paralyze their activities, and hav accomplished more with a few dollars than many of us would hav thought could be done with hundreds. While self-helpfulness is nearly everything in the battle of life, it might be well to remember that many of the Oregon Liberals are pioneers in that country, and that they are trying to make homes for themselvs and their children, and so cannot do as much for Secular education as can those who hav weathered some of the storms that still beat about the heads of those heroic workers. In view of these facts it would not be amiss for well-to-do Freethinkers outside the state to lend them a helping hand in their most praiseworthy and necessary labors.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is winning golden encomiums from its readers. Among those who hav recently placed their opinions on record is our artist, Watson Heston, who writes us as follows:

"'Four Hundred Years' is a fine work and I am much pleased with it. Mr. Putnam deserves great praise for such an eloquent and graphic description of the progress of Freethought. The portraits and biographical sketches of so many leading Liberals is a pleasant feature of the work which all will appreciate. George E. Macdonald's poem on page 40 is a gem. May the muses never jilt him nor his Pegasus 'buck' with him. Yours as ever,

"WATSON HESTON."

Here is another subscriber who gets to thinking of the millennium of Freethought when he reads Mr. Putnam's book:

"SEATTLE, WASH., Oct. 17, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: Received 'Four Hundred of Freethought' and am just tickled to death with it.

"Yours for a millennium of Freethought,

"JOHN GRONOW."

We are still receiving orders for "Four Hundred Years" and sending them out promptly, as all the old orders were attended to some days ago. As the reading season draws nearer the demands for the book will increase and we may not be quite so prompt. But do not let this possible contingency alarm you—the book will be on its way in a few hours after your money reaches us. The club offer is still good—"Four Hundred Years" and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year for $6.50, or the book alone for $5.

News and Notes.

Ingersoll's lecture on "The Bible" was a great event in Chicago. Five thousand people were present, and applauded the most radical utterances of the supreme orator. They paid the closest attention to this masterly handling of a great theme—great because the Bible is the idol of so many millions of believers. If we say that anything of Ingersoll's is the best, where all is so entirely good, we might say that is the best lecture that Ingersoll has ever delivered; best in many respects; best in the matter contained, in its learning and literary merit; in its sublime eloquence; in its burning humanity and magnificent courage. It was a brave and splendid effort every way. It is unanswerable. It is crowded with facts; has a wealth of wit and pathos, and in the compass of its thought overarches eighteen centuries of human history. I believe Ingersoll touched every emotion in the unfolding of his vast and varied theme. His voice was clear and distinct, and reached and thrilled every heart with its dramatic intensity and changeful melody. His wonderful facility of holding the continuous attention of an immense audience was never more brilliantly displayed. For two hours and a half there was no faltering in the flow of speech or the rapt interest of the thousands of listeners. There seemed to be perfect harmony between the orator and that great mass of heart and brain before him which swayed to his living power. The glory of Freethought was never more fully expressed; and never has reason won a more noble triumph over ignorance and superstition. The lecture itself should be read by every Freethinker. It is an armory for future battles. It is compact. Every word counts. It is logic and history. It is a marvelous massing of evidence. It settles the question as to the authority of the Bible. It places it where it belongs. It is to Paine's "Age of Reason" what the shining dome is to the great temple. It completes the work. It givs Paine his noblest luster in that it adds to his labors the most searching scholarship of modern times, and an eloquence rivaled only by Shakspere himself. The poetic fire burns in every sentence—and yet the argument is as clear and strong as a legal document. I hope that this lecture, which cannot be equaled by any living writer, will hav a million readers. It should be distributed as widely as the Bible itself, and some day it will be the requiem of the Bible and the interpreter of its real worth to humanity.

I gave my lecture ("Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought") Sunday evening, October 13th, to a full house. There was a warm discussion after it, but the main points of the lecture were apparently acceptable to most of those present. In the world of universal ideas there is a harmony which is not discovered when we take a superficial view of these great movements. There are many differences as to phenomena and special doctrins; but unity exists in those things which attract and influence all intelligent and free minds.

I realize a growing interest in the coming Congress. The daily papers are taking interest in our work. We are making an impression which has not been felt before. Some are already on the ground from a distance, and we receive letters daily from those who promis to be present. When most of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER peruse these notes, the Congress will hav opened.

I am glad to see my book—"Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I hav waited as patiently as the rest for its appearance from the unknown recesses of the publishing department, and as it comes forth so beautifully arrayed I feel almost as if I were looking upon a new acquaintance. I hope my subscribers will like it, and feel, at any rate, they hav got their money's worth. If they find any failings in the book, they must remember that one man cannot do it all; and that one volume cannot contain all there is in the universe of Freethought. I hav tried to do my level best—writing more like a soldier in the field than a philosopher in his closet. I hav had to do most of my labors while on the march, but I believe, so far as the facts are concerned, I hav got them down in the right order, and given them their true meaning, and I can let this child of my brain go forth with a clear conscience.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Freethought Federation—Treasurer's Report.

We are still receiving contributions toward the expenses of the Congress. What is left over will be used to oppose the church in its endeavor to enforce the puritan Sunday law. It (the church) is making great efforts in this city. Please ask your Liberal friends to join the Federation. It costs nothing to become a member, and we want to increase the membership to a high figure in order that we may do more effectiv work.

C. SADAKICHI HARTMANN was the lecturer at the Manhattan Liberal Club on Friday evening, October 19th. The father of Mr. Hartmann was German and his mother Japanese and as a consequence he does not always attain to a complete mastery of our somewhat peculiar language, but he is an intelligent gentleman and a most eloquent and instructiv speaker. He had the close attention of his audience and received frequent, hearty, and enthusiastic applause. Both sides of the question of the nude in art were impartially presented, the first half of his lecture being a clear statement of the objections to the artistic representation of the unclothed human figure. Mr. Hartmann givs evidence of a very wide and full study of the artistic, literary, and musical history of the race. The space at our command for this purpose is not sufficient for a satisfactory synopsis of the lecture, and a brief paragraph or two would only travesty it. We shall reproduce here only a very few of his apt and striking sentences. In "this silent, severe country life" of New England "was born the enmity to the nude in art." "We cannot dispose of the Puritanic spirit by sneers at their narrowness and ignorance. Those pioneers fought against red Indians, wild beasts, and a still more tyrannical church." They were the product of their environment, in which art, as art, could hav no place. "That type of frugal life is a thing of the past." "Man must first be satisfied with himself before he can be satisfied with anything else." The Greeks could worship the nude—their climate permitted it—but here the necessity of clothing and Christian conditions are in the way. Walt Whitman was an exception; he had enough of the Greek spirit to appreciate the religious and artistic idea of nudity. "In the golden age of painting they used the golden tints, and they were made radiant by their environment. But now we hav gray, and gray means impotent. Violet is frozen blood—the blood of old men. It is the favorit color of the Chinese." "Modern painting endeavors to represent the multiform phases of modern life, and it represents intelligence, but the old inward harmony is lost." "Art is impossible without the nude." "The spirit of the nude always remains supreme in art." "Except at the seashore we never see the female human figure in natural movement and pose." "Art is no flirtation." Music may be erotic. "The drama should soothe and rest, not exhaust." "The Japanese hav no conception of the nude." Rabelais's philosophy was healthful. "He presented human life without blue pencil marks." "The best the world has it owes to the spirit of the nude." "Why do women paint such trifling things? The woman who can paint men as we hav painted women and paint women as we hav painted men will win immortality." To the Puritans: "You did not know that nature is art, religion is art. You renounced art and were therefore old when you were children." But we must forbear. T. B. Wakeman, Wilson McDonald, Cynthia Leonard, and Mr. Wilson spoke to the question with acceptance to the audience. Mrs. Leonard said that religious bigotry was the greatest obstacle to the nude in art, and she justly scored Parkhurst and his congeners. She said that they hav eyes that can never go beyond the immoral. On that alone their minds dwell. If God created man in his image, and if the nude is obscene, then we hav an obscene God. She spoke of the devils who interfere with all art in this city, and told of the censorship of the art schools.

The Oregon Convention.

In point of numbers, enthusiasm, and work accomplished, the Sixth Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union was a success.

The Convention was composed of eighty-six members, besides those from Forest Grove and vicinity. Rosburg, Wash., was represented by H. P. Andresen and daughter, Miss Lena, and Mr. and Mrs. O. C. Lee; Tillamook, Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Reynolds; Scappoose, John Price, Virgil S. Smith; Clatskanie, G. R. Higgins; Oregon City, Nettie A. Olds, D. W. Smith, Katie Kehm Smith; Corvallis, B. F. Hyland; Woodburn, R. H. Scott, Mrs. Ann Scott; McMinnville, Dr. A. K. and Mrs. M. J. Olds, E N. Ford, and W. T. Booth; Portland, W. W. Jesse, Chas. Hagner, H. E. Girard. Mrs. May Hagner, Gustav Hicketheir; North Yamhill, Mr. and Mrs. Lee Laughlin, Mrs. Stewart; Dilly, D. M. Dunbar, Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Dilly; Greenville, Asa Williams; Montavilla, Earnest Wright; Glencoe, Jacob Feuerstein; Buxton, Geo. L. Finch; Manning, L. F. Carstens.

The Convention was opened by President W. W. Jesse, with a brief address, reviewing the past work of the Union and its future plans. One of the most interesting features of this Convention was the music, both instrumental and vocal, furnished under the leadership of Miss Olds and Mrs. Barker, assisted by Professor Green, Mr. and Mrs. Wirtz, and the choirs of the Forest Grove and Portland circuits. Mrs. Barker's Juvenile Choir was a surprise to every one. It consists of nine of the brightest boys and girls, and their sweet young voices had been well trained; but perhaps the most important feature of the entire Convention was the practical illustration of conducting the Secular Sunday-school under the system inaugurated by the Oregon Secular Sunday-school Union, Mrs. Barker's Sunday-school being convened for this purpose. The visiting members were most enthusiastic in their praise of the Secular Sunday-school work as they saw it illustrated, feeling that at last there was some hope that Secularists in Oregon are working in the right direction. The exhibition of the Secular Sunday-school work was preceded by an able lecture by Miss Olds on "The Importance of the Secular Sunday school." The address was replete with splendid thoughts, and received much applause.

Another important address was that of Annie E. Barker on "Our Work and Our Workers," delivered Friday evening to a crowded house. In this address Mrs. Barker outlined the work of past conventions, showing how little was accomplished compared to work accomplished now under the present system of propagating Secularism. Her address also dealt extensivly with the history of the progress of religious thought from earliest times, and she was most warmly complimented. This address did much to awaken the members to the necessity of standing firmly on the lines of constructiv work inaugurated by the Oregon State Secular Union. Other addresses were: "Religion in South America," by Virgil S. Smith, who, having spent most of his life in that country, gave a most interesting account of the evil effects of both Catholicism and Protestantism; and the closing address by myself on "The Persistency of Fanaticism." Brief addresses were also made by B. F. Hyland, C. E. Reynolds, Mrs. Barker, Judge Smith, and others.

Interesting letters were received and read as follows: From S. P. Putnam, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, and S. C. Adams, of Salem. Saturday evening was devoted to a musical and literary entertainment followed by a dance.

An amendment to the by-laws was proposed by which membership fees and dues were to be charged, but after discussion it was the unanimous sentiment of the Convention that a free membership, as at present, would be more conduciv to the success of the Union; that what the Union needed was numbers; that if it had numbers it could more safely rely upon voluntary contributions from many than upon dues from a few, and the proposition to amend the by-laws was abandoned.

The secretary's report of work done during the year was read and adopted, and is, in substance, as follows:

To the members of the Oregon State Secular Union in Convention assembled: It is exceedingly gratifying to note the progress made by the Oregon State Secular Union since the last convention a year ago. At that convention was adopted, in part, the plans which, up to date, hav proven so successful and awakened new hope in hundreds of Secularists who had become discouraged, as they saw so little permanent work resulting from the large amount of money they had been contributing. The organization during the past year has been chiefly supported by those who understand the work as it is now being carried on. Scores of letters hav been received from stanch Secularists who, on account of the hard times, could not contribute money, but who are interested in the work and will contribute when they are able.

At the last convention the Oregon State Secular Union numbered thirty-one members. To-day it numbers four hundred and fifty-seven. Last year but one Secular Sunday-school had been organized—at Portland—and it had no regular lessons, nor did it hav a system as the Oregon State Secular Union has now formulated for the Secular Sunday-school. Since last convention circuits, or Sunday-schools, hav been organized in the following places: Portland, by Katie Kehm Smith; Forest Grove, by Annie E. Barker; Ranier, by Henry Addis; Shelton, Wash., by Mrs H. E. Shelton-Cyphert; Rosburg, Wash., Mr. and Mrs. O. C. Lee. These Secular Sunday-schools are supplied with constitution and by-laws, printed instructions for conducting the schools, lessons, opening and closing song, and Sunday-school poem by the state organization.

Many applications hav been received asking the Oregon State Secular Union to establish Secular churches and Sunday-schools, but remembering the fate of former Secular unions that hav been organized, and not put in charge of a leader or lecturer, the executiv committee decided that no charter should be granted unless a lecturer could be placed in charge whose business it should be to make his or her circuit flourish, these lecturers to be duly licensed by the Oregon State Secular Union. During the year the following persons hav been granted licenses to lecture under the auspices of the Oregon State Secular Union: Katie Kehm Smith, Henry Addis, Annie E. Barker, Virgil S. Smith. and Nettie A. Olds.

Since Feb. 18, 1894, Mrs. Barker has had charge of the Forest Grove circuit. For quarter ending April 2d, she reports six lectures at Forest Grove. For quarter ending July 1st. her report is as follows: Lectures at Forest Grove, 13; North Yamhill, 2; Dilly, 1; near Cornelius, 2; funeral addresses, 1. During this quarter she also organized the Forest Grove Secular Sunday-school, with an average attendance of about seventy members, and also the Ethical Society, auxiliary to the Secular Sunday-school.

Henry Addis reports that in February, 1894, he organized the Ranier circuit, with about forty members, and lectured twice a month for the society until June 3d, when he surrendered his commission as lecturer by reason of leaving the state.

Nettie A. Olds reports having lectured seven times as follows: At Portland, Forest Grove, Ranier, Rosburg, Astoria, Tillamook, and McMinnville. She has been superintendent of the Portland Secular Sunday-school since its re-organization last November, and leader of the choir of the First Secular church of Portland.

Since last convention I hav lectured as follows: For the First Secular church of Portland, 34 times; Forest Grove, 1; McMinnville, 4; Scappoose, 2; St. Helens, 1; Ranier, 1; Mayger, 1; Gray's River and Rosburg, Wash., 5; Astoria, 4; Tillamook, 3; Fairview, 1; Bay City, 2; Nehalem 1; Amity, 1; Sheridan, 1; Whiteson, 1; Dayton, 1; Total, 64, and funeral addresses, 2.

Since there are no Secular Sunday-school books or lessons printed, the lessons furnished the schools hav been composed by Mr. Smith and myself. I append to this report copies of twenty-eight lessons prepared for groups from nine to fifteen years old, also sample questions for group from fifteen to twenty-one years. With Miss Olds's assistance in the type-writing and cyclostyle work there hav been sent out from the secretary's office to Sunday-schools, and otherwise distributed, over 4,000 of these lessons; about 1,000 copies each of opening and closing song, and the Secular Sunday-school poem; 500 copies of Circular No. 1; 28 copies of Circular No. 2; 300 copies of Circular No. 3; 325 copies of No. 4; and 380 copies of No. 5, copies of which are hereto appended. I hav written and mailed since last convention. exclusiv of circulars and postal-cards. 474 letters, as shown by "Letter Memorandum" which I herewith submit.

Through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Brettel, the Ironclad Age, D. C. Hatch, and other friends, we hav been able to send out a large number of reform papers and pamphlets. The Oregon State Secular Union has received as a gift from David and Caroline Wittenburg, of New Era, Or., ten acres of land at that place for a Secular park.

September 10th Miss Olds, Mr. Smith, and myself finished a seven-week's tour of a portion of the state, the purpose of which was to explain the objects of the Union and its method of forming circuits and establishing Sunday-schools. During this time we lectured to thousands of people, the larger portion of whom never heard of the Oregon State Secular Union and its work.

The work is in a most prosperous condition, but to accomplish greater results we must hav more money. There has been no time during the year that the Union has not been indebted to Mr. Smith and myself for money advanced to pay necessary expenses.

Besides this, Mr. Smith, Miss Olds, and myself hav devoted substantially all of our time to the work, and I hope that every Secularist present will closely examin the details of the work.

Respectfully submitted, KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

The executiv committee reported the financial condition of the Union the past year as follows:

The executiv committee also submitted estimate for inclosing pavilion on park ground, $50; for sign on same, $10; for walk approach from river and railroad, $75, which was allowed by the Convention, or so much thereof as necessary, and referred to executiv committee to hav the work done.

Fifty dollars was voted the secretary for work of the past year. The bill of Wheeler & Sager, for balance due on lumber used for park pavilion, $68.46, was allowed and ordered paid. For this purpose $40.50 was contributed at once, as follows: Dr. and Mrs. Olds, $5; E. N. For', $5; Lee Laughlin, $10; Thos. Todd, $5; C. E. Reynolds, $5: Thos. Bellingher, $2; W. T. Booth, $1.50; Mrs. Lee Laughlin, $1; cash, $1; collection, $5. Besides, there was subscribed by R. H. Scott, $5; Chas. Hagner, $5. Secretary's bill for $19 70 for money expended over and above receipts as above, was allowed and ordered paid. The Convention assumed the indebtedness incurred by Charles Hagner and others, for improvements made upon the Oregon Secular Park, amounting, per bill rendered, to $72.60. The executiv committee also recommended an appropriation to supply the secretary's office with THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, IroncladAge, and Freethinkers' Magazine, for the ensuing the year, which on suggestion of D. M. Dunbar, of Dilly, was disposed of in the Convention by cash subscriptions, as follows: D. M. Dunbar, $1; Reynolds, $1; Hyland, 1; Scott, $1; Price, 50 cents; Cheney, $1; Hagner, 50 cents; Bisbee, $1; Andresen, 50 cents; Freeman, 75 cents; Wilkes, 25 cents.

The secretary, pursuant to instructions of the fifth annual convention to prepare lessons for the use of the Secular Sunday-school, submitted her report, accompanied by a series of twenty-eight leslons, for group from nine to fifteen years of age, and a series of other lessons for group from fifteen to twenty-one years, which, on motion, was referred to a special committee consisting of Nettie A. Olds, Annie E. Barker, Emma Lee, Lee Laughlin, and Chas. Hagner, to examin and report on the same. The committee reported as follows: "We recommend the adoption of forms as now used in the Secular Sunday-school and further recommend that after necessary revision they be embodied in quarterlies for use in the Secular Sunday-school." Report adopted.

Resolution of condolence dopted:

WHEREAS: Since our last convention death has entered the home of one of our estemed members, Robert Rankin Laughlin, of North Yamhill, an upright and honorable citizen, an intellectual and brave champion of the Secular cause, and by claiming him, as it eventually must each one of us in accordance with nature's undeviating laws, has deprived this Union and his highly respected and grief-stricken family of his cherished companionship, protection, and love; therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention tender to the relativs and friends of said member deceased, this token of its esteem and sympathy for them, and expression of our Union's inestimable loss.

Resolution of thanks adopted:

Resolved, By the members of the Oregon State Secular Union in Convention assembled, that the thanks of this Convention are due, and are hereby extended, to the citizens of Forest Grove and vicinity, and the members of the Forest Grove auxiliary to the Oregon State Secular Union, for their generous hospitality, and warm welcoming courtesies extended to the members of this Convention in so many ways; and particularly to those ladies who hav so faithfully and untiringly devoted their personal service, gratis, in preparing and serving excellent meals at their hall; and to all others who hav contributed to make our visit to Forest Grove so very pleasant.

The question of establishing a Secular College was discussed at length, and deep interest manifested, but it was thought that the condition of the Union at the present time would not justify taking immediate steps to found such a college.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, W. W. Jesse, Portland; 1st vice-president, Lee Laughlin, North Yamhill; 2d vice-president, B. F. Hyland, Corvallis; 3d vice-president, R. H. Scott, Woodburn; 4th vice-president, Nettie A. Olds, New Era; secretary, Katie Kehm Smith, Oregon City; treasurer, C. E. Reynolds, Tillamook. A special circular was authorized sent out by the secretary, soliciting funds to defray the expenses of representativs of the Oregon

State Secular Union to be appointed by the executiv committee to attend the legislature at its next session to procure legislation for the taxation of church property, etc.

NOTES.

President Jesse obtained from the Southern Pacific Railroad, on all its lines, reduced passenger rates, which was a great saving to many members attending the Convention.

The oldest Secularist in the state is Dr. A. K. Olds, who, though 85 years old, took part in a quadrille, giving an interesting exhibition of how people danced to time in his youth. The presence of Dr. and Mrs. Olds was in itself a great help to the Convention.

The funny man was C. E. Reynolds, coroner of Tillamook county, and present treasurer of the Union. His forte is singing comic songs. He is a splendid worker, too, and will make an efficient officer.

This report is already long, which forbids full mention of the labors of all who contributed to make the Convention a success, but I cannot conclude without giving special mention to the work of Annie E. Barker, through whose untiring labors, the Forest Grove auxiliary has been organized. It is well to rembember the Hypatias of the past but I believe it is better to help the Hypatias of the present. Besides her splendid address, Mrs. Barker arranged nearly all the details of the Convention; trained her juvenil choir; took part in nearly all the songs, and devoted her time and strength to making others comfortable and happy. Her gentleness, her strength of character, her good judgment and her interest in others, won for her the admiration of every member of the Convention.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

Professor and Pupil.

If Professor Peck will giv me his attention for a few moments I will recite my lesson, beginning with the axioms:

1. It is far better to think without talking than to talk without thinking.

2. A man who cannot reason cannot be convinced by reason.

3. A man who can talk without advancing an argument is incapable of appreciating an argument.

4. A man who studies but one side of a question is the most positiv man in the world.

Should any error be found in the foregoing I call for correction, desiring that all be perfect for the purpose of reference.

"It is a claimed that a [protectiv] tariff enriches a country and givs the workingman better wages. Then it must follow that to lower the [protectiv] tariff would tend to impoverish the country and reduce wages."

Exactly; that is the law of cause and effect.

"Why don't these high-tariff men emigrate to Mexico?"

This shows the subterfuges to which free-traders must resort and the justice of their comparisons. Apparently Mr. Peck has never heard that Mexico is one of the most thoroughly priest-ridden countries of the world. Were I so straitened for an argument I might well retort by asking why these free-traders do not emigrate to Ireland. They would find a paradise of free trade there. A comparison between America and Ireland is as fair and just as between England and Mexico.

The professor next tells of a horse-trading friend of his who, being an unknown quantity, may be named X. Mr. X went to Canada and purchased horses, etc. This places me in something of a dilemma; to accept this account of that transaction one must seriously question the common sense of Mr. X, while to reject it would be equally severe on Mr. Peck's veracity. What then am I to do? Nothing but to compromise the matter by concluding that by talking without thinking (Axiom 1) Mr. Peck has innocently done his friend a great injustice. There is a very old story of a man who joined a horse to a cart, but failed to get them in working order. This is precisely what Mr. X is accused of doing. According to the professor the horses cost so much in Canada; duty and other expenses so much; therefore, in order to realize a reasonable profit, they must be sold for so much. But we are at once constrained to ask: Suppose American horse-buyers refuse to pay so much, what then? Home-bred horses, equally good, may be sold at much lower rates; then Mr. X must sell at a loss or hav his stock left on his hands. But I decline to assume that Mr. X is such a thorough fool as to try to do business in the suicidal manner here represented or he must long since hav landed in a poor-house or a lunatic asylum. I venture to guess that he pursued a course exactly opposit in all respects to that given by his well-meaning (Axiom 2) but misguided friend. He reasoned thus: I can sell these horses in America for so much, duty and other expenses so much; therefore the Canadian breeder must sell them to me for so much or look elsewhere for a purchaser.

This rule must govern dealings of every kind, and the man who would undertake to conduct horse trading, or any other business whatever, on the opposit plan, as given by Mr. Peck, is simply a —well, I hav my opinion of him. In this case of horse trading the duty was not added to the price of the goods, but was subtracted from what would otherwise hav been the foreign price. But the professor triumphantly asks:

"Now who paid the duty? How far does my argument fall?"

It falls low as absurdity can carry it. The McKinley law placed a duty of thirty cents per bushel on barley, whereupon Canadian barley promptly dropped thirty cents. The McKinley law also placed a duty of thirty-two cents per gallon on linseed oil; and in 1892 Cincinnati papers quoted linseed oil at thirty-four cents per gallon. I need a lesson in arithmetic ere I can understand how the consumer paid this duty? Was oil really worth but two cents per gallon?

"Why do consumers smuggle goods?"

Simply because protection reduces the foreign price sufficiently to make smuggling profitable (Axioms 1 and 4).

"For these changes we are indebted to Yankee skill and Yankee ingenuity, and not to any change in the tariff."

A change in the tariff stimulated home production, causing an increased demand for labor, thereby raising the price of labor, to save which Yankee ingenuity was brought into use, thereby cheapening goods to the consumer (Axiom 2).

"So far as any argument is concerned, he might as well hav filled the space with ciphers."

No doubt of it. Facts and ciphers hav about the same value to the average free-trader, therefore "we differ as to what constitutes argument." This "hifaluten" is simply a statement of three collectiv facts, each containing a thousand individuals, the enumeration of which is prevented merely by the lack of space and the labor of writing.

"Why should not New England levy a tax on Western pork and beef and grain?"

New England would certainly be benefited thereby, but at the expense of the West, which is a part of our own country. The different states do not seek to enrich themselvs at the expense of each other, but are not so considerate with aliens. I hav delayed writing this in order to see the latter part of the professor's letter, but it was time wasted, as I find two columns of theory relieved by just one fact:

"A Dutch vessel sailed into Boston harbor with copper on board to resheathe the vessel," etc.

We must grant that in this instance the tariff deprived a few Boston laborers of a few days' employment. It is possible that another instance of the kind has occurred in our history, but I take the liberty of doubting it. That Dutchman was an ignoramus; first, beccuse he did not know that America imposed a tariff; and second, because he did not know that, owing to higher wages, he could get the work done anywhere else in the world for less money without considering the tariff, but for this one instance Mr. Peck would close every copper mine in the United States.

"We can beat the world making watches," etc.

Very true, but we did not beat the world nor even little Switzerland until after we had placed a duty on watches. It is a most singular coincidence that Yankee skill and Yankee ingenuity do not go into the world-beating business until after we hav a tariff. Watches and printing paper hav been manufactured for centuries. I attended school in Cincinnati, in a district containing over four hundred pupils, of whom one hundred ranged from twelve to eighteen years of age, and the hero of that school was the one boy, son of a wealthy lawyer, who could tell us the time of day. At the present time ninety of that hundred would hav watches. The McKinley law is dead. Under the new law, wool is free, and the duty on woollen manufactured goods is greatly reduced. We shall now hav a chance to see the effect of free trade on one article. I predict that in 1896 wool will be higher than in 1893, and that little or no wool will be grown in America.

A suit of woollen clothing will cost Mr. Peck as much or more in 1896 than it it did in 1892. Millionaires will be richer and the poor will be poorer in 1896 than ever before. In 1897 an extra session of Congress will be called by a protection president to relieve this nation of the most terrible distress in its history.

But the fulfillment of the foregoing predictions will not influence free-traders. Demonstration weighs nothing against their assertions. Facts cannot avail against theories.

The questions propounded by D. Webster Groh are not entirely consistent in themselvs. Some of them are based upon assumptions which the protectionist does not and cannot grant and can be answered simply by denying the premises. These are numbers 3, 5, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19. The other answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Previous to the Homestead strike, Carnegie had, by founding libraries and other private gifts, demonstrated that he was a protectionist purely for the benefit of his employees. Since the strike he is so embittered against laboring men that he is now a free-trader.

4. We prefer not to "pay" foreigners, but to produce our own goods.

6. This order was inverted to conform to existing conditions—the more labor, the more duty.

7. This is not a protection measure, but owing to the small protection majority then in Congress this provision was inserted as a compromise.

8. Sugar tariff is not protectiv.

9. No one can be expected to seriously consider this question.

10. No.

12. Same as No. 4.

13 Yes; except for revenue purposes.

18. Because of her enormous export trade, forced upon India and other possessions. British bayonets compelled China to buy British opium. British bayonets would also compel America to buy British goods, but for a wholesome respect for American bayonets.

My shoulders are broad and can bear a great deal, but my time is limited, and so far as I am individually concerned, this discussion is closed.

There are hundreds of Liberals, including Ingersoll, Denslow, and many others, who are avowed Protectionists, and who do not resent the calumny of "bleeding," "fleecing," "pirates," "robbers," etc., and I shall not. I do not accuse Mr. Peck of any ungentlemanly language, but I do accuse him of studiously avoiding facts. My article of August 25th remains unanswered, my questions ignored.

The success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its most liberal editor is my earnest desire.

A Correction.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Sir: In your issue of October 13, 1894, page 648, entitled "Observations," it is reported that I met the Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., and made some comments on his fish story published in the papers several weeks ago. The report was not exactly made of whole cloth, but it shows that some Liberal has an imagination about as poetic as fishermen, and, like them, subject to inspirations. Perhaps it took several to complete that report. I hav not spoken with Mr, Dixon since his fish story appeared, but there is this much of truth in THE TRUTH SEEKER'S story: I said to a company of friends that if I should meet Mr. Dixon I would joke him about his big fish story, saying, "I took it all in and believed it; not that I supposed preachers always tell the truth, but that I know fishermen always do" The case exemplifies the old saying, that a story never loses anything in traveling. The fact is, I would discount Mr. Dixon's words but little as a preacher. He givs more than two-thirds truth, and sometimes nine-tenths, while one-third is a large allowance from a pulpit, and one-tenth about the average. I know of no preacher who utters so large a proportion of truth, and who so courageously opposes ecclesiastical authority and superstition, and declares his belief in and sympathy with Liberal thought. In fact few Liberals surpass him in this, and many of them might take lessons of Liberal teaching from him. It is due to me, and I think to Liberals in general, that this correction should be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for otherwise Mr. Dixon and his friends would think me, or some of us, more inspirable than the biggest teller of fish stories.

DR. CALEB S. WEEKS.

Cannot All See This?

The controversy over religious teaching, stirred up by the clerical party on the London School Board, should materially aid the cause of secular education. It is all very well to contend that there are thousands of schools in which unsectarian religion is taught. It is only unsectarian in the sense that the peculiar tenets of no particular Protestant sect are taught, but only the general principles of Protestant Christianity. But then Protestantism, and even Christianity for that matter, is but a sectarian religion. To teach any form of religion involves the teaching of a belief in the divinity of persons in whose divinity, or existence even, millions do not believe.—Justice, of London.

The Religious Conspiracy in the American Republic.

OPENING ADDRESS AT THE NATIONAL FREETHINKERS' CONGRESS, OCTOBER 26TH, BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is undoubtedly true that there is a vast combination of religious forces going on in this country which threatens the liberty of the republic. It may not be a conscious conspiracy; the forces come together rather by natural and logical attraction than by definite forethought; but it is nevertheless a conspiracy, for it is a union of forces for one common purpose—the destruction of civil rights. It is a combination to thwart the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Let us look first at the attitude of the Romish church. Let us consider its own public and authorized statements.

It must be understood that the government of the Romish church is an oligarchy—the college of cardinals, under the form of the one-man power, the pope. There is no authority whatsoever in the masses of the members of that church, or in the priests or bishops or archbishops, but the authority, the source of all law, the fountain of all policy, of all doctrine, is in the college of cardinals, except an occasional ecumenical council, which council is practically the child of the college itself.

Furthermore, the Romish church has always claimed to hold political power. In fact, we might say that the Romish church, as a differentiation and evolution from primitive Christianity, started as a political power, and is essentially a political power; and stripped of all political powers it would cease to be. We must deal with it not simply, therefore, as a spiritual power, but as a political organization with political purposes.

The Baltimore convention, held a few years ago, sufficiently indicates the tendency and the final goal of the Romish church in this republic.

It must be noted that there is something remarkable about this convention. It is a "new departure." It is a convention of laymen. Such a convention has never been held before in the history of the Romish church. It is contrary to the original policy of that church. Why a convention of laymen, seeing that laymen can exercise no authority? The laymen are taught to be submissive to the priests. So far as the church is concerned, they can have no ideas or policy of their own. They can dictate nothing.

In this American republic, however, the Romish church desired, with the cunning of a fox, to take on the appearance of democracy. It wanted to make it appear that the laymen had something to say, although, as a matter of fact, they had nothing to say. It was a shrewd trick, and I presume that many have been led astray by it, and have an idea that the Romish church is becoming imbued with democratic ideas, and that the laity will be allowed some voice in the authority of the church; which, of course, will never be the case. So long as the Romish church endures, so long will no particle of authority pass from the grasp of the college of cardinals.

But while the Baltimore convention cannot be looked upon as the source of any new law or policy in the church of Rome, it can be accepted as an authoritative interpretation of what the church is, and what it purposes to do. For the convention was manipulated by the cardinals and simply expressed the will of the cardinals.

What, therefore, are expressed in the resolutions of the Baltimore council, and what therefore is the voice of the Romish church in the American republic? First is this declaration:

> As in the state schools no provision is made for teaching religion, we must continue to support our own schools, multiply and perfect colleges and universities already established and others, so that the benefits of a Christian education may be brought within reach of every Catholic child within these United States.

Here is a distinct declaration of the undying hostility of the Romish church to the common school system of this republic. This is a question of immense importance. The common schools are the bulwark of the republic. There must be universal intelligence among the people. The common schools must be purely secular. They cannot teach religion, for, as Madison says, "religion is beyond the purview of government." "Religious training," as Grant says, "is for the homes and churches and schools supported by private funds, but not for the state schools."

Three methods are resorted to by the Romish church to destroy the state secular schools.

First, to connect religious exercises with these schools, and so practically to make them church schools. Wherever possible it puts its own teachers, nuns, etc., in the schools for the express purpose of religious training. In this way it favors a dangerous union of church and state. It makes the school an instrument in the hands of the church.

Secondly, wherever possible, the Romish church seeks a division of the school funds, so that its church schools shall be supported out of the taxes paid by all the people. If this plan succeeds, the common schools are absolutely destroyed.

Thirdly, in school districts where the members of the Romish church are in a majority, they vote to giv no funds to support the common school; and of course the common school is suspended and the parochial school is established in its place.

In these ways the Romish church endeavors to uproot and destroy the greatest support of American liberty and progress. This is its declared intention.

The New York Evening Post says:

> The Roman Catholics of the Northwest appear to be making a carefully planned war upon the public schools. In one district in the town of Barton, Wis., the Catholics rallied in force at the annual meeting and carried a resolution that no public school should be maintained during the year and none was held. At Melrose, Minn., the Catholic priests engineered a movement to shorten the school year of the public schools, in order to compel children to attend a parochial school. In Stearns county, Minn., the Roman catechism is said to be taught openly in the public schools, and either the opening or the closing hours of the session are devoted to religious instruction given by the priest.

In its very nature the church of Rome is opposed to state secular schools, and it will never cease its determined opposition and subtle undermining.

Again, says the Baltimore convention: "There are many Christian issues in which Catholics could come together with non-Catholics and shape civil legislation for the public weal."

This is a new and memorable innovation in the policy of the church of Rome. Hitherto there has been an impassable chasm between it and other Christian churches. It has not allowed that there are any Christian churches or bodies except the Catholic church, which very name means the universal and only church. For centuries there has been a bitter conflict between the church of Rome and all Protestant sects. And now it holds out the olive branch. It desires to unite with all other Christian bodies. And for what purpose? To shape civil legislation, that is, to unite church and state. Can we be any longer blind to the purposes of the Romish church when it thus publicly offers alliance with its enemies of over three hundred years in order to control legislation in this republic—to make the combined church powers omnipotent over the civil power?

And the Protestant churches gladly welcome the alliance. Says the Christian Statesman: "Whenever they—the Roman Catholics—are willing to coöperate in resisting the progress of political Atheism, we will gladly join hands with them."

The compact is already made. Are we to let this "unholy alliance" triumph?

Again says the Baltimore convention, "We protest against the assumption by any secular government of a right to affect the interests or control the action of our holy father by any form of legislation or other public acts to which his full approbation has not been previously given." Here is a claim for supreme political authority in the American republic, that the supreme pontiff shall possess the veto power, and that there shall be no legislation to which his "full approbation has not been previously given." And will not this claim be enforced wherever possible? Is it a mere idle declaration? Does not the church of Rome mean what it says? The church of Rome does not utter in this public manner a meaningless formula. It will claim pre-eminent political authority in this republic when the time comes. It is simply waiting. It has resigned none of the sovereignty it has ever held. It has ruled kings and princes and it means to rule the American people.

Says the Pope in his encyclical letter:

> All Catholics must make themselves felt as active elements in daily political life in the countries where they live. They must penetrate wherever possible in the administration of political affairs.

Need there be anything further said to show that the Romish church as an organization under the absolute control of the college of cardinals is opposed to American liberty? I do not say that the masses of the Catholics of this country are in sympathy with these purposes. They are simply blind and unintelligent. They do not know what is going on. They do not understand the logic of it. I am very sure that if there ever should come a direct conflict between the church of Rome and the American flag the majority of our Catholic fellow-citizens will stand by our flag. I will not vote against a man simply because he is a Catholic. But if he practically indorses and labors to carry out in political life the declarations of the Baltimore convention, then I must oppose him, for he is the opponent of liberty. He has joined the conspiracy against the republic.

Let us look further and see what the Protestant churches are doing in favor of this great conspiracy for the union of church and state. The National Reform Association, which, as Dr. Foote says, by good rights should be called the National Deform Association, is organized for the special purpose of putting "God" into the Constitution, and it has been laboring in this direction for over thirty years. The following is what it desires to put into the Constitution:

> We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler among the nations, his revealed will as the supreme law of the land, in order to constitute a Christian government, etc.

What is the logical result of this amendment? Says the Christian Statesman:

> To be perfectly plain, the existence of a Christian Constitution would disfranchise every logically consistent Infidel.

What is the spirit of this amendment? It is the following from the Christian Statesman:

> Give all men to understand that this is a Christian nation; and believing that without Christianity we perish we must maintain by all right means our Christian character. Inscribe this character on our Constitution. Enforce upon all that come among us the laws of Christian morality.

Again:

> If the opponents of the Bible do not like our government and its Christian features let them go to some wild and desolate land, and in the name of the devil and for the sake of the devil subdue it and set up a government of their own on Infidel and Atheistic ideas, and then, if they can stand it, stay there till they die.

This is the gospel of peace on earth, good will to men. How literally they fulfill the words of Jesus, "I came not to bring peace on earth, but a sword."

Are they not hand in hand with the terrific despotism of Rome?

The American Sabbath Union is another powerful organization for the enforcement of religious legislation. By its unjust and demoralizing methods it compelled the late Congress to violate the Constitution and pass a law to close the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday. It is endeavoring to concentrate political power at Washington in order to enforce a puritanic Sabbath all over the country. It has introduced a bill for this purpose, and a great conflict is before us on this question. The following is one of the provisions of that bill. A more outrageous law cannot be conceived.

> SECTION 5. That it shall be unlawful to pay or to receive payment or wages in any manner for service rendered or for labor performed or for the transportation of persons or property in violation of the provisions of this act, nor shall any action lie for the recovery thereof, and when so paid, whether in advance or otherwise, the same may be recovered by whosoever shall first sue for the same.

Think of it! In this American republic a man is not to receive payment for an honest day's labor; and if he does receive payment, anybody can sue for it and get it! For instance, a free American citizen, for the sake of his wife and little ones, works on Sunday and gets paid for it, say in advance, on Saturday night. Monday morning a tramp comes along, hears of the transaction, sues for that man's wages and gets them by this law. Can Siberia produce a worse act of tyranny than this?

The American Sabbath Union is indeed a fit companion of the Spanish Inquisition. It will light the fires of persecution all over our land. It conspires with old Rome against American liberty and progress. The Women's Christian Temperance Union also joins in this conspiracy. It is a political organization playing into the hands of Rome and it purposes to destroy our republican institutions. This is what it says:

> A true theocracy is yet to come; hence I pray devoutly as a Christian patriot for the ballot in the hands of women, and I rejoice that the National Women's Christian Temperance Union has so long championed this cause.

The National Women's Christian Temperance Union in 1888 passed the following resolutions:

> Resolved, That Christ and his gospel as universal king and code should be sovereign in our government and political affairs, and that obedience to his law is the only path to political righteousness and peace.

Again:

> WHEREAS, God would have all men honor the son even as they honor the father; and
> WHEREAS, The civil law which Christ gave from Sinai is the only perfect law that will secure the rights of all classes; therefore,
> Resolved, That civil government should recognize Christ as the moral governor, and his law as the standard of legislation.

Is there need of anything further to show that the Women's Christian Temperance Union is in conspiracy against the American republic; that it is opposed to the Declaration of Independence; that it would in fact revolutionize our whole form of government and put us under the feet of Rome?

The National Prohibition party is also the hanger-on of imperial Rome, and justifies every despotism of the past, and is the opponent of liberty. A more un-American party does not exist.

This is its platform:

The Prohibition party, in convention assembled, reverently recognize Almighty God as the supreme ruler to whose laws all human laws should conform.

This just suits Rome. This just suits every tyrant—every oppressor of humanity—every persecutor. It is the quintessence of kingcraft—of priestcraft—of all that has ruled and ruined the world.

The Declaration of Independence says: "The just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed." And Abraham Lincoln declares: "The government is of the people, by the people, for the people." The preamble of the Constitution says: "We the people of the United States." God is nowhere to be found. The Prohibition party should emigrate to Siberia and join hands with the czar. There is no place for it in free America. Cold water is a good thing, and temperance is a good thing, but there is no place for "God" in our politics.

I am sorry that the Farmers' Alliance has drifted into religious fanaticism and followed in the wake of Rome. The National Alliance at Ocala, Fla., adopted the following resolution:

Resolved: That we, the National Farmers' Alliance of America, believing that obedience and veneration for the laws of God are the conserving and saving force of human government, do hereby respectfully request that the directors of the great national fair do not desecrate the American Sabbath by keeping open the gates of the same on the Lord's day.

We are in sympathy with the main objects of the Farmers' Alliance, but these objects are economic and not theological. The Christian Sabbath is not a "divine institution." It is not recognized by the Bible or early Christianity itself. There is no "law of God" about it. It is the creation of the church of Rome. Luther did not believe in it, nor Calvin. It originated with an edict of Constantine in the year 321. Why does the Farmers' Alliance thus falsify history and betray the principles of liberty? How can they expect to win justice for themselves while they thus commit themselves to the ignorance and injustice of history?

The Populist party has shown itself to be equally unwise in putting "Almighty God" in its platform. In this it has shown a greater superstition than the old parties. What has "God" ever done for the salvation of the human race? What has he ever done for the removal of injustice, wrong, and crime? In the American republic the shadow of God ought to forever depart. Political economy has nothing to do with theology and metaphysics. If the Populist party put "God" into its platform what guarantee have we that it will not endeavor to put "God" into the Constitution? If this is to be the party of the future it certainly must hav nothing to do with the superstitions of the past.

Finally, the "Whitecaps" hav joined in with the church and state party, and instead of a government of the people, want a government of God. One of their notices recently posted up reads as follows: "God hates liars and perjurers and adulterers; the Whitecaps are the Lord's chosen people to wreak his vengeance on the wicked and the unjust."

Such are the many forces and tendencies at the present day combining against the Secular Republic. The issue is being forced upon us, and sooner or later we must meet it in the arena of political life. Says the Rev. Sam Small:

I want to see the day come when the church shall be the arbiter of all legislation, state, national, and municipal; when the great churches if the country can come together harmoniously and issue their edict, and the legislativ powers will respect it and enact it into laws.

Such is the enormous tyranny proposed by the religious party to-day—a tyranny greater than exists anywhere on the globe. In the old countries, where a union of church and state exists, the state is supreme; it is the controlling power, and there is some chance of improvement, for the state as a human institution will feel the breath of civilization. Even the state of Russia grows better, and as the state improves it takes the church along with it, being superior to the church.

But the proposed union of church and state in our country is of a vastly more tyrannical character; for it is proposed to make the church itself supreme and the state subordinate. The state is to be an instrument in the hands of the church—a mere puppet. We may then expect an iron rule indeed, the dark ages over again. The church will never improve. It is incapable of any advance. It is fastened to a "divine revelation," which revelation ceased to be of any living value eighteen centuries ago. Revealed theology can never progress. It is a fixed quantity. It is opposed to all change; to all advancement. Such has been its history. It has opposed every science, invention, and discovery. It has kept the human race in bondage and in ignorance. It has been a prison-house for humanity. It has been the tyrant of heart and brain, the enemy of human joy, of human genius, of human brotherhood and human rights. Such is the monstrous power that under new conditions is seeking a far greater sway than ever before. The evidence is plain and conclusive in its unswerving purpose.

The church is not civilized. It never will be civilized. It is to-day the same savage power it ever was, the same wild beast of destruction. It is the eternal foe of liberty. It is a manifold and subtle power. It is imbedded in the ignorance and superstition of the race. It loves darkness rather than light. It moves in the shadow of conspiracy. It may have music and art, and the embellishments of civilization; but these do not change its nature. They only cover over and help to make us forget its cruelty and injustice. Let us learn the lessons of history and be watchful of the priceless inheritance of liberty. Ours is the land of noble and beautiful promise. Never was there a grander opportunity for the establishment of liberty and justice. May the American people heed the warning lights and steer from the breakers.

Sail on, O Union strong and great,
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate.
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee.

Sparks from the Lecture Field.

The proclivities of the Christian clergy in the direction of prevarication are so well known that they hav now become proverbial. Pious falsehoods seem to be almost as indigenous as vegetation and even more so, for vegetable matter will flourish only in proper soils, while Christian lies will take root and grow anywhere.

Once a man is given to lying, his general testimony is discredited and we are naturally placed in a state of doubt concerning the truth of any and all statements he may make. Of all the preachers in this class, there is one in Cincinnati, Johnston Myers by name, who conducts the "New Jerusalem special" from the Ninth street Baptist church. This man sought to gain notoriety by making a virulent attack upon Colonel Ingersoll. His attack was loaded with the usual abuse common to the clergy, and it teemed with invectiv. So severe was he in his denunciation of the Colonel and those who had the courage to openly sympathize with the views he had expressed, that the Ohio Liberal Society felt called upon to make a public rejoinder to what he had said. As I was lecturing for the Society we agreed to adopt this method of making a reply, not as apologists for the Colonel, as he is well able to defend himself, but to put the matter in a true light before the public. In consequence of the prolonged discussions in the press, the subject had attracted considerable attention and the result was the largest audience with which the Society had ever been favored.

My lecture was on "Infidelity and Suicide" and in the reply I made I started from the text upon which Myers had preached, "And he went out and hanged himself." The press gave us good and prominent reports. Apropos of my reply, Myers was interviewed by a representativ of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette and the interview was published, together with a report of my lecture. This is from the report:

Mr. Myers, when spoken to about it last night, said he did not care what the Liberal Society, or any expounder of its doctrins, said about him, and he did not think the public cared any more than he did. He said that since he had preached his sermon on Infidelity and suicide, he had been hearing a good deal more from members of this society. They had been sending him printed pamphlets, letters under seal, and postal cards, calling him all sorts of names and accusing him of all sorts of things. Some of these postal cards were too indecent for publication, and the very worst of them, he regretted to say, had been sent, not to him, but to his residence, addressed to Mrs. Myers. They were signed, "A Member of the Ohio Liberal Society." These insulting cards had come in such numbers that he had felt called upon to refer them to the post-office authorities, and many of them are now in the hands of Post-office Inspector Salmon. Mr. Salmon, however, after as full an investigation as could be given an anonymous communication, says that the prospects of finding the writer are not encouraging; that, however much the writer may be in favor of liberty of thought, he is too big a coward to let himself be known and take the consequences of his violation of the rules of decency and the regulations of the post-office department.

Upon reading this, I immediately became filled with grave doubts as to the truth of what he had said. I hav known the members of the Ohio Liberal Society since the moment of its inception, and from my acquaintance with them, I also knew that none of them would be guilty of sending such communications through the mails. So, armed with this knowledge and conviction, I made it my especial duty to call upon Post-office Inspector Salmon, in company with Andrew Hogg, that we might obtain a denial or a verification of such reports. We were fortunate in our efforts, for the result of the interview was that both the inspector and his assistant were positiv in their assertions that no such cards were in their possession now, or ever had been. These gentlemen denied all knowledge of such mail matter as this of which Myers had spoken. This was just what we had expected, so, provided with this testimony, Mr. Hogg and I at once repaired to the office of the Gazette that we might see the editor, lay the facts before him, and request a vindication of the Liberal Society. At the editor's request we sat down at an adjoining desk and wrote out our statement. This was signed by Mr. Hogg and myself, the editor read it over in our presence, expressed his satisfaction with the article, and declared his intention of giving it publication. Eight days hav passed since then and our letter has not yet appeared. The cowardly editor has failed to correct the error, atone for the wrong he has done, and show up the true character of this preacher.

Who can speak of the honesty of our public press? What feelings can we hold toward the clergy but those of utter contempt? A silent falsehood is as far from the truth as a spoken one. To conceal the truth is as much a crime against the community as a deliberate falsehood. Of such ignoble conduct both the editor and the preacher stand convicted before the world. Neither has had the honesty to make even a semblance of an excuse for what they hav both said and done. Such is the character of these men who pose as instructors in public morals and through the position they each occupy endeavor to mold public opinion.

If this preacher is sincere in his belief in the eternal justice of the God he worships, what does he think will be his thoughts as he stands before that judgment bar? "Lord, Lord, I did it for thy sake and for thy glory" may satisfy his craven mind, but it will not meet the demands of an intelligent community. Truly, he is a worthy disciple of the old Jehovah, who is accused of speaking falsely concerning those of a different faith, for this man Myers is given to the same vicious practice. But what a terrible example it is! When the Christian's God and his clergy both indulge in falsehood what are we to expect from their lay followers?

There is a perceptible improvement in all our business circles here. Trade seems to hav generally revived from the late stagnation and this fills us with better hopes for the coming winter's work. The first two lectures of the season here hav been given before large audiences. The society has moved to more spacious quarters and still the place is filled each Sunday night. A new and increasing interest seems to hav been awakened here in the work of Freethought, and the outlook appears bright and encouraging. Since coming here I hav received invitations to lecture at different points in the immediate vicinity, also at Grafton, W. Va., and Augusta, Ky., all of which will be accepted in due time.

Although the effects of the late depression are still felt in many quarters, there seems to be a great interest prevailing in the work of the coming Congress. This looks well, and each one should do his or her part to make the effects of that work more general and more lasting.

Letters of Friends.

One of the Necessaries of Life.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Nov. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Another year has passed and with it has expired our subscription to one of the best of Liberal papers. We consider it one of the necessaries of life, and herewith send $3 for another year.

MRS. L. BRONSON.

Less Economics and More Infidelity.

SPOKANE, WASH., Oct. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I inclose $1.50, which please apply to my account. Will send more later on. Your paper is excellent, especially the editorials and Observations, which I always read first of all. A little more on religion and a little less of economics would, I believe, please the majority of your readers. It certainly would me. JOHN E. WELIN.

Will It Open Their Eyes?

SANTA CLARA, Oct. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2—$1 for the Defense Fund of Mr. Wise. I think his case should be the means of showing to the Bible believers what a humbug they are trying to push on to the people.

I hav written to Mr. Putnam and sent my mite for the Liberal Congress by this mail. A. R. WOODHAMS.

For Freethought in Medicin.

TERRE HAUTE, IND., Sept. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you herewith $1 on account. I want some books, but can not now afford to get them. There's so much missionary work to do. Just at present we're in the vaccination fight here trying to force orthodox medicin into allowing Freethought in medicin and, as you know, such fights are always at terrible odds. I hope Mr. Wise and Mrs. Waisbrooker will get off all right. I must send a slight contribution to the Defense Fund.

Yours as ever, FRANK D. BLUE.

Words and Actions Correspond.

NATIONAL HOME, CAL., Sept. 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav been a Freethinker all my life, and thinking this is a time when all Freethinkers should declare themselvs and do all they can for the developments of our ideas, I will certainly send my humble tribute. Sorry that I cannot do more.

You will find inclosed $7, for which you will send me THE TRUTH SEEKER and the badge; apply $1 to the Wise Defense Fund, and send the "Church Property" pamphlet for the remaining dollar, to distribute among the old soldiers here.

GEO. BOURDAIS.

He Who Reads May Be Saved.

CEDAR GROVE, W. VA., Oct. 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 on subscription. Orthodoxy holds the fort at this place. There are a few Liberal-minded people here, but they generally keep their thoughts to themselvs. I am doing all I can to promote the cause of Freethought by handing my TRUTH SEEKERS around, and whenever an honest thinker reads the truth and begins to investigate he is on the right road. Therefore so long as I can get a few persons to read Freethought books and THE TRUTH SEEKER I am satisfied that my labor is not in vain. Yours for Freethought,

BEN. F. WHITE.

Nothing for the Guides to the Skies.

KINGSTON, MO., Oct. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 on my subscription, which is all I can spare at present. Sorry to hav kept you waiting. I think if our government is run by Wall street and the Rothschilds a few years longer we will be too poor to buy either books or papers. I am nearly sixty-eight, and liv in a decidedly sky pilot-ridden community, but such leaders would starve out directly if none helped more than I. I am a disbeliever in the God of Moses, Jacob, and Aaron; not only that, but I assert it at any and all times.

W. A. COLVIN.

Not for All the World's Wealth.

APPONAUG, R. I., Oct. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which is the greatest book of the age, and which I would not be without for all the riches in this world. I would say to the public at large, Take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thus see where you stand with regard to what you call religion, for I cannot see anything in it, for the Bible, which they call the Book of Truth, is anything but that. So you can see what my belief is, for THE TRUTH SEEKER comes nearest to the truth that I hav seen.

Yours truly, JOHN R. SWEET.

She Is a Good Missionary.

NANAIMO, B. C., Oct. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you receive $6.50 for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I must say that I appreciate this paper very much and distribute it freely in my establishment, where it is well read, especially by a young German, who used to study the War Cry very much, but after taking a good dose of your medicin from THE TRUTH SEEKER, bid farewell to superstition or religion. There are a good many church goers here who would be splendid Freethinkers if they had only the courage to express their minds openly. Hoping that you will succeed in your work of clearing away the religious debris which people call the church, I remain yours for Freethought,

MRS. E. KEMPER.

Reason vs. Prejudice.

NEW YORK, Oct. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: This is said by a lady 'way off in Snohomish: "Don't you think THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing good missionary work with the 'Age of Reason?'" Yes, and will continue to do so when a little prejudice is removed from the mind. In conversation the other day with a minister of the gospel, I found him a little harsh on Infidelity, and he said, "Tom Paine's works are destroying the peace and happiness of mankind." I asked him if he had ever read the "Age of Reason." He said "No," but he had seen it. Now I want to send him a copy.

A friend informed me that he had presented the "Age of Reason" to a prominent member of a church, who undertook to read it; he found nothing in it that he could object to, but he said he dared not read it through on account of his standing in the church. What do you think of that? And that is the case with many.

S. R. THORNE.

They Were One in Thought.

MONTEZUMA, IA., Oct. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see that it is about time to renew our subscription. My husband died very suddenly just the week after he had renewed last year; he had taken the paper for a number of years and was a stanch Freethinker and also a one-armed soldier. When Mr. Remsburg lectured here he took dinner with us, and lectured at our school-house on Sunday afternoon.

Each year we hav bought a few books, such as we thought would be good to lend, so this year I will inclose $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, and the following books:

Two copies of "Age of Reason;" two copies "Church Property;" one "Myth of the Great Deluge;" "Two Hundred Poetical Riddles;" "Was Christ Crucified?" "Christianity a Reward for Crime;" "Clergyman's Victims;" "Blasphemy of the Bible;" "All in a Nutshell;" "Secular Marriage and Funeral Ritual;" "Thumbscrew and Rack;" "Book of Books." MRS. JOHN GARING.

Wants Political Action.

BUCKLEY, WASH., Oct. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50 for your grand paper and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I could not afford to send any money just now, but I hav to help along the Seeker of Truth and Brother Putnam.

Now, if we Liberals would take an activ part in the fall election and work and vote for the People's party, and thereby send good men to Congress—legislators who are willing to raise this country from its ruin—then it would not be so hard for such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER to exist, and liberty will prevail. I will not take up much space in your valuable paper, but will say this: By investigation you will find it useless to work for any of the old parties, as they are bound hands and feet to the church and money power. I will say to all Liberals and ask in the name of humanity: Work and vote for the People's party; there you will find the brawn and brain of this country, and the sentiment of Thomas Paine, Jefferson, and Lincoln. Yours for freedom,

MARTIN GRAN.

Evidently Thinks a Christian Has It.

LURAY, VA., Sept. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER two years, and $1 for the J. B. Wise Defense Fund. If times are hard I cannot do without your paper. Of all the writers whose works I hav read Ingersoll tops them all. I think he ought to let us hear from him more frequently through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would like so much to attend the Congress again this year, but times are too hard here in this priest-ridden country. I cannot afford it. The first Freethought woman I ever saw was at the Congress last year, and how I enjoyed the presence of those intelligent women while there! Well, I do not expect to spend all my days here with these superstitious people. I want to get where I can hear Freethought lectures often, and my children can hav some place to go on Sundays for instruction, pleasure, and pastime. It will be very hard for me to get away from here, though, as I am a jack-at-all-trades and people are pulling at me on every side with a job of some kind.

It is hard for me to lose the $2 I sent you to advance my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER that you say never reached you, because it is sure to assist in opposition to what I intended.

I wish you could say something in your paper that would help and encourage the Little Freethinker and its worthy editor. I think she is very worthy and deserves more encouragement. Let me be for justice, liberty, equal rights, and fraternity.

M. V. DADISMAN.

More Christian Outrages in Michigan.

GRAND HAVEN, MICH., Oct. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The beautiful city of Grand Haven, Mich., has been struck by a "religious" cyclone. The Young Men's Christian Association and other church organizations are endeavoring to put in force an old law, passed some time in the '40's, and hav secured the passage of an ordinance by the city council to enforce it. As a consequence, people are forbidden to walk the street on Sunday except to and from church. A man cannot even go into his place of business for any purpose whatever. The hotels hav been forbidden to receive new arrivals on that day, and citizens are denied the privilege of "taking their dinners out" at the hotel.

Two hundred names of transgressors of this "holy men's law" hav been taken in the last week since the ordinance was passed, who are to be dealt with for the unpardonable sin of doing as they like on the Christian Sabbath.

It appears the law is incomplete as passed, as it places the fine at five or ten dollars, but provides no manner in which it can be collected. While the sinner might be made to pay the fine, no provisions are made for the costs, so the church would hav to pay them. If the outcome of prosecution was to be that the church had to pay the expenses of suit, but few people would be brought to trial.

Grand Haven is a beautiful little city of six or seven thousand inhabitants, on the shore of Lake Michigan, directly east from Milwaukee. The only drawback is the bigotry of its people. The population are nearly or quite half Hollanders, who are good citizens in all but matters pertaining to religion, and in this they are "priest-following numskulls." The churches are numbered in the "teens," and a fire, which burned some sixty dwellings a few years ago, took several churches. While the ordinance passed will be inoperativ, it only shows what church people would do if ever so slim a chance was given them. ONE.

From a Single-Tax Letter Writer.

CINCINNATI, O., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of September 1st you indorse a proposed constitutional amendment the object of which is to forbid the exemption of any property whatever from taxation. Permit me to say that, while it is a monstrous injustice that our present tax laws should discriminate in favor of church property, the principle involved in this proposed amendment of taxing everything valuable under the sun is quite as unjust and hurtful as the unfair favors now shown to the churches. The adoption of the proposed amendment would make more difficult the repeal of the present tax laws that impose a fine upon every act of industry and enterprise and put a premium upon obstruction to progress. The effect of exempting churches from taxation has been to stimulate the building of churches. As the church does not happen to be a very useful institution the people hav not reaped any great benefit from this, but the same means that stimulated the building of churches would, if properly applied, stimulate the production of things that are beneficial. We would like to hav more factories. Then why not exempt them? We would like to hav more houses. Then why do we tax the man who builds one while the man who withholds his land from use escapes with only a nominal tax? We all of us want more wealth of all kinds. Then is it not foolish to tax any of the products of individual labor, and still more, to try to perpetuate this foolish policy by a constitutional amendment? Freethinkers, of all men, ought to be united in demanding that all taxes upon industry or the products of industry shall cease and that all public revenue shall be derived from the single tax on land values regardless of all improvements and also regardless of whether the land was held by a church or not. Under such a tax system no one could afford to withhold valuable natural opportunities from use, and consequently opportunities for employment would be provided for all who wanted to use them. This must result in a further spread of education and increase in intelligence, which can ultimately result only in the complete triumph of Freethought.

SAMUEL DANZIGER.

The God Question.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Sept. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Your Baltimore correspondent seems determined to hav a God, and the way she writes in behalf of that phantom of the mind reveals the possession of a much larger supply of words than of ideas; for in all she has written we look in vain for anything tangible or practical. To assert, as she does, that "God is truth," is to settle nothing, and we still wait for something fresh in the way of an assertion, for facts are not forthcoming, and that expression is too aged to startle or surprise. It means absolutely nothing, and gives no clue to the existence claimed. What a sample of logic her statement is, that the real Atheist is the one who knows no god but greed, etc.! It would be just as true and sensible to assert that the real Atheist is the man who wears number ten boots, for the size of his feet has just as much to do with Atheism as his greed for grub or gain. There is only one kind of an Atheist, for denying the existence of God is all that makes an Atheist. It is not his characteristics as an individual nor his political belief, for Atheism neither covers nor touches such things. When it comes to knowledge we are all Atheists, for not a trace of God as a power or a personality was ever found, seen, or known. There are but two forces in the universe—attraction and repulsion—and the manifestations of these forces are all we know or ever will know of that figure of speech, God the almighty. We are face to face with the forces of nature, and as we know nothing of life save through its manifestations, we can know nothing of a god not revealed in these forces, and if people of intelligence hav not yet learned that nature's forces are unaffected by faith or prayer, and are totally indifferent to human happiness or suffering, they hav devoted more time to cherishing a pet belief than to observing facts. Unless we watch and fight the forces of nature they will exterminate us in a thousand different ways, and the whole of life is an eternal round of care and watchfulness to guard against accidents and disease. The only "protecting care" under which mortal man exists is found in his ability to look out for himself, and when he depends on anything but human efforts for protection and preservation he invariably gets left. Prayers are as powerless in time of need as one of your correspondent's God arguments in a discussion, and this fact is becoming more generally known than when the priest was the only man permitted to think and express thoughts on such subjects. The philosopher leaves the domain of emotion and sentiment to women and such men as need an imaginary God to walk with through life, for in his department of thought, which relates entirely to the connection of causes and effects, he finds the feelings are not suitable things to rely on in a search for facts.

Yes, we can dispense with the "Deity" because the world has run up to the present time without such a factor, and when the present imaginary one now roosting like an incubus on the dome of thought is shook off and discarded by those thus afflicted they will find they hav lost nothing essential to their welfare or happiness. Good-bye, God. C. SEVERANCE.

Is Freedom of Trade Immoral?

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Oct. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In your columns, October 6th, Mr. Preston Day replies to my questions in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 15th; but answer No. 1 antagonizes answers No. 4, 5, and 6.

Pointing to our higher civilization and wonderful progress, Christians say the coexisting Christianity caused it, and pointing to cheaper goods and higher wages, Protectionists (including Mr. Day) say the coëxisting high tariff caused it. Both classes of enthusiasts fail to see that two things or conditions may coëxist without either one causing the other. They are unaware of the fact that both these results came, not because of, but in spite of the "causes" they attribute. New inventions, better machinery, and improved processes of manufacture hav cheapened goods. And as wages are the laborer's share of his product, his wages (or share) hav risen somewhat with his increased production.

When tariffs originally designed for the very purpose of increasing prices, lower them, then will reaction be greater than its parent action and perpetual motion become possible. Competition may reduce prices, but "trusts" and tariffs never do. And world-wide competition is greater than nation-bound, state-bound, or county-bound competition, and hence reduces prices most.

The law of "supply and demand"—competition—sets the price of wages just as it sets the price of goods. Rich employers pay no higher wages than poor ones do, and millionaires buy both goods and labor as cheaply as poor men do.

The fashion of "tipping" waiters apparently increases their wages by the amount of the "tip." But in the "high-toned" hotels, where "tips" are constant and regular, men are so anxious to get these "tips" that they consent to work for less wages. And, in some cases, waiters hav even been willing to relinquish all wages and pay the proprietor something for the privilege of working for him.

Hence, a subsidy of $1 per day paid from the federal treasury direct to journeymen shoemakers would not eventually raise their wages one iota; for so many persons would flock into this more desirable occupation that their wages, like those of the "tipped" waiters, would soon fall to the common level. And this is equally true of every other vocation. So if we cannot raise men's wages, even by paying them a direct bounty or subsidy, much less can we raise their wages by paying their employers the bounty or subsidy and leaving it to their own sweet will to distribute it among their employees. Ought not any honest protectionist who fully understands this be ashamed to ever again assert that bounties, subsidies, or tariffs raise the laborer's wages? Why then do they reiterate it again and again?

Labor alone creates all our valuable products. Law creates nothing. And if law givs to some what they would not otherwise get, it must take it from others—creating millionaires on the one hand and paupers on the other.

After admitting that the tariff is a tax will Mr. Day please explain how taxing us heavier and heavier enriches us more and more, as most people evade taxation as much as possible, which they probably would not do if they knew how it enriched (?) them?

To be logical, advocates of Freethought should advocate moral (not immoral) freedom in everything—that is, the freedom to do any moral thing. For, without the freedom to morally act, what is the freedom to think—i. e., Freethought—worth? Freedom to think, without the freedom to express that thought, availed the tortured victim of the Inquisition but little. Freethought must logically include the freedom to morally act. Freedom to trade—i. e., free trade—and freedom to migrate—i. e., free immigration and emigration—are logical concomitants of Freethought. If trading is not immoral we should be free to trade—i. e., hav free trade.

By themselvs producing "all the sugar consumed" therein, would not states, counties, and families reap as much benefit (?) as nations? If not, why not? Is this not likewise true of tin, etc.?

If trade is not mutually beneficial, why do men trade? If imports displace (?) American labor, then to that extent must we get their goods gratis. For, aside from character and health, the only thing we are reluctant to giv for goods is labor or that which costs us labor to replace. How can these imported gifts injure us?

As people are entirely free to morally use fire and water they should be entirely free to morally trade. If not, why not?

Why not, by free trade, leave every individual to decide for himself under what circumstances foreign trade is or is not injurious?

"Trusts" are formed by "cornering" the market on certain classes of goods and are facilitated and fostered by tariffs in exact ratio, as it is easier to corner the product of a single nation than that of the entire world. Hence Mr. Day's absurd and reckless allegation that "all trust men . . . are free trade tariff reformers" is equaled only by his sweepingly broad assertion that "nobody ever said the tariff was not a tax," as though he could vouch that nobody in the world had ever said a certain thing. As a matter of fact, there is no protectionist assertion more common than this that the tariff is not a tax. So common is it that is a matter of astonishment that Mr. Day should not make use of it himself, and our astonishment turns to amazement when we find him repudiating it as having ever been made use of by a protectionist. If he will turn to THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 25th, this year, he will see that Mr. Charles O. Hays, a red-hot protectionist, writes, in an article which appears on the same page with one of Mr. Day's own, that the claim that the tariff is a tax is a "rotten dogma," a "glaring fraud;" that it is "as absurd as the plagues of Egypt," "as untenable as the geology of Moses," and "has been refuted a thousand different times, in a thousand different ways, by a thousand different facts" Mr. Hays and Mr. Day should "get together."

As well declare that the chick should go back into its shell or we to our cradle, as claim that, because England once had protection, we must forever wear these cast-off protection garments of England's.

We claim that this is the "land of the free"—then why should we not be free to trade? D. WEBSTER GROH.

Progress and Woman Suffrage.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Since the arrival of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER of the 22d inst. some friends hav asked me to write my opinions on the much debated subject, "Are Women Capable of Using the Electiv Franchise Intelligently?"

Notwithstanding the somewhat lengthy and very able article written upon the negativ side of the question by Mrs. R. H. Schwartz (who is a personal friend of mine), which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER a week ago, it seems to me that the facts do not warrant her conclusions.

I fear that my highly esteemed friend is viewing the matter through very dark glasses; I fail to find the present conditions as she depicts them.

Several years ago I too was of the same opinion as Mrs. Schwartz is to-day, but since that time I hav come in contact with hundreds of women, both in a business sense and in private life, and I find that the woman of whom my friend draws such a vivid pen picture is the exception rather than the rule at the present time. The fashionable as well as the religious world is not standing still, but it is moving forward to-day more directly than it has moved before since the beginning of the Christian era. As I go into the homes of my Liberal and Christian friends I do not find the trashy novels such as one found so often some eight or ten years ago, but instead the more progressiv and educational publications of the times. As I walk through the streets of San José and other cities I cannot fail to notice that the small wasp-like figure is as rarely seen as was the common-sense waist a few years since. I am acquainted with women whose waists are naturally small who, owing to the tendency of the times toward a more rational mode of dress, are forced to make their garments with sashes and shirrings so as to hav their waists correspond with the rest of the body to present a more symmetrical figure. And the mind of woman has expanded in proportion with her waist. Unless the shoe dealers hav misinformed me women to-day are wearing larger shoes than they hav in the past twenty-five years. As for powder, I remember a large assemblage of people that I was in not long since where one young lady's face was disfigured with our modern preparation of chalk. She was the novelty of the evening, all eyes were upon her, not with admiration, but with wonder, while some of the more sensitiv actually blushed when they viewed the pitiable and very unusual spectacle.

We all know that woman's sphere has broadened wonderfully within the last fifty years. To-day she is admitted to universities and colleges where, only a few years ago, the door was shut in her face. She has entered the professional field and proven herself to be as capable as her more favored brother. She, in spite of herself, is fast leaving the faith that comforted her mother and grandmother and is seeking shelter under the wide-spreading branches of the banyan-tree of liberty.

If we read the signs of the times aright we will see that, although the apparent trend of Protestantism is toward the union of church and state, there is in reality a strong undercurrent of Liberalism in the ocean of religious thought and belief to-day which is moving on steadily and irresistibly toward non-religious politics. Like the gulf stream, it carries with it to certain destruction the icebergs of an ancient mythology, with their frozen fossils, into the warmer waters of modern scientific thought. One marked evidence thereof is the number of Protestant sects refusing to take money appropriated by Congress this summer for sectarian purposes.

Had my friend been with me at a meeting of the Prohibition party that I attended recently, which was opened by prayer, and had she heard the derogatory remarks made by a great many strictly church people as to the good policy of bringing religion into politics, she would hav been greatly encouraged.

Surely any one watching the results of the elections in states where suffrage has been granted the women cannot help but note how intelligently and independently of her brothers' and ministers' opinions she uses the ballot. For instance, in Colorado this spring, where women for the first time in the history of the state exercised the right of the electiv franchise, the old prejudices were overthrown. The women hav taken hold of public matters as perfectly independent citizens, and all parties and candidates hav to figure upon their vote as an uncertain factor. They formed clubs throughout the state, in which they made a careful and systematic study of political and social questions, which we all know has a tendency to enlighten the mind of woman and lift her out of her narrow, superstitious surroundings to a purer air and broader view.

The enfranchisment of women, at least in Kansas, seems to hav had the effect of bringing her to a realizing sense of the necessity of dress reform, where it is reported by the papers that large clubs of women are formed, who pledge themselvs to wear the reform suits. And it is safe to say that similar results would become universal under like circumstances.

Another instance in woman's favor is the fact that in Colorado she made fewer mistakes in the use of the Australian ballot system than did her father and brothers. One more argument on her side is that a very small percentage of the ministers favor woman suffrage, as they realize only too well that when woman once has the ballot she will soon consider a right to vote the duty to vote, and that it will result in her neglecting her church and missionary work for secular affairs, consequently affecting their bread and butter.

I do not believe that the women of this country would steer the ship of state into the harbor of a Presbyterian winter resort. They might sail near enough to receive a whiff of the hot air, which would only make them bear away into deeper water and finally anchor our good old vessel in the peaceful harbor of a Liberal summer-resort.

I believe it is only by giving woman the responsibility of handling the ballot that she will awaken from the long mental lethargy that she has been in since religious fanaticism threw its mantle of darkness over the minds of humanity and cause her to study and strive to wear the habiliments of wisdom, usefulness, and independence. If, before she is freed from the shackles of superstition (after she has a right to vote), there is to be a desperate struggle for us to retain our liberty, I hope that it will come in our day, that I may be able to add my energies to the emancipation of woman from the thraldom of preacher and priestcraft, so that the substance and not the shadow of Liberty shall reign universally from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the future generations liv in peace.

My friend surely cannot apprehend any danger from that "religious serpent at the polls," when she recognizes its size as compared with our strength. The entire church membership of the United States is put by the census statistics at 20,643,000, and we must remember that a great many of this number are in favor of non-religious politics, while the majority of the remaining 50,000,000 or so are more or less liberal or they would be tied to some church.

We need not hold a magnifying glass before our eyes to see that the wheels of progress are turning slowly but surely, steadily bearing along to a higher plane of thought and action the nineteenth century car of civilization.

If we will consider that at the election next November there will be submitted to the people of California proposed constitutional amendments to be balloted upon, in which it is provided that no person convicted of any infamous crime, no person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money, and no person who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name shall ever exercise the privilege of an elector in this state, we will see that there is an attempt being made in this land of sunshine (as well as being agitated in other states) to hav the educational qualification for voters. As there are three out of the four political parties in California which indorse woman suffrage, the day is not far distant when intelligent men and women will stand shoulder to shoulder upon the great plane of mental, religious, and political equality, and cast their ballot for the best interests of our country.

The Liberals who take the negativ side of this question must feel highly honored to know that they stand on the same platform with Cardinal Gibbons and other distinguished prelates. I would like to say much more, but fear if I do this letter will be consigned to the waste-basket for its length. Yours for the emancipation of woman, CLARA F. HARKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Sun Will Shine Again.

What though the day be dark and drear,
The meadow wet with rain,
Look up and smile and hav no fear—
The sun will shine again.

The leaden cloud, the whistling wind,
May bring but notes of pain,
But with the morrow thou shalt find
The sun doth shine again.

Shadows may dim the onward way
With mist and murky stain,
But by and by, with banners gay,
Cometh the sun again.

And so in all the ways of life,
On land and o'er the main,
Foretold it is through toil and strife,
The sun will shine again.

The Inquirendo Club.

VII.

"Aunt Margaret," said Arthur at the next meeting of the Inquirendo Club, "hav you ever read Delia Bacon's work on 'The Philosophy of the Plays of Shakspere Unfolded'?" And as Aunt Margaret answered in the affirmativ, he continued, impatiently: "Well, then, auntie, do you think she proved that the Shaksperean plays were really written by Lord Bacon?"

"She endeavored to prove it," answered his aunt, "but no biographer I know of has accepted her views. It is a difficult thing to settle, because there is really nothing to build upon but one's theories. Myself, I hav thought more of Lord Bacon's authorship than that of the so-called William Shakspere—a poor, ill-paid actor. Lord Francis Bacon was one of the greatest writers of his time—one of the most penetrating and far-reaching, with a remarkably vivid imagination. He was born in the year 1561 and died Jan. 22, 1626. His mother was the learned Anna Cooke, a woman noted for her superior education and high moral qualities. Bacon early evinced his superior powers, so that at the age of thirteen the queen was fond of calling him her "young lord keeper." He was sent to the University of Cambridge, which he quitted after a period of three years with a general dissatisfaction with the method of teaching employed there and a low estimate of the Aristotelian philosophy, thus severing himself from the literary class of thinkers of his time. Biographers do not clothe Lord Bacon with the moral qualities of his mother. He perjured himself upon several occasions to elicit favors from King James I and his royal favorit, Villiers. In 1613, while acting under the authority of attorney, he tried to extort a confession of treason from an old clergyman by cruelly torturing him on the rack. These, while marking Lord Bacon's public life with meanness and dishonor, gave him shining laurels in the way to kingly favors. In 1619 he was made lord chancellor with the title of Lord Verulam. In the year following he was created Viscount St. Albans. It is easy, however, to ascribe Bacon's reckless extravagance and relentless search for power and opulence to the corrupting morals of that age. Then, as now, an official signified cunning, and Bacon's friendship for the notorious Earl of Essex probably aggravated a natural propensity for rascality. That 'evil communications corrupt good manners' is true. Often the best of men, after a career of public life, find their names linked with accounts of evil doings that they would fain erase from their record, but which were apparently necessary by the conditions surrounding them. So with Lord Francis Bacon, whose works alone form a treasury of the deepest knowledge of human relations, conveyed in a gorgeous and energetic style. He is regarded by his countrymen as the father of inductiv philosophy—inventor and first teacher of the method of interrogating nature by observation and experiment and inductiv reasoning. And if recent criticisms hav dethroned him from the position which for centuries he occupied in relation to the physical sciences by showing that his doctrins, experiments, and writings hav not materially affected their course, it is only to leave him free to be placed in a position no less dignified in relation to social and human philosophy."

Aunt Margaret paused for a moment, and Florence, who had been very deeply interested in the conversation, now took occasion to remark:

"It seems improbable to me that a man cruel enough to torture another upon the rack to extort a confession should hav written 'The quality of mercy is not strained,' and the other beautiful expressions attributed to Shakspere."

"Not any more strange than that of George Eliot preaching submission and practicing license—denouncing egoism and then living out its principles as elucidated by present philosophers," rejoined Arthur, while Aunt Margaret said: "It is a peculiarity with many writers that their works belie their lives. Fancy will fondly create a noble author for a noble work, but realism more often banishes the pleasant dream by exposing an unpleasant reality."

"Like the discovery of Ella Wheeler Wilcox eating pork and beans," suggested Arthur.

"I once read an anecdote about Jane Austen's hero worship," said Florence, and she appeared to particularly centralize her adoration upon William Makepeace Thackeray. One day, to her infinit delight, she was invited to attend a dinner party which Thackeray also attended, and the kind hostess, probably aware of the authoress's preference, placed her at the side of her favorit hero. Now Thackeray was a very hearty eater and although, as he related afterward, he could see disappointment and chagrin deepening upon Jane Austin's face, he continued to refill his plate again and again. Finally, he was both startled and amused to hear his companion exclaim, clutching his arm in her eagerness and arresting the departure of his fifth potato: 'O Mr. Thackeray, don't!' in both a tragic and despairing manner."

Aunt Margaret smiled at Florence's narrativ and Ernestine remarked, apropos of their Shaksperean discussion: "If the works of Shakspere were written by such an unprincipled man as Lord Bacon I will hav no more confidence in Portia's genius, Perdita's virtue, or Celia's constancy, nor ever thrill to the sublime declaration:

"Love is not love which alters
When it alteration finds."

"Now you are as bad as Jane Austen trying to prevent Thackeray from eating potatoes," said Ralph, which amused Arthur so much that he shouted with laughter, immediately perceiving the point of the joke.

Lillie turned the current of the conversation by remarking: "Jane Austen wrote 'Pride and Prejudice.' Was her name original or assumed?"

"Oh, original," said Arthur. "She was the daughter of a Steventon rector in England. She had a very superior education and was endowed with what Aunt Margaret calls 'high moral qualities.' Possessing numerous personal attractions which made many friends, she commenced writing stories at an early age, but the first to attract public attention were, 'Sense and Sensibility' (1811), 'Pride and Prejudice' (1813), 'Mansfield Park' (1814), and 'Emma' (1816). The great merit in her novels is simplicity in style, accurate and truthful, portraying with vividness the every-day life of the middle classes in England. Sir Walter Scott said of her: 'That young lady has a talent for describing the involvements, feelings, and characters of ordinary life which is to me the most wonderful I ever met with. The big bow-wow I can do myself like anyone going, but the exquisit touch which renders commonplace things and characters interesting from the truth of the description and sentiment is denied me.' And let me add right here that if ever an author lived who was willing to accord praise to a fellow-writer that person was Sir Walter Scott. Not only has he made the world richer by romantic illustrations of important historical incidents, but he left a record of generosity and chivalry unequaled by any of his characters. He was a man of noble impulses and a passion for accuracy of description together with a conscientious love of truth. A patriot, naturally he was a little biased in political events; but he acknowledged the fact and was proud of it. Every nook and cranny in Scotland was dear to him. And I regard Sir Walter Scott as one of the most entertaining writers of the day."

"I also share your enthusiasm," said Ernestine, "but we hav no more time to eulogize this evening. It is growing late."

Acting upon this hint, the club adjourned.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed — probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. - - - - -	$1.00

QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Gems of Thought.

AN old Spanish proverb says: "Mankind is an ass who kicks those who endeavor to take off his panniers."

IF Christ rose from the dead, why did he not appear to his enemies? Why did he not call on Caiaphas, the high priest? Why did he not make another triumphal entry into Jerusalem?—Ingersoll.

NO GREAT art ever rose or ever can rise that is based upon imitation or that sacrifices truth for effect. No great sculpture will come till it comes out of spontaneous effort. Veritism does not enslave, it sets free.—Hamlin Garland.

BUT little do or can the best of us;
That little is achieved through liberty.
Who, then, dares hold, emancipated thus—
His fellow shall continue bound? Not I,
Who liv, labor freely, nor discuss
A brother's right to freedom.
—Robert Browning.

THOUGH most of our pleasures are to be accepted as concomitants of those various expenditures of energy conduciv to self-sustentation and sustentation of family, yet the pursuit of pleasure for pleasure's sake is to be sanctioned, and even enjoined, when primary duties hav been fulfilled.—Herbert Spencer.

SELF-DEVELOPMENT . . . is an aim for all; an aim which will make all stronger, and saner, and wiser, and better. It will make each in the end more helpful to humanity. To be sound in wind and limb; to be healthy of body and mind; to be educated, to be emancipated, to be free, to be beautiful—these things are ends toward which all should strain, and by attaining which all are happier in themselvs, and more useful to others.—Grant Allen.

NATURE and books belong to the eyes that see them. It depends on the mood of the man, whether he shall see the sunset or the fine poem. There are always sunsets, and there is always genius; but only a few hours so serene that we relish nature or criticism. The more or less depends on structure or temperament. Temperament is the iron wire on which the beads are strung. Of what use is fortune or talent to a cold and defectiv nature?—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

THERE are classes who assume a function and authority which does not naturally belong to them. In medicin, the professional doctor; in law, the professional lawyer; in art, in literature, in theology, in ethics, the professional, class-proud leader—in each, that man, or those many men, in whom pride of profession rises above and makes little of that final human poise and service which arbitrates between what is ephemeral and what is of infinit moment.—Horace L. Traubel.

WE liv in a small, bright oasis of knowledge surrounded on all sides by a vast unexplored region of impenetrable mystery. From age to age the strenuous labor of successiv generations wins a small strip from the desert and pushes forward the boundaries of knowledge. Of such triumphs we are justly proud. It is a less attractiv task—but yet it has its fascination as well as uses—to turn our eyes to the undiscovered country which still remains to be won, to some of the stupendous problems of natural study which still defy our investigation.—Lord Salisbury.

SCIENTIFIC truth has likewise this trait of its own: It is absolutely open to the world; it is as free as air, as visible as light. There is no such thing about it as an inner secret, a mysterious gnosis shared by the favored few, the select illuminati, concealed from the vulgar horde, or masked to them under ambiguous terms. Wherever you find mystery, concealment, occultism, you may be sure that the spirit of science does not dwell and, what is more, that it would be an unwelcome intruder. Such pretensions belong to pseudo-science, to science falsely so-called, shutting itself out of the light because it is afraid of the light.—Daniel G. Brinton.

MANY writers tell us that Rome and the other empires of ancient times were overthrown by the influence of luxury; but this assertion indicates a complete misconception of the main causes of the decline and disappearance of nations. The disastrous checks to national progress hav never been caused by the luxury, general happiness, or wealth of the people, but mainly by their poverty and misery. As the number of slaves increased, they were treated with more severity, and, when war came, they gave their direct or indirect assistance to the public enemy. Those fight best who hav the most to fight for. and it has always been observed that the nobles and those classes who lived in the most luxurious manner walked most composedly into the jaws of death.—John S. Hittell.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet. that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth. 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech. and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

THE FALL OF ADAM.

A Tragedy in One Act. Scene, Garden of Eden. Persons represented: Jehovah, Adam, Eve. (The two last named are hiding behind a bush!)

JEHOVAH: "Adam, where art thou?"

ADAM (to Eve): "Did you hear that? He's coming to get on to us. This is a fine pickle of fish you've got us into with your cursed inquisitivness."

EVE: "Why, what's he making all the fuss about? 'Twas only an apple and sour at that."

JEHOVAH: "Adam, where art thou?"

ADAM: "My word, don't he shout! Whatever shall we do?"

EVE: "Why, just keep behind the bush, and not let him catch us."

ADAM: "But there is no use in trying to hide from God. He knows everything and sees everywhere."

EVE: "Then, what's he shouting for?"

JEHOVAH (louder than ever): "Adam, where art thou?"

ADAM: "My God! don't he thunder! We'd better make a clean breast of it. Lord, Lord, was you a-talking to me?"

JEHOVAH: "Ah! I've got you at last, rascal! What's this you've been up to, eh?"

ADAM: "Well, to tell you the God's truth, my old lass is awful inquisitiv, and ever since you spoke about that forbidden fruit she's been dying to hav a taste of it."

JEHOVAH: "What then?"

ADAM: "Well, she took an apple."

JEHOVAH: "And what about yourself—out with it; I'm in the middle of making a world and can't wait."

ADAM: "You see, she persisted in making me hav a bite, and as I didn't want a family quarrel over an apple I took a slice—just to please the old girl."

JEHOVAH: "Oh, you wicked, diabolical couple. To go and eat an apple when I told you not to! Horrible! But I'll hav it out of you, see if I don't. I'll not allow you to go naked another day. Eve, I condemn you to petticoats. Adam, I sentence you to trousers."

ADAM and EVE: "Oh, how shall we bear it?"

JEHOVAH: "Eve, you inquisitiv creature, you'll hav to suffer for it every time you get a baby. Adam, you scamp, you'll hav in future to work for your living—no more loafing, mind you. I curse you all—serpent included. And, remember, my curse isn't a mere sessional affair; on the contrary, I make it a standing order. The whole human race in the future shall suffer the same curse for the same apple."

(Exit JEHOVAH exclaiming: "I curse you all, I curse you all, I damn and curse you all.")

EVE: "My conscience, don't he swear awful? He couldn't get on worse if we'd swallowed the whole garden."

ADAM: "Hush, Eve; you mustn't talk in that way about God. He is all-powerful."

EVE: "The more's the pity."

ADAM: "Hush, God is the potter—we are only the clay. He made us. He manufactured me, for example, out of a little heap o' dust."

EVE: "I wish he had left the little heap o' dust alone."

ADAM: "You're a wicked skeptic, Eve. You should remember that we owe everything to God. As the poet says:

"'The ways of God are wondrous ways
And difficult to grapple;
He made the world for you and me.'"

EVE: "And damns us for an apple."

Adam lived to the green old age of 930 years. Yet even Adam was a mere stripling in comparison with some of the antediluvian patriarchs. Modern apologists try to get over this little difficulty by saying that, so far as those worthies are concerned, the word year really means months. In other words, the Bible, being a divine revelation, differs from ordinary profane books by saying what it does not mean, and meaning what it does not say. Let us accept the theory and see how it works. We read in God's holy book that Adam begat a son when he was 130 years old. Now, if 130 years means 130 months, Adam must hav begat a son when he (Adam) was ten years and ten months old—which was a highly improper thing for Adam to do. Again we read that Enoch when he was 65 years of age begat Methuselah. Now, if years must be taken to mean months, Enoch must hav taken upon himself the cares and responsibilities of paternity at the mature age of five years and five months—which to say the least was a very rash thing for a five-year-old gentleman to do. The Christian apologists are in a fix. On one theory the patriarchs lived too long—on the other they don't liv long enough. My private opinion is that they never lived at all.—Wallace Nelson, in Progress.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

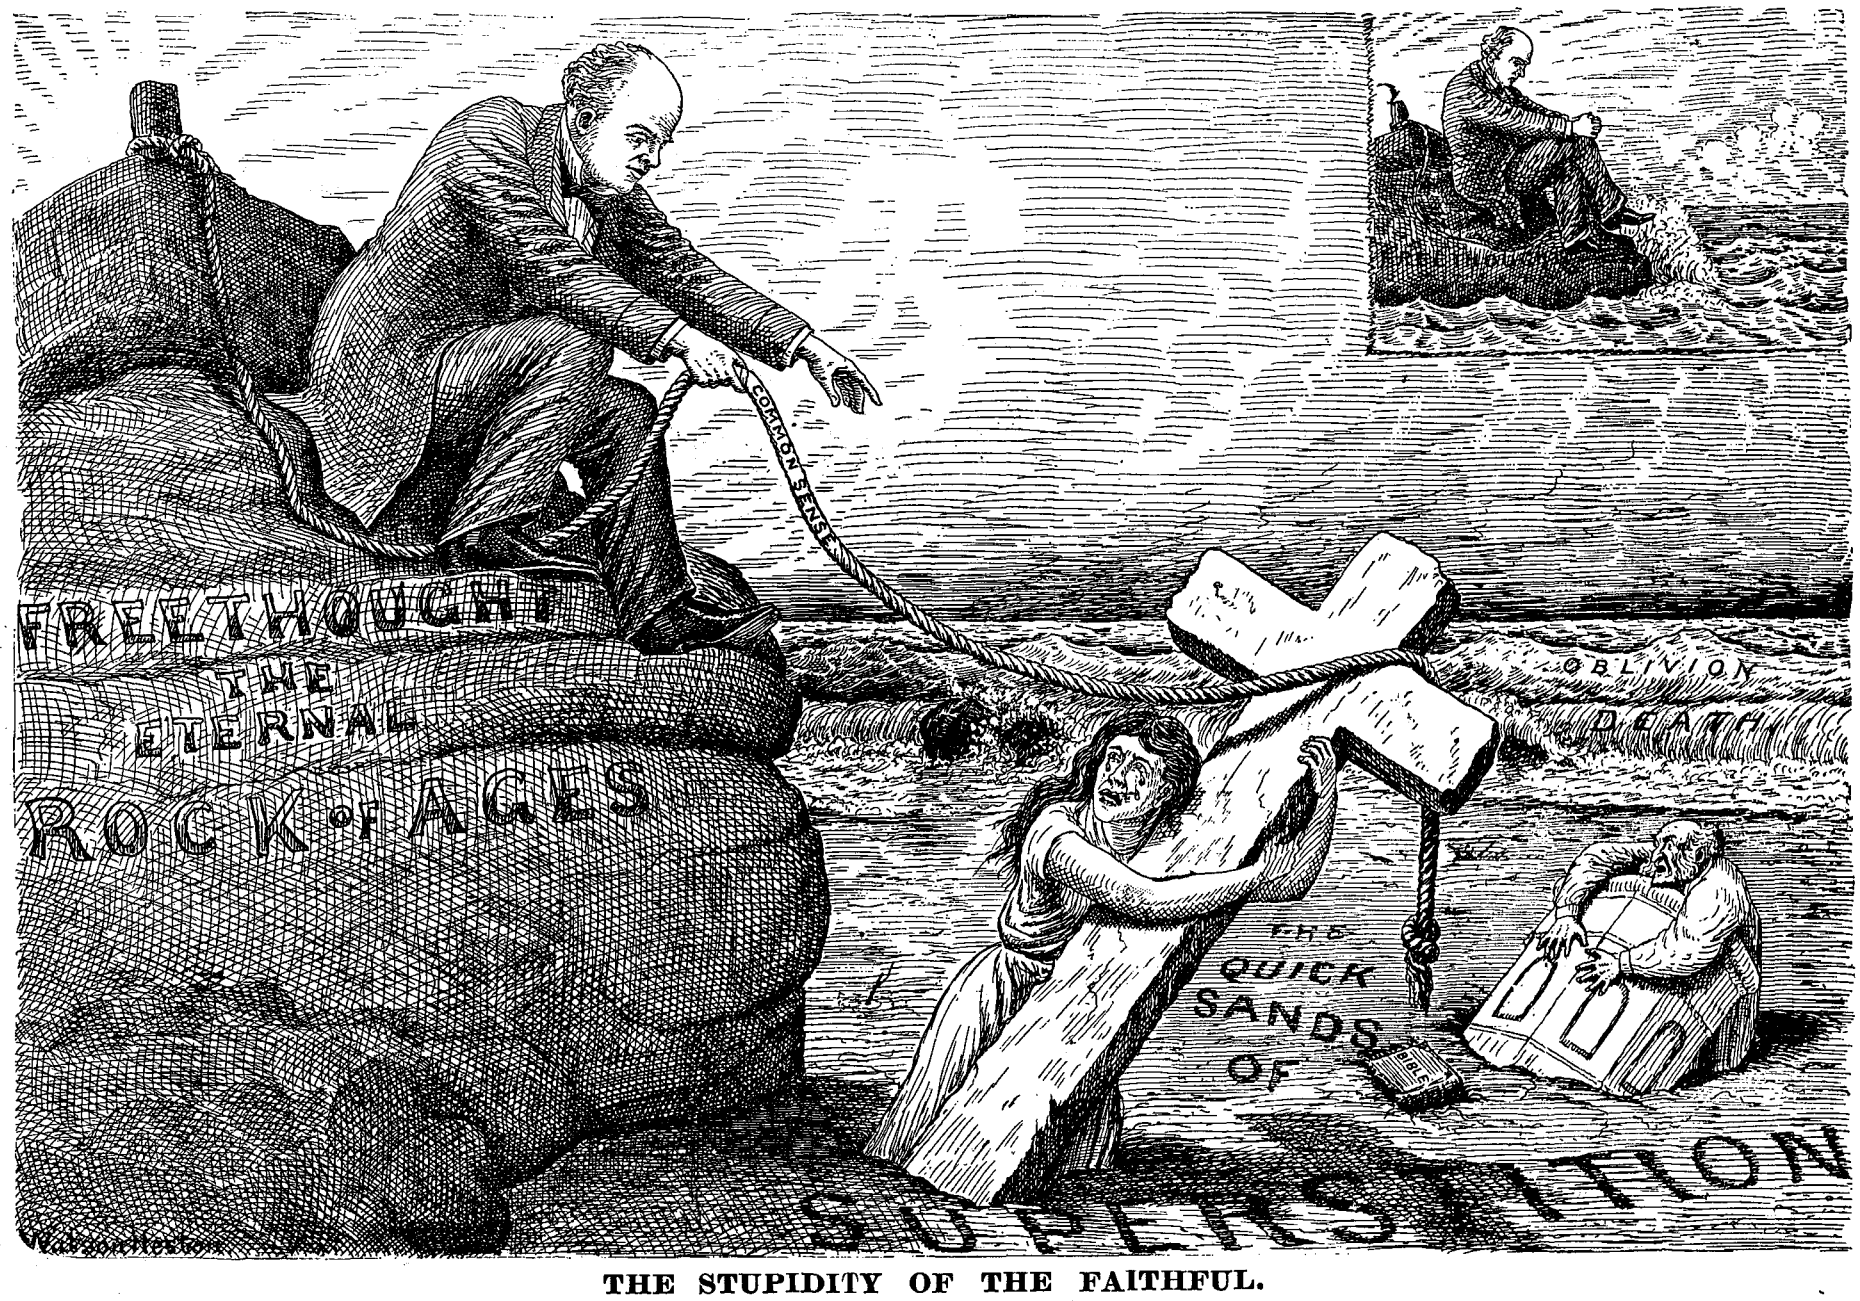
With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.



In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the FreethoughtPress.

A Significant Statement.

The Christian Statesman, the oldest of the organs of the National Reform Association (the God-in-the-Constitution party), and a paper that knows its friends from its enemies, has come to the conclusion that, while it does not approve of secret societies, it prefers the A. P. A. to the Jesuits. And why? Because, as it thinks, the Catholic church is the chief obstacle in the way of the enactment and enforcement of Sunday laws. In an editorial in its issue of October 13th it reasons in this way:

"Some of us are just far enough behind the age to believe that the Roman Catholic machine is one of the greatest hindrances to genuin reform in this country. Notwithstanding the suave utterances of Cardinal Gibbons and the deliverances of the Baltimore Council anent Sabbath keeping we believe the papal church is the greatest obstacle we hav to contend with in the effort to secure a general observance of the day. So long as the church holds to her present doctrin that the Pope, not Jesus Christ, is Lord of the Sabbath, so long will the present custom of mass in the early morning and merriment for the rest of the day prevail. But so long as the Sabbath is made a holiday, instead of a holy day, so long will true Sabbath-keeping be impossible to secure. And so long as the Roman Catholic laboring man can continue to work seven days in the week, with the blessing of his church, so long will all other laborers be at a disadvantage when contending for their Sabbath rights. [That is, so long will it be difficult for the Sabbatarians to convince laboring men that they should stop all work and play on Sunday and go to church and drop something into the hat.] When the railroads can replace a conscientious man who objects to working on the Lord's day [meaning the priests' day] with a man who has no scruples there will be little hope of very great reform in Sabbath traffic. There are many kinds of public service for which the better class of Protestants will not compete by reason of the Sabbath labor involved. No earnest Christian man wants to go into railroad service which may involve Sabbath labor. The same is true of the United States mail service, newspaper, street car, and other kinds of service. [And so the theocrats want to forbid people who hav no scruples against working on Sunday engaging in useful occupations so that they can themselvs get jobs without damage to their pet superstitions!] To those of us, therefore, who see in the papacy a strong barrier against the progress of true reform [i. e., compulsory Sabbatarianism], it is a comfort to know that the system is likely to hav a shaking up in this country."

All this is very significant, and of great interest to Freethinkers. It will be well to note, in passing, that the Christian Statesman has no hope, evidently, of convincing Catholic laborers that they should always "rest" on Sunday. It seems to be sure that they will hav no objections to working on that day so long as their church does not denounce it as a sin. Neither does it appear to think that its "conscientious" Protestant, who objects to "working on the Lord's day," is at all influenced by other than religious motivs. All of which confirms our contention that the Sunday question is at bottom only a struggle between the aggressiv wing of the church and the common sense elements of our population, the church being engaged in an attempt to force all the people to quit work and eschew recreation on the day that the priest takes up his collections and "earns" most of his salary. "The weekly rest" for the laborer is only a pretense, for even theocrats know that he can get his weekly leisure without making it a misdemeanor or crime to work and seek amusement on Sunday. The secular holidays prove this.

The Scholar Not Always a Sound Thinker.

Professsor Max Muller is probably the greatest of living philologists. In the domain of language he is an incomparable specialist. But when he gets out of that department he sometimes trips, stumbles, and even falls. Recently the Christian Commonwealth, of London, sent a reporter to interview him. The first question asked was this: "Would you say that any one sacred book is superior to all others in the world?" Max Muller answered: "It may sound prejudiced, but, taking all in all, I say the New Testament." Next comes the Koran and after that the Old Testament, succeeding which we find the various other sacred books of the world. It is not our purpose to call in question the wisdom of this classification, for all such ranging of books in degrees one above another is very largely a matter of opinion. But we must direct the reader's attention to some of Professor Muller's remarkable reasons for choosing as he does.

He says that there can be no doubt that ethical teaching is much more prominent in the Old and New Testaments than in any other of the similar books of the world. He declares that "therein lies the distinctivness of the Bible." Now we want to know in what this exceptional ethical teaching consists. Let Max Muller speak for himself:

"Other sacred books are generally collections of whatever was remembered of ancient times. For instance, in the Veda you get a description of the flood, simply as a deluge; in the Old Testament it takes an ethical meaning; it is a punishment and a reward; there is the difference between the two; and that distinction runs through the whole of the sacred books."

So, then, the conception of a divine providence, which sacrifices the innocent with the guilty for the sins of the latter, is what makes the Bible superior as an ethical guide to the sacred books of the other world religions! This is wonderful! The moral offense of these other books is that they hav simply recorded the traditions of terrestrial events, without assuming that their writers knew that certain natural phenomena were sent by a god to punish some and reward others of his children. The merit of the Bible is that its writers assumed that they knew all about God's intentions and could justify, by an appeal to his name, the most flagrant violations of a healthful moral code. It thus appears that ethics consist in guessing at what you do not know anything about, and in teaching that innocent little children and all species of animals were drowned by a just God because that God had once made a man who was so imperfectly constructed that he disobeyed his maker's command and ate an apple which gave him a knowledge of good and evil. No wonder that Professor Muller thinks that his remarks may "sound prejudiced." They do.

Professor Muller declares that the distinguishing feature of the Old Testament is that "the Jews feel themselvs the chosen people of God." There is, says the professor, plenty of ethical teaching in the other sacred books, but nowhere except in the Old Testament do we find such a sure feeling that the people to which the writers belong is set apart by God as his own peculiar children.

"The Jewish people always referred everything that happened to them, whether happiness or misfortune, to a divine government; it was meant for them; there was a meaning in it; they were made to feel that God was angry or pleased."

And so they calmly assumed that their atrocious slaughterings of their neighbors was commanded by that God, that he had from the beginning decreed that they should "spoil the heathen" and "raise up children to the Lord" from the ravished wives and daughters of their murdered victims. Whatever they stole was "meant for them;" whatever outrage they committed had "a meaning in it;" this superstitious and egotistic notion made them the scourge of the surrounding tribes, but it was the evidence of their ethical superiority, and, preserved in their writings, it fills the bosom of Professor Muller with a sense of unbounded admiration.

The interviewer asked: "How would you explain the superiority of the Bible over other sacred books?" "I don't explain it," replied Professor Muller, "I only accept it as a fact," and then he proceeded to explain it. He said that all sacred books profess to be given by the deity and to be inspired. "The book is sacred because it is the gift of God; otherwise it would hav no authority." Teaching was in the keeping of the priests, and rather than spend time reasoning with the people over disputed points, they cut it short by saying, "This is divine truth, given to us by immediate revelation of the deity." Having heard Professor Muller say this—which covers the whole ground and is equally applicable to the priests of all religions—you would scarcely be prepared for what follows:

"With us things hav taken a different shape; we say, not that revelation makes truth, but that truth makes revelation; the sense of truth within us is to us the sense of God; the voice of God is to us the spirit of truth. We do not say that the New Testament was handed down from the sky in any miraculous way. The spirit of truth speaks, and what is perfectly certain, what is more certain than anything else, that is to us inspired."

But the truth of history is that the Christian has always stoutly maintained that revelation does make truth; that no matter how absurd and contrary to all human experience are the stories of the Bible they must be believed, on pain, if rejected, of eternal punishment in hell. If there is one dogma which more than another has been dinned into the ears of the Christians of all ages it is this, that we are not to believe that which to us is "certain," but what and all that the Bible says, wholly regardless of its inherent probability or improbability. We must believe, whether we can or not, or go to hell. That is the good old gospel, and it is yet in all the creeds, and while it remains in the creeds it is the official Christianity of the world and the Freethinker will deal with it as such. When Professor Muller says that "we do not say that the New Testament was handed down from the sky in any miraculous way," he means that he does not say so, but he is aware that the Christian world does say that it came to man in precisely that way, and that the written creeds of the churches declare that our eternal happiness depends upon our acceptance of this view.

The sense of truth within us is the sense of God, we are told, but we are not told why this sense of truth which is from God so flatly contradicts itself in different individuals and in successiv ages and antagonistic races and countries. This kind of inspiration is no more understandable than the old kind, and it is not likely to be of very much service to supernaturalism.

The Bible in the Schools.

Mr. S. J. Fleckter, one of our subscribers at Kandiyohi, Minnesota, complained to the attorney-general of the state because the Bible was read and the Lord's prayer repeated by the teacher in the school attended by his children. It seems that heretofore the religious exercises named hav not had a place in the curriculum of that district and Mr. Fleckter was surprised and justly indignant at the innovation, and so he took the action which called out the letter given below:

"ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct. 8, 1894.

"MR. S. J. FLECKTER, Kandiyohi, Minn., Dear Sir: The attorney-general always refers to this department letters relating to schools; he has so referred your letter of the 1st inst., requesting me to reply to it.

"Cases similar to that you mention are sometimes referred to me. I quote from a reply made to such a letter last December.

"'After consultation with the attorney-general, who has suggested the line of my answer, I reply as follows: The Bible has been honored by all intelligent people as a work of the highest literary merit. In view of this it can hardly be regarded as an impropriety for a teacher to read a brief selection from this book in the presence of the school. Even in the case of those who do not subscribe to the religious teachings of the Bible, their children would hardly receive any harm from such a procedure. No injury could probably result to a Mohammedan, a pagan, or a Freethinker in listening to a reading from the Bible. The exercise of good common sense and that toleration for which the United States is noted ought to lead to an amicable understanding among the people of the district, the board of trustees, and the teacher. The teacher will hardly persist, if he is a person of discretion, in a practice that causes trouble among the patrons of the school.'

"As in this case it appeared from Mr. Rollevson's letter that he is reading the Bible at the request of the board of trustees and a considerable number of the patrons of the school, it would probably be best to acquiesce in it. Should you, however, hav conscientious objections to having your children listen to such reading, the board of trustees and the teacher would perhaps excuse your children from attending the opening exercises.

"Gordon E. Cole, a former attorney-general, says as follows: 'Whether the book be good or bad, the legislature has vested the control of school in the trustees and . . . the matter is entirely with them, and I know of no authority competent to revise their action. They may exclude it if they desire, but it is within their power to prescribe it as one of the books to be used in the schools.'

"Yours very truly, W. W. PENDERGAST,
"Superintendent Public Instruction."

It seems needless to say that Superintendent Pendergast entirely misses the point in his answer to our subscriber. The literary excellences of the Bible hav nothing to do with the question of its use in the public schools. It is a religious authority, not a book of literary exercises, and it is as a religious authority that it is out of place in schools supported by and intended for the use of all the citizens of the state. It is not for Mr. Pendergast to say that the children of Freethinkers would not be harmed by the reading of this book in the common school room. This is a matter for the determination of the parents, not of any school officer. Quite possibly the children of Christians would not be harmed by the reading in the morning of a selection from the Koran or from the work of some Freethinker, but you may be sure that if such reading was attempted the Christians would make themselvs heard in protest, and rightly. "That toleration for which the United States is noted," would hav a new meaning for Christians under such circumstances. Probably even Superintendent Pendergast could then perceive the "injury" that results from sectarian exercises in the public schools.

The suggestion that the children of those who object to Bible reading and prayers in the schools be excused from the opening exercises adds insult to injury. This is particularly true of country schools and in the winter. The pupils must get to the schoolhouse in time to get warmed before school is called. They cannot afford to remain away until the religious services are over, for they will lose time if they do, and it would be impossible for them to so regulate their movements as to arrive at just the right moment to save themselvs from being tardy. There is no reason for resorting to any such makeshifts as this proposed by the Minnesota official. If Christian parents and Christian churches cannot giv their children the religious instruction they think they need without intruding those instructions in the common schools of all the people, they had better quit sending missionaries to the heathen.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week address Superintendent Pendergast regarding the matter here discussed. Ask him to lay this subject before the legislature at its coming session and request it to withdraw the power given to the school trustees to admit the Bible and religious services. Also ask him to quote for you the provisions of the state Bill of Rights relating to freedom of worship. It is probable that the reading of the Bible in the schools is unconstitutional. In fact, we are sure that it is, if Mr. Fleckter has made no mistake in quoting Sec. 16 of the state Constitution, and it is safe to assume that he has not. This is the section named:

"Nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any religious or ecclesiastical ministry against his consent, nor shall any control or interference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

It is perfectly clear that it is unconstitutional to read the Bible or repeat the Lord's prayer in the public schools of Minnesota, and that the legislators who gave permission for both to be done were bigots or incompetents, or a combination of both classes. It is self-evident that if the citizen cannot be compelled to erect or support any place of worship, the Bible cannot be read in the schools, for that reading makes the school-house a place of worship.

His Obscenity on the Rampage Again.

A few days ago Anthony Comstock made another of his customary raids. This time he robbed E. Vallet, of 144 West Twenty-first street, of a number of valuable pictures. What the pictures were and Comstock's high-handed methods are well shown in this report of the World:

"The first picture seized was a nude, entitled 'Nymphe sur le Po.' Under it was the inscription: 'Honi soit qui—.' It represents a nymph sitting in a wood. When the hammer proceeded to detach it from the wall Vallet clasped his hands and cried that it was a copy of the famous painting in the gallery of the Luxembourg, Paris.

"'It makes no difference where it comes from,' said the Comstock; 'it is not fit for young people to see.'

"'How do you know?' asked Vallet. "All these works are copies of the masterpieces of French art. You send your American boys to Paris to learn our art, but you will not permit that art to hav a representation here. Your boys are taught free in the schools of Paris. It is a shame. When I was young I wanted to go to the School of Fine Arts, but I could not because American boys had taken all the places.'

"'That has nothing to do with the case,' said Comstock. 'We can't sacrifice our boys for French art. Art has no privileges over morality,' he went on as he proceeded to take the pictures from the wall.

"'Yes, it has,' said Vallet. 'You hav plenty of nudes in the Museum of Art in the Central park, and you do nothing with them.' To this Comstock answered that he would not enter into any discussion over the matter."

Naturally this cowardly ignoramus would enter into no discussion concerning his failure to attack the Metropolitan Museum of Art; he dare not go in there and destroy and steal paintings and statuary; he knows how to measure the size and strength of his victims, and if he ever gets beaten it is when he encounters a judge who is not afraid of him and the Miss Nancies behind him. It is safe to rob some poor dealer or exhibitor, but to proceed against the Museum of Art would be too hazardous a venture.

"Art has no privileges over morality," says this man Comstock. He means that his conception of morality is so distorted and degraded that all nudity in art appears to him vile and corrupting. Cannot he see that this is his misfortune and not the fault of the art? Does he not know that there are tens of thousands of men and women whose refinement not even he dares call in question who pronounce very much that he condems as obscene and corrupting to be distinctly elevating in its tendencies, and promotiv of peace, order, and happiness?

Referring to this outrage, the New York Sun calls attention to the fact that, irrespectiv of the merits or demerits of the pictures seized, the character of the goods destroyed or appropriated should always be judicially determined, and that before they are seized or destroyed. It says: "In the present condition of the law, Anthony Comstock, a private individual, is virtually armed with an official commission as censor. . . . This is a serious power to intrust, without any assurance of responsibility, to a private citizen. . . . There is no better reason why such power of arrest and seizure should be given Anthony Comstock than to any other resident of New York, or why discrimination should be used against one alleged objectionable exhibit to the advantage of others." We commend these observations to Mr. Shaw and other Liberals who seem to think that we should hav nothing to do with the defense of persons charged with the violation of the so-called obscenity statutes. It must be borne in mind that in this case Comstock is acting under the authority of state laws, but when he acts under the authority of the federal statutes he is equally arbitrary, and then he has his victim at a still greater disadvantage, for it costs very much more to defend in the United States courts, the prisoner is often dragged away into a city or state where he is not known, and where, consequently, he is deprived of much of the advantage of a hitherto good life, and the penalties under the federal law are decidedly more severe than those inflicted by the state statutes.

As the Sun intimates, there is no more reason for investing Anthony Comstock with the authority to steal or destroy books and pictures which he says are obscene than there would be to authorize a constable to go into a grocery and destroy butter or coffee which he thinks is adulterated. Every person accused of an offense has the constitutional right to a jury trial; we do not want any lynch law. Comstock is a white cap, and that he was not long since brought up with a short turn is due to the fact that he has had the support of the theocratic party, which has not an atom of regard for the rights of the citizen who does not sacrifice on the altar of orthodoxy. Beyond this, it should be said that the fathers of this republic did not intend that the bulwarks of all free institutions and the safeguards of the rights of the people—Free Speech and Free Press—should be overthrown in the name of either religion or morality. The death of real morality is the sure result of a censorship by a creature like Comstock. If we are not competent to select our own reading and artistic adornments, are we competent to select our own religion and bodily sustenance and amusements?

A Baptist paper having said, "If God had his way," another paper of the same denomination rebukes it and asks:

"Who in his universe can prevent the Lord God Omnipotent from having his way?"

The Independent answers, "Man can and does," and it quotes some texts of scripture in support of its affirmation. Then it adds:

"If men would but fall into God's ways he would be all in all; but they will not, and so there is sin in the world, and despite the divine purposes and influences men reject God's overtures and perish. It is a mighty and awful fact that men thwart God's efforts to save them."

Could there be a more pitiful confession of the impotence of the divine being worshiped by the most advanced nations of the world? Where is the essential difference between the Independent's conception of its God and the conception which the "idolater" has of the god he whips when it does not giv him that for which he asks? In each case the infinite is admitted to be subject to the finite in many respects. The Independent cannot shut its eyes to the fact that the universe and the family of man are wretchedly imperfect, and so, instead of frankly admitting that the hypothesis of a perfect God is not reconcilable with the facts as they appear in the open light, it is forced to say the same thing in other words, which it does when it makes the assertions which we hav quoted. It all amounts to this, that the "Omnipotent" is not omnipotent.

THE FEDERATION AND UNION.

They Join Hands at the Annual Convention in Chicago.

PUTNAM IS PRESIDENT OF BOTH.

There Was a Good Attendance and Many Excellent Speeches Were Made—Secretary-Treasurer Reichwald's Encouraging Report—The National Spiritualists' Association Sends a Cordial Greeting—Letters from Absentees.

The joint convention of the Freethought Federation of America and the American Secular Union was called to order in Madison Hall, Chicago, October the 26th, at 10 A.M., by President Putnam, of the first-named organization. The hall is a nice one, in the fifth story, and was consequently quiet and free from interruption. Among the visitors were many who came to the Congress last year, and found it so pleasant they had to come again. There were Mr. Van Ness and brother, Mr. Whipple, B. A. Shaw (bringing his father along), from Iowa; Franklin Steiner, from the same state; Dolphus Millard, distributing cards describing himself as an "Independent Rationalist;" Mr. Green, now located in Chicago; Mr. Harman, all the way from Kansas; Mr. Kendall, of Wisconsin; Mr. Devenbaugh, of Indiana; John Mahara, Mr. Yeomans, F. D. Rexford, J. A. Greenhill, Mr. Smith, of Liberty, Iowa; A. Chapman, G. W. Purviance, J. O. Tronson, John Hudson, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, D. T. Ames, Mrs. Holmes and Mrs. White, Mrs. Power and husband, Mr. Burdick, and about fifty others who do not read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are therefore unknown to the reporter. The banner presented to the Federation last year by the Boulder, Col., Liberals, was suspended at one side of the hall, and was the only attempt at decoration.

On the platform, under a red canopy, which gave them an aureoled saint like appearance, were Mrs. Freeman and Dr. Juliet Severance. Dr. Severance represented Mr. Waite, president of the Secular Union, who was absent in Colorado, trying to sell $150,000 worth of horses and a ranch he took in trade for his quarter of a million dollar World's Fair hotel in Chicago.

The first business transacted was the appointment of a secretary of the Congress, and the audience seemed to think that E. M. Macdonald would do, and he was consequently selected. Then Mr. Putnam made the speech printed in last week's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But the audience was such a friendly one, and the meeting was so sort of informal and the place so home-like, that he had a hard time of it. They added to his facts and arguments as ideas occurred to them, amended his illustrativ anecdotes, and occasionally broke in with a "Say, Mr. Putnam!" and then went on to make a little speech themselvs, while the orator of the occasion hospitably waited for them to free their minds. About a third of them evidently thought they could get off the speech just a little better than Mr. Putnam could do it.

When the audience got the speech amended to their satisfaction, and permitted Mr. Putnam to conclude, Mr. Steiner moved the appointment of a committee of five on Resolutions, which should hav charge of all resolutions introduced. This proposal was adopted, and Mr. E. M. Macdonald was selected as chairman, with Franklin Steiner, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, John Mahara, and W. Bogard as conferees.

Dr. Greer, Mr. Barr, and Mrs. Devenbaugh were made a Committee on Credentials for the Union, and Messrs. Reichwald and Steiner acted in the same capacity for the Federation. After this was done short speeches were made by Mrs. Freeman, Mr. Steiner, and Dr. Severance.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

Friday afternoon the speaking was resumed, and Dr. Leon Lewis read a fine paper on Bruno, but too long for insertion here. Mrs. Macdonald sang "Sweet Marie" and Mesdames Holmes and White read excellent papers, though somewhat tinctured with the Anarchistic ideas prevalent in Chicago.

FRIDAY EVENING.

In the evening Mrs. Freeman had the floor as a substitute for others. First she read letters of regret from those who could not attend, and afterwards the speech Judge Waite would hav delivered had he been there. The following are some of the letters:

EAST NORTON, MASS., Oct. 7, 294.

DEAR MRS. FREEMAN: Your letter, for which, please receive my thanks, reached me away here in Massachusetts, where I came some weeks ago to see a favorit cousin about to add to her name that of another, who is her chosen life compauion, an acquisition which, if we realized its meaning, we should all hesitate to accept especially as promises are required iu the bargain very little understood by either party.

I wish I could be with you and the other dear friends who will make up the Aunual Congress, but that is not possible. The infirmities that come with age I hav not escaped, though my health is good, and so I must be content to stay at home. I know that you, with others who will be with you, will be faithful to the cause of humanitv. Please say to all with congratulations for what we hav already achieved, that in my estimation the foundation for all reforms is simple Freethought The struggle for bread, which is the struggle that most of the people of our country (not to speak of other countries) are contending with, is not effectiv, because people hav been taught that, "the poor ye hav always with you," and "blessed are the poor;" they shall "rest in Abraham's bosom," and "the powers that be are ordained of God." Woman, seeking the right to all that her nature demands has been constantly reminded that Eve ate the apple, and so through the whole list, the superstitions taught by the church are always in the way of progress. I hope the obscenity of the Bible will be brought before the people by the trial of Mr. Wise for sending one of its verses through the mails. If only we could get rid of that vice society which has so long cursed the country! But it seems impossible; like many another burthen which government puts upon its subjects, we are obliged to bear it; there is a little consolation in the knowledge that its agent, Comstock, is so ignorant that he fails to find social reform in anything save Mr. Harman's paper, while nearly every book published within the last five years abounds with it and all the public libraries, even in the small towns, are well stocked with them. What a good work has been done through the agency of THE TRUTH SEEKER in putting the "Age of Reason" into hundreds of families! Well, dear friends, all accept my love, and believe me to be your co-worker until death.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

MONTREAL, Sept. 21, 1894.

DEAR MRS. FREEMAN: Your kind letter of September 3d found me at Tononto on my way home after four months' absence in British Columbia. I should like to meet the Liberal friends again and hear one of your witty addresses and greet my good friend Judge Waite and his worthy wife once more. It would be a satisfaction also to ring more changes on the bells and hav the pleasure of addressing such intelligent audiences as gather at your conventions; but many circumstances seem to make it impracticable this year, and I fear I must content myself with reading the report of the good things you will enjoy.

I hope that together with friend Putnam you will succeed in arousing the enthusiasm of your members, and through the press reports awake the country in favor of the preservation of those liberties that are so seriously threatened by ecclesiastical usurpation.

Mrs. Adams thanks you for your kindly remembrance. Please giv our regards to all the friends, and believe me, with best wishes, Sincerely yours, ROB'T C. ADAMS.

To the Freethought Federation of America and American Secular Union in Convention Assembled.

DEAR FRIENDS: We are in the midst of perilous and trying times. Our beloved country is in a political ferment, and the traditions of our fathers are being tried in the furnace fires of doubt and discontent.

In the midst of conflicting forces and many discouragements, it is a pleasure and gratification to know that a body of Liberals, of able-minded men and women, such as constitute the Freethought Federation of America and American Secular Union, can meet together and harmoniously consider the most important of all the questions of the hour, and discuss ways and means for future action.

There was never greater need of concerted action than the present. Enemies of freedom, always alert and stirring, are to-day more activ than ever. Their encroachments must be sternly and vigorously met by the healthful forces of Liberty and the united efforts of Liberals.

While superstition livs and floats defiantly its banners in the breeze, there will be need of laborers in the vineyard of Freethought.

The principles of our cause need to be defined and extended. Over and over again, line upon line, precept upon precept, must the story of progress and liberty be told. Apathy and indifference will never gain a hearing for or a recognition of the principles we sincerely assert and maintain.

While Freethought may not be the exact remedy for all the ills that flesh is heir to, nor for some of the evils that we deplore, yet, it is without doubt, or the shadow of a doubt, the one great lever lifting the whole human race to better conditions, into a clearer and purer atmosphere. It is, undoubtedly, and surely, a panacea for much that disturbs and destroys the peace and well-being of communities. And there will not be—there can not be—any great and noticeable uplift of humanity, until the message of Freethought to the world, in all its beauty, significance, and glory is understood and accepted.

Freethought is the advance guard of civilization. It is the herald of real enlightenment.

It always has been, and always will be, the beacon light warning travelers off the treacherous shoals of ignorance. It always has been, and always will be, the bright star of hope and promis, pointing the way out from the morass of doubt and despair, away from the murky and desolating darkness of bigotry and superstition, into the fair land of fact and science.

The Demands of Liberalism are absolute and our land is in danger until those demands are recognized and conceded. And the danger is the greater because the foes we hav to meet are within the borders of the land, silently and insidiously plotting the overthrow and destruction of much that makes life attractiv and valuable.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and we cannot afford to lose one iota of our precious freedom by any neglect, by any relaxation of watchfulness, or putting aside the work that belongs to ourselvs to do.

The extension of Freethought, the inculcation of ideas of reform, and emancipation from mental bondage, that there may be no chains upon the human mind, is the great work confronting Liberal men and Liberal women. Through such forces, and in such channels, must come all social, religious, industrial, and political advancement. The coöperation of woman in this task is necessary and little can be accomplished without her aid and influence. Of this you are aware, and it is to liberal and progressiv minds that woman must look for the advantages that will make her position superior to present conditions.

Regretting my inability to be with you in person, yet shall I be with you in spirit, and I know that the work in which we all hav a mutual and common interest will be pushed with earnestness and enthusiasm.

With heartiest wishes for a successful Congress,
I remain, yours for Progress and Reform,
Fall River, Mass. SUSAN H. WIXON.

TORONTO, CAN., Oct. 24, 1894.

MY DEAR MRS. FREEMAN: I find that it is utterly impossible for me to be present at the Congress. I see, however, that you hav a full program and earnestly hope you may hav an interesting and profitable meeting.

If I might be allowed to do so, I would very strongly urge upon the Congress the necessity of uniting the Liberal forces in one organization; and, indeed, I wish I could see my way to proposing the formation of an International Freethought Union. My time, however, is so entirely taken up with local matters and the necessities attending a struggle for bread and butter that I do not see how I can help in any such scheme, though I hav no doubt it would hav a greatly extended influence, and would gain a support the present unions seem to lack.

Again wishing you a pleasant and successful gathering,
I am, Faithfully yours, J. SPENCER ELLIS.

TACOMA, WASH., Sept. 9, 1894.

MRS. M. FREEMAN, Dear Co-worker: Your favor of the 3d instant just received. I thank you for kind remembrance. My heart is in the work as ever, but the restraining grasp of poverty will prevent the possibility of my having the pleasure it would afford me to meet with and address the Liberals who will assemble at Chicago at the Eighteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

May wisdom and harmony prevail in its deliberations, and the cause we love receive new impetus from the zeal, devotion, and self-sacrifice manifested by all the faithful and true who shall hav the fortune to attend. With kindest wishes, Yours for Reason, Right, and Truth,
C. B. REYNOLDS.

CASTLE KEHM-ON-THE-WILLAMETTE, OR., Oct. 15, 1894.

To the members of American Secular Union and Freethought Federation of America in Convention Assembled.

FRIENDS: From across the continent we send greetings to you all, and the hope that your Convention will be a most successful one.

The task of undermining the strongholds of superstition is a great one, and one which will be accomplished only through thorough organization of our forces, and the adoption of an aggressiv and constructiv policy in our work.

May your Convention, then, work toward the realization of these ends. Sincerely, D. W. SMITH,
KATIE KEHM SMITH.

Judge Waite's address was as follows:

CRUSADE OF THE CHURCH AGAINST THE STATE.

Our government was founded upon the principles of civil and religious liberty, and upon the theory of a complete separation of church and state. But the church has never accepted the theory in good faith, and has never conformed to it. The church has felt, from the beginning, that Freethinkers had too much to do with framing the government, and has been engaged in a constant struggle to capture it from the Infidels.

A series of assaults were soon commenced, which hav been from time to time repeated and persisted in up to the present day. And nothing could demonstrate more forcibly the strength of our institutions and the powerful, though for the most part silent, growth of the Freethought sentiment by which they hav been supported than the fact that these assaults hav not been successful.

For a hundred years has this crusade been continued; and in order that we may realize the strain to which our institutions hav been subjected, it is necessary, for a short time, to review the history of the movement.

1. Chaplains in Congress. The church had failed to introduce chaplains into the convention that framed the federal Constitution. But in the first congresses it was more successful. Chaplains were appointed, and the practice thus commenced has been continued. The fact that it was contrary to the genius of the government could not, however, be ignored, and accordingly it has from time to time met with vigorous opposition. In 1839–'40, in 1845, in 1850, and in 1860, there were lively debates in Congress over the chaplaincy question, members contending that no warrant for such appointments could be found in the Constitution. In this contest the church has been successful. But though it is a step toward the union of church and state, there is a long way yet to go before the object can be accomplished.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Christian Evidence lecturers of England are no doubt very "cute"—in their own estimation. One of them says that Huxley believes in the soul, and to substantiate his assertion he quotes this: "Our knowledge of the soul is more intimate than our knowledge of the body." Asked to produce the book, he shows you an earlier edition of the lecture, "Descartes' Discourses on Method," careless of the fact that in the later editions Huxley has added a footnote in which he says that by soul he means the sum of the states of consciousness of the individual.

They hav some odd temperance societies in Russia. For instance: The one in the province of Tobolsk meets once a year in the church and, after singing a Te Deum, the members pledge themselvs to total abstinence for twelve months. However, they hav twenty-four hours of grace in which they can "decorate their heads with vine leaves." But whosoever breaks his pledge during the remainder of the year must pay a fine of twenty-five rubles to the church and the faithful members may spit in the face of the backslider. Those twenty-five rubles must make the church in Russia very lukewarm in its opposition to the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. That method of "reform" resembles that contemplated by some of our statutes in this country, which giv half of the fine assessed against the law-breaker to the informer. This is a good thing for the informer, giving him a present reward and stimulating him to promote the law-breaking industry in the "sure and certain hope" of future emoluments.

"No matter how much the wicked get, they only get it to lose; but whatever a good man gets he is going to keep. The devil cannot pick the lock that guards the treasures of the righteous."—Ram's Horn.

If that is in allusion to material treasures, we fail to see that the good man is any better off at the end of life than is the bad man, for it seems to be pretty well established that neither can take any material wealth with him, while, on the other hand, it would be preposterous to say that only fairly good men keep their hold until death on the property they hav accumulated. Then we must suppose that the Ram's Horn has reference to "spiritual" treasures, but, if so, what is meant by the assertion that what the wicked get of such treasures they get only to lose? If they possess "spiritual" wealth, are they "wicked"? Reading the above-quoted sentences in the only way in which it seems they were meant to be read, we are forced to conclude that the writer meant to be understood as saying that no matter how good and spiritual the "wicked" are they can never be good and spiritual! The devil has always a skeleton key that can open the door to their religious treasure house.

The Catholic Cardinal Vaughan of England recently delivered an address on the reunion of Christendom in which he intimated that his church was so anxious for such reunion that she would surrender for it three things: She would allow her clergy to marry; she would giv communion direct to communicants; she would allow the mass to be said in the vernacular. But she would insist upon the maintenance of the divine constitution of the church, meaning by this the supremacy of the Pope. The Outlook, commenting on the address, says:

"So long as the high-church Presbyterian puts the Presbyterian creed and assembly above the Bible, and the high-church Anglican the prayer-book and the rubrics above the Bible, and the Roman church the authority of the Pope above the Bible, and so long as other Christians insist upon the right of private judgment in the interpretation of the Bible, putting that and the individual conscience above all ecclesiastical authority, so long the reunion of Christendom cannot be anticipated as an immediately imminent event."

For all of which obstacles to the unity of Christendom before Christendom learns the lesson of equal liberty, all friends of freedom and progress must be sincerely thankful.

The Sunday-School Times says that God has ordained that many of his blessings "shall come to his children through prayer." He is perfectly willing to bestow them, we are told, but he must first be asked for them. When we cease to pray for ourselvs, or ask only little things, we "impoverish our lives. The same is true of prayers for others." We hav observed that it is safe only to pray for strength to be content with what we get or do not get, no matter what it is that we supplicate God to giv us. The American people prayed that Garfield would recover after he was shot down by the assassin, but he died. It would seem that the people prayed for something that was not "little," to Garfield, at least, but it does not appear to hav made any difference with God. Probably we shall now be told that "he knew best," but, if we admit that, what is the use of praying? Why not leave the determination of the matter to his superior judgment? Or does he want us to gratify his pride by getting down on our knees to ask him for something he has never had the slightest intention of giving to us? Only a short time since the Count of Paris died in England in spite of all the prayers and masses of the church in France. Was his life a "little" thing to the count? "Ask, and ye shall receive." What a humbug!

The Churchman of this city is very bitterly opposed to the present English ministry because it introduced a bill for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales. It thinks, however, that the opponents of the Welsh Establishment will ultimately be beaten and it places great reliance on "the determined attitude of the Church of England." Upon this the New York Tribune remarks that while Mr. Asquith's bill may not pass, "the disestablishment of the Church in Wales is sure to come before many years, and the opposition of the Anglican clergy will hav just about as much influence in preventing it as the crackling of thorns under a pot." The Tribune mentions the fact that the people of Wales do not want an established church, but says that this makes no difference to the Churchman and the Anglican Establishment. It adroitly brings into light the self-interest of the Welsh diocesan bishops, "five of whom hav an aggregate income of nearly $100,000 a year." While the people of the Old World are striving to free themselvs from the clutches of state ecclesiasticism, we in the United States are asked to make the churches supreme in political affairs and to surrender to them one-seventh of our time, the education of our children, and the selection of our books, periodicals, and entertainments.

It is never prudent to underrate your enemy's strength. It is far less risky to exaggerate it, although both extremes should be avoided if possible. In "Social England" H. D. Traill, referring to the decadence of the Puritan spirit, observes that while "culture and skepticism and the growth of luxury and refinement are no doubt affecting English character," the extent to which they are doing so is very much less than many superficial thinkers suppose. This mistake is due to the fact, says Mr. Traill, that "the classes which hav outgrown the influence of Puritanism are disproportionably vocal, as they are relativly small, while the classes among whom that influence is still dominant are a virtually voiceless multitude." The same is true here, but in a lesser degree, as it appears to us. Here the press speaks for this "multitude" more than it does in England, for the reason that our population is more scattered and the influence of the metropolitan papers is, consequently, less dominant. Mr. Traill continues:

"But the impartial student of the national character is constantly being confronted with evidence to the fact that the process of so-called 'emancipation' has reached but the merest fringe of the community, and that the great bulk of middle class Englishmen are still, to all intents and purposes, the true spiritual descendants of a Puritan stock."

The same is true of the United States, except in so far as the rich infusion of continental ideas has liberalized the more teachable of the descendants of the American Puritans, and it is this infusion which accounts for the fact—for we think it is a fact—that a larger proportion of "nativ Americans" than of Englishmen hav got rid of the most extreme and intolerant of the Puritan notions. This is encouraging, but it does not necessarily argue that we are in less danger of reaction than is the mother country. As before intimated, our country press is decidedly unprogressiv, it being to an alarming extent under the domination of the clergy, and the nation is so great in extent that the comparativly independent and progressiv journals of the larger cities do not reach the masses of the people. Herein is the hope and the opportunity of the Puritan, hater of the free Sunday, free art, and free literature.

The Charleston News and Courier, in an editorial written at the time Governor Tillman and Senator Butler were making their canvass of South Carolina, expresses the opinion that it was perfectly proper for the candidates and voters to open the meetings with prayers, for there were grave issues at stake and divine guidance was certainly needed to enable the speakers to "control their thoughts and utterances," but it thinks that there was "gross impropriety and irreverence in opening a meeting with prayer and concluding it with inflammatory and insulting speeches well calculated to arouse the passions of the armed men who are always present." It concludes with this advice:

"If we are to hav meetings opened with prayers, let pistols remain at home. If we are to hav the pistol as a campaign argument, dispense with the opening prayers. The two things do not go together."

No doubt the News and Courier means well and does the best it knows how as a mere secular newspaper, but it is certainly all at sea as to what is proper in the Christian warfare. Men who are cool-blooded, amenable to reason, and disposed to let facts and logic decide the issues of debate, do not need to get down on their knees and pray when they step on to the rostrum. They are going to argue, not quarrel, and there is no danger of bloodshed and of the sudden and violent summoning of souls to the "judgment bar of God." But in the South Carolina campaigns it is different and every good Christian wants to be sure that he is spiritually all right before the speaking begins, so that if the knife or bullet of some other good Christian should pierce his vitals he will go to the country which has the best climate. Assuredly, prayers and pistols are very congruous. Does not the News and Courier know that we hav chaplains in all our armies and navies and that it is always in order to pray on the eve of battle? Do not all nations when they are engaged in the work of reducing each other's surplus population pray fervently to their respectiv gods, or sometimes to the same god, to help them get the best of the other fellows by inflicting all the damage on them that they can? Are there not often religious ceremonies when war vessels are launched and when flags are presented to regiments? It seems to hav always been a religious rule to make supplications to the gods numerous and earnest in the ratio that the enterprise about to be entered upon promised to be hazardous, destructiv, and bloody. There does not appear to be any valid reason why a primary campaign in Carolina should be an exception to this time-honored and church-blessed practice and hence we cannot help thinking that the Charleston paper has made a serious mistake, measuring its expressed opinions by religious standards.

Of all hateful things nothing can be more hateful than a combination of race and religious prejudices. The teacher of a school for girls in this city announced that she would take no more Jewish pupils, giving as her reasons, in a letter to a Jewish lady, that "Gentiles demand an exclusivly Gentile school for their daughters, and the Hebrews I find are now objecting to the school because there are so few Gentiles here." It seems that some years ago the Gentiles objected to this teacher because she refused to giv up her Jewish pupils; so she lost their patronage, to a considerable extent. Now the more aristocratic Jews object to the school because there are not enough Christians in it! Evidently they are striving after social equality with the Gentiles, while the latter are determined that they shall not attain it if they can be kept down in the scale. The whole squabble is a good illustration of how little the fashionables care for education for their children for the sake of education, and how much they wish for position in a worthless "society." Commenting on this case, the Christian Advocate observes:

"The main reason, though they may not be conscious of it, that 'Gentiles' are jealous of Jews in a school is that they are not able to contend with the Jews intellectually. What a burlesque of democracy these race prejudices are! How hollow are the loud-swelling paragraphs which popular orators utter and rhetoricians write about equality, fraternity, and the glorious fact that every man has as good a chance in this country as any other!"

That is right to the point, but the Christian paper has apparently forgotten that we are indebted to the religion it professes for the common prejudice against the Jews. The ancient Jew was charged with the impossible crime of killing God, and his descendants hav been hounded ever since by the Christians who, if their religion is based on fact, would hav had no "crucified redeemer" to worship if the Jews had refused to kill Jesus. If Christianity is true the Jews had to murder God's son, for God had set him aside from the foundation of the world as the sacrifice for man's sins, and had decreed that he should die at the hands of the "Chosen People," and yet the Christian has made that mythical story the excuse and justification for the most atrocious outrages against the unhappy Jews. This is one of the ways in which Christianity has "civilized" the world.

If Jesus had been a woman there would not be so many Marys and Marthas in heaven.

Observations.

Experience instructs us that when we commit ourselvs or any other indiscretion we will be jumped upon. It is a law of nature, and, as the funeral orators assure us with regard to death, it is inevitable. I therefore know that if I relieve my overburdened system on the subject of free silver coinage, Mr. Roscoe of Brooklyn will nail me. When I talk free trade, Mr. Hays of Ohio only waits for his hens to go to roost before he gets after me. The editor of Liberty discourages my aspirations to eliminate daggers and dynamite from the discussion of economic questions. My chastely written essays on the connubial state hav evoked protests from esteemed lady readers. Only yesterday an old subscriber called in time to spoil a sonnet by warning me that the longevity of my ancestors could not be relied upon to insure me length of days if I continued to make poetry. So I may not evolve a thought, nor subject deep excogitate, e'en though my think-tank be alive with thinks in protoplasmic state. Nor was the mouth which I possess, by me e'er used for truth's behoof, but some who would the same suppress arose to call me off its roof.

My latest indiscreet act consists in referring with levity to the publication in an English paper of what was represented to be an up-to-date interview with Mary Queen of Scots, who was beheaded in 1587. And now, anent that same, my friend Judge Brewer, of Cortland, N. Y., writes me an intimation that my observations on death and the after life do not display a right conception of ascertained facts as he sees them. The judge's contribution to the subject is contained in a statement substantially like this: That he wrote a letter to a relativ ten years deceased, applied to a medium, and received, upon slates, a communication not only replying in a satisfactory manner to his favor of even date, but written in the well-known hand of the relation addressed. Other circumstances were that the medium and Judge Brewer were strangers; that the letter was written in the privacy of the judge's own room and was never out of his custody; that he was in his normal condition when the answer was received; that it was broad daylight; that there was no person in the room except himself and the medium; that he was addressed by his full name and that the full Christian, married, and related names of the decedent were signed; that the slates were never out of his hands or sight; that he heard the scratching of the pencil as it wrote. The slates were tied together. With a few changes the foregoing describes a seance that I once had, except that I recognized none of the handwriting. Perhaps that was because I addressed a fictitious person; the same sent me a message, however, promising to be with me always. I take it that he was one of the poor people mentioned in the scriptures, whom we are always to hav in our society. There were no manifestations not explainable in the ordinary way.

I cheerfully avouch that Judge Brewer is a man whose word is to be taken as he givs it. He is not a promiscuous and miscellaneous liar, like myself, and there is no reason to doubt that his account is correct. The facts that he has not stated, because they esc ped his observation, would be necessary to an explanation of those he has mentioned. The conclusion that spirits write on slates involves so much, and has so many corollaries, that I hesitate to jump at it. Besides, when I remember all the mean people who hav lived, and are now deceased, I find much encouragement in my belief that the dead are dead for keeps.

The field of Spiritualistic journalism is not sacred from the invasion of enterprise and competition. Dr. A. B. Dobson, the healing medium, who lived for many years at Maquoketa, Ia., passed from this life recently at San Jose, Cal. Being recognized as a rustler and also as one who understood the value of advertising, it was altogether natural that he should appreciate the same qualities in others. Hence when the editor of the Light of Truth got a scoop on his loathsome contemporaries in announcing the "transition" of Dr. D., recognition of the fact by the deceased was immediate. The doctor's shade at once dropped in at the office of the paper in Cincinnati, O., and while he did not plank down a year's subscription in advance he left a communication which must hav been almost as gratifying to the editor. It began: "Being the first paper to notice my transition, I hav sought an avenue through the Light of Truth." It sounds just like the doctor; he believed in taking his announcements to an editor who could get a move on himself, the same as that familiar old contributor, Vox Pop, whose communication uniformly begins with the word's, "Recognizing the enterprise of the Bugle as a purveyor of news." Well might the editor of our contemporary vaunt himself, if he felt so disposed, with the remark, "It is a cold day when the Light of Truth gets left."

Dr. Dobson, in the communication referred to, says that he is still attending the cases he had on hand at the time of his decease, and finds himself as usual healing the sick. Instances are known to the history of medical practice where the recovery of the invalid was attributed to his physician dying first and giving him a chance to get well, but as Dr. Dobson though dead yet doctoreth, no such conclusion can be reached in the case of his patients, and one hope is denied their friends. The question then arises whether his heirs are entitled to the fee, and if not why not. It was reported the other day that a young lady had sued the estate of her intended husband, whom she charged with breach of promis in that he had then and there broken their engagement by then and there dying. The cases are not parallel, but both are interesting nevertheless.

Dr. Dobson expresses a wish which the most of us will find it easy to respect. He says: "Only one request I make here: It is that no one claim me as a guide, nor evoke me." Possibly the Banner of Light office-medium, or the spirit-message clerk in the Progressive Thinker office, will exclaim that these words are an artful interpolation by the editor of the journal in which they appear, designed to clinch his hold on Dr. Dobson as a correspondent of his paper to the exclusion of the others; but then, what one person says about another person in the same line of business is sometimes inspired by envy.

As one who is not at all certain that the dead write or dictate letters to the quick, I do not attribute the communication here discussed to the spirit of Dr. Dobson; there is better reason to believe that the spirit of modern journalism has got enrapport with the Light of Truth office. The failure of the deceased to giv his present address is a suspicious circumstance and supports that theory.

"The Czar is drowsy!" Does he rest,
Or does a dark and horrid past
Across his brain its shadow cast
And press like lead upon his breast?

And does his filmy eye, that gleams
So dully 'neath its nerveless lid,
Behold what from its light was hid
And dwell on horrors while he dreams?

Or comes there to his ears again,
From which the sense of sound has fled,
The wail of those who mourn their dead
By his imperial mandate slain?

The Czar is drowsy! Warmth and light,
The pulse of blood, the stir of breath,
Forsake him, but can even death
Shut from his mind all sound and sight?

From out the dungeons czars hav built,
From out Siberia's prison mines,
Where sun of hope nor freedom shines,
Must shrieks and curses cry his guilt.

And clanking chains and whistling knout,
A land with crime and suffering wrung,
Might giv the martyred dead a tongue,
And lend new volume to the shout.

The Czar is dying! Who shall weep?
Let anodyne allay his pains,
But be the present rest he gains
Prolonged to everlasting sleep!

A correspondent at Carroll, Ia., Mr. Richard Conway, sends me a clipping and asks me how I like "Brother Bob" revised and enlarged. Said clipping is an obituary notice of Mrs. Amanda Meyers, who, according to the writer, died in Jesus at or near Lyons, Ia., and awaits the resurrection in the Blue Grass cemetery. This was the 19th of September, and it is to be supposed that she still waits. What my correspondent calls attention to is the eulogistic matter following the statement of facts in the obituary. Having set forth, as aforesaid, that Mrs. Myers died in Jesus and awaits the gladsome sound of his voice at Blue Grass, also that the funeral was a social success, the mortuary editor says:

> The loving wife, mother, and friend died where womanhood's morning almost touches noon.

The reader who does not recognize those words as a paraphrase of Robert G. Ingersoll's tribute to his brother Ebon, will still find something in them to make him pause and reflect. Mrs. Meyers was born in 1827 and was going on sixty-eight years of age. If that may be called life's morning, how old would the deceased hav been if she had lived till sundown?

The writer follows Ingersoll's words along down the page as closely as the sex of the departed will permit, even to declaring that "in every storm of life" she was "oak and rock;" and although previously asserting that Mrs. Meyers was a Methodist and one of God's people, he does not hesitate to aver that she "left all superstition far below." Then follows a rank interpolation, for "the dawning of a brighter and grander day" that fell upon her forehead is described as "in the loving embrace of Jesus our savior." There are also other variations, such as "duty toward God" and "worshiper of God." After these the writer finishes the paraphrase of the tribute, but, evidently regarding it as incomplete, he adds:

> And while we mourn we are consoled by the thought that she is released from her suffering, her spirit happy and at rest in the paradise of God, and that the "first resurrection" will reunite all who liv to obtain a part therein.

It is these revisions and enlargements, I suppose, that led Mr. Conway to ask how I liked the result. I am candid in saying that it does not please. It is edited too much like a mixed quatrain I saw lately—two lines from Scott and two from Pope—as follows:

> O woman! in our hours of ease
> Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face.
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I recently expressed the thought that Colonel Breckinridge's campaign for renomination as candidate for Congress must hav convinced him that he was not the only hypocrit in Kentucky. To the support of that opinion I now bring the Prophet Mohammed Charles Chilton Moore, one of Breckinridge's political rivals and editor of the Blue Grass Blade, who, speaking of the defeated candidate, says:

> We who hav been blasting him are no better than he is if others could know about us as we know ourselvs.

Such confession must be good for the soul of Mr. Moore. Now let him call upon the other gentlemen, and especially upon the ladies, who worked and prayed against Breckinridge on moral and religious grounds, to come and do likewise. They need not specify their sins, which are nobody's business. Only let them own up; and, above all, shut up.

Colonel Ingersoll's late commentaries on holy writ, which he is now delivering in the form of a lecture entitled "All About the Bible," embrace remarks that seem to me to express the sublimity of charity and benevolence. The method which he pursues in this work is to take up the books or divisions of the Bible one after another, to comment upon their value, and then pass on to the next. This naturally brings him in the course of time to a consideration of the book of Ruth, when he says: "I admit that the history of Ruth is in some respects a beautiful and touching story; that it is naturally told, and that her love for Naomi was deep and pure. But in the matter of courtship we would hardly advise our daughters to follow the example of Ruth. Still," admits the colonel—and it is here that his thoughtfulness displays itself—"we must remember that Ruth was a widow."

Literature is pathetic with apologies for the sacrifices of wives for their husbands, of mothers for their offspring, and of maidens for their sweethearts. It was time that something should be said in behalf of the widows who are at times impelled to make a little break on their own account.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Four New Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty-five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also in press, and will be ready soon. The price of each will be twenty-five cents. They will be printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. Every one will want copies of these splendid addresses, and orders may be sent to us at once, and will be filled as soon as we get the books from the publisher.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents, of churches in the District of Columbia were early made and constantly continued. These applications at first came in modest form, Congress being asked to grant such powers, privileges, and immunities as "they in their wisdom should deem proper." Afterwards the requests were changed to demands, the ministers appearing with bills in their pockets drawn to suit themselvs, and boldly claiming that their property should be exempt from taxation. These claims hav been partially successful, though the course of Congress in regard to taxation of church property has been so vacillating that it cannot be said that any national policy has been adopted. One of the earliest of these bills of incorporation was vetoed by President Madison in 1811, on the ground that it exceeded the rightful authority to which governments are limited by the essential distinction between civil and religious functions, and violated, in particular, the article in the Constitution of the United States, which declared that Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion.

For the same reason President Madison vetoed a bill reserving a certain parcel of land for the use of a church. These vetoes checked, for a time, this species of legislation; but the churches, by constantly watching their opportunity, and by continued besieging, not only obtained acts of incorporation but occasionally succeeded in getting appropriations. Of late years, also, Congress has established a system of appropriations for sectarian schools among the Indian tribes. It may be safely said that the national policy is against appropriations for churches or for religious purposes. Nearly the only exception consists in these appropriations for sectarian schools; and there is a fair prospect that this practice will, at no distant day, be abandoned.

3. Sunday Mails. The greatest contest and the longest continued, was over the Sunday mails; and in that the church party was utterly routed. The principal honor of the victory was due to Senator Johnson, of Kentucky, who, by his memorable report in 1829, put a quietus upon the crusade against Sunday mails. In a masterly review of the whole question, he showed that the movement was "an entering wedge of a scheme to make the government a religious instead of a social and political institution." The movement, having since then slept for more than sixty years, now shows some signs of resuscitation. Logical consistency requires Sunday advocates to open the question again. But they will not succeed, unless indeed as a part of their general success all along the line. If the government is to go into the hands of the church, then we may expect to lose our Sunday mail. But not otherwise.

4. Exemption of Church Property from Taxation. In nothing is the crusade of the church against the state more apparent—in nothing does it more clearly display its hostility to our republican institutions than in the tenacity with which it insists upon having its property exempted from those burdens which are borne by other classes of the community.

Taking the census of 1890 as a basis, and making allowance for the different species of property not reported, the amount of untaxed church property is about a thousand millions of dollars; and when we consider the undervaluations that would be very naturally given in, it is more probable that the total is double that amount, or two thousand millions of dollars. This is the burden which the American people are carrying for the benefit of the churches. How long will they submit to it, how long before they will pass laws subjecting all church property to taxation, remains to be seen. Institutions and customs sanctioned by the usages of hundreds of years are not to be overthrown in a day. But the people are constantly growing more restless under such a burden. They cannot fail to see that all exempted property throws upon the other property in the community an additional amount of taxes exactly corresponding to the proportionate amount of property exempted. If one-fifth of the property is exempt, the taxes on the other four-fifths are just twenty-five per cent more than they otherwise would be; $400 of property having to pay the tax belonging to $500.

The city of Chicago has been trying to make the Young Men's Christian Association pay for the water it uses. The association claims that it is just as reasonable that it should be exempt from water rates as from taxes. And the argument is a good one. To exempt it from either is to rob the balance of the community.

5. The Sunday Movement. Sunday is a Catholic institution. No sacredness was attached to it in the early history of the church. The obligation to keep it different from other days rests upon the traditions and decrees of the Catholic church. But the Protestants, in adopting the day, are not satisfied to adopt at the same time the mode of keeping the day. To do that would be to admit, too distinctly, its Catholic origin. They wish to make a more sacred day of it. The Protestants, while they admit there is no authority in the New Testament for changing the Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday, nevertheless claim the right to do so. Taking the Catholic Sunday, they wish to attach to it the sacredness of the Jewish Saturday. And having done that they wish to compel by law all American citizens to observe it according to the ideas of sacredness which they, the Protestants, choose to attach to it. They hav various state laws for that purpose, and now they wish a national law. They hav not yet succeeded, but they will not desist in their efforts to that end; nor must we desist in our determined efforts to prevent it.

Notwithstanding the World's Fair Sunday act, which was exceptional in its character, the government is not fully committed on the Sunday question. It is on the defensiv. In the action lately taken, overruling the order of Postmaster Hesing, in the matter of the Sunday parade of the carriers, the department was careful not to put it upon the ground that Sunday was to be observed as a sacred day, or even as a rest day. The order, though claimed as a triumph by the ministers, was not so great a triumph after all. Their persistent opposition may hav had something to do with the result, but the action of the department is based expressly upon the ground that some of the clerks might not participate, and this might prevent such a complete inspection as was required. On the Sunday question the government is on the defensiv, resisting while strongly besieged. Every aid should be rendered by all good citizens to make its defense effectual.

This is the phase of the crusade which is more immediately upon us. It demands our constant watchfulness, our unceasing vigilance, our earnest activitv.

6. God in the Constitution. This has been a battle-cry of the crusaders. They would hav the fundamental law of the land given a religious character. Then they would be prepared for other victories. If it is important for them to hav such a change, it is equally important for us that the change should not be made. We hav been and we must continue to be on the alert in this matter.

At the hearing lately appointed before the committee in Washington, Mr. Putnam, ever vigilant, was on hand, but his argument was, for the present at least, deemed unnecessary. Ordinarily, when the Court declines to hear opposit counsel, no decision adverse to him is to be apprehended. Still we trust he will only rest upon his arms, keeping them bright and ready for the conflict.

7. This is a Christian Country. If the decision of Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States, made in February, 1892, in the case of the Trinity church vs. the United States, declaring this to be a Christian country, was not of itself a part of the crusade, it certainly gave a powerful stimulus to the movement, and placed a most effectiv weapon in the hands of the crusaders. And what places Justice Brewer under suspicion of having joined the crusade, and of having given the opinion for the purpose of aiding the movement, is, that it was not necessary to a decision of the case, that he should express any opinion upon that subject at all. The fact that the opinion was unnecessary makes it what lawyers call an obiter dictum; that is, something said outside the case.

The Church of the Holy Trinity, of New York, had made a contract with a Mr. Warren, of England, to come over to New York and become the pastor of the church, which Mr. Warren did. But an act of Congress had been passed against the importation of foreigners under contract to perform labor or service in this country; and suit was brought against the church for the penalty for violating this law. The Circuit Court of the United States in New York decided against Trinity Church, and the church took the case to the supreme court of the United States. Justice Brewer, in deciding the case, held that the act of congress was intended to apply to manual labor only, and that it did not apply to professional men. Mr. Warren being a professional man and not a laboring man, the justice held that the law did not apply to him. Don't you see that that should hav ended the case? Don't you see that it made no sort of difference what kind of a professional man Mr. Warren was? Whether he was a lawyer, a preacher, a doctor, or a teacher of music? It was not necessary at all to say anything about the Christian religion or any other religion.

But Justice Brewer, who seems to hav wanted to help along the religious crusade against the government, going beyond any necessity in the case, held that this being a religious country, and Mr. Warren being a minister of religion, it could not be presumed that the act of Congress was intended to apply to him. If Mr. Warren, instead of being a minister, had been a teacher of music, it was not to be presumed that the act of congress was intended to apply to him. If Mr. Warren, instead of being a minister, had been a teacher of music, then it might be argued that this being a country in which people are fond of music, it was not to be presumed that the act of congress was intended to apply to him, and the argument would hav been just as good. But in that case Mr. Warren would hav been outside the act of congress, not because he was a musician, but because he was not a manual laborer, within the meaning of the law, as Justice Brewer construed it. So in the case as it was. If the statute did not apply to Mr. Warren, it was not because he was a minister, but because he was a professional man, and not a laboring man within the meaning of the law.

As Justice Taney in the celebrated Dred Scott case, going beyond any necessity, by an elaborate dictum, sought to bolster up the cause of American slavery, so here Justice Brewer in the same way has done what he could to support the American church and to strengthen it in its assaults upon our free institutions.

8. The Blair Amendment. This attempt to amend the federal Constitution so as to require the principles of the Christian religion to be taught to all the youth of our country has met with a complete failure. The attempt will no doubt be renewed, and we must be prepared to resist it, whenever and in whatever form it may be made.

Such is the crusade which has been carried on and which is still carried on by the Church against the State in this country. Such are the assaults which, for over a hundred years, hav continually been made by the advocates of the prevailing religion upon our republican form of government and upon our free institutions. The aim is to overthrow them, and to establish in their place a theocratic oligarchy. The claim of those ministers who are now managing this movement, of their right to dictate the laws, is unblushingly put forth, and we are told that if we are not satisfied with such a state of things we can leave the country. But we will not leave the country. We will remain; and we will fight all these movements to the bitter end.

Our principles are silently pervading the masses. We are rapidly becoming a nation of Freethinkers. Our sentiments find voice through the press, in city councils, in state legislatures, in the halls of Congress. The foundations of the old religious edifice are crumbling, and already it totters to its fall.

While many things hav conspired to bring about the present situation—the progress of science and scientific modes of thought, to which religion and the Bible are at variance—the spirit of investigation which has inquired into the origin of books and of doctrins which had been received as heaven-descended—the contradictions, absurdities, and indecencies which hav more and more become patent in the book supposed to hav been inspired—while all these causes hav been at work, there has been, all the time, one central idea ever uppermost—one thought which never would down, and which has been more potent, perhaps, than all other causes together. That is, how the God of the universe could be capable of arranging a scheme for the salvation of a few who could believe a certain form of doctrin, while among the many who could not believe it, and who would be lost, would be friends, companions, and relativs of the saved.

Historians tell us that in the seventh century, when the Frisians of Germany were being conquered to Christianity, and the pagan chief Radbod was about to be baptized—when he had even gone so far as to immerse one of his legs in the baptismal font, he turned suddenly upon the bishop and asked, "Where are my dead forefathers at present?" "In hell, with all other unbelievers," replied the bishop. "Mighty well," said Radbod, removing his leg, "then will I rather feast with my ancestors in the halls of Woden, than dwell with your little starveling band of Christians in heaven."

The thought of Radbod had been coming down through the generations, and had worked its way among the millions. It has kept people from church, and it has kept people who go to church from the anxious seat. It has year after year increased the cost of converting the heathen. It is now overturning that system of religion, the contemplation of which started the thought in the honest pagan's brain.

Friends, we hav much to encourage us. The net results of the hundred years' struggle are by no means disheartening. What the church has gained is much less than what it has attempted and has failed to accomplish. In its desperation, distrusting the power of that holy spirit upon which it has urged others to rely, the church has resorted to constitutional changes and legal enactments for the purpose of forcing its effete religion upon a free people. Shall the attempt be permitted to succeed? Never! Never!

Inspired with fresh zeal and renewed courage, let us renew the struggle. Whatever may be the result, we shall at least hav the satisfaction of knowing that in our day and generation we hav all done what we could to transmit to those who shall come after us the blessings of a republican form of government, and of those free institutions which, if preserved, will be a guaranty of civil and religious liberty for all time to come.

Stuart Beattie, D. T. Ames, and Mr. Putnam followed in more of the short and informal talks which were a feature of this Congress.

SATURDAY MORNING.

The morning of Saturday was used for the business meeting of the Union. Dr. Severance presided. The doctor is a strict parliamentarian, and held the delegates down to business. Mrs. Freeman read her report as Secretary. She quoted Linton's speech in Congress against the Indian school appropriation bill as a sign of the times, and also the fact that a Chicago Presbyterian preacher wanted church property taxed. The work of the Union itself had been done mostly in Chicago in opposition to the church societies. The Union had checked the Sunday Observance societies, and also the ministers who wanted to proselytize the unsuspicious people of Chicago. A friend of the Union had paid out about $125 in printing leaflets for these purposes. The President, Mr. Waite, had also written several articles for the Boston Investigator. The report was adopted as read.

Otto Wettstein, the treasurer, being in Europe, his son appeared in his stead and read the treasurer's report, which may be summarized as follows: Balance on hand at beginning of the fiscal year, $90.92. Receipts for year, $163.85. Expenses, $125.98. Balance, $37.87.

John Mahara moved and J. A. Greenhill seconded a proposition that the balance was too small, and that the members present be assessed a dollar each. Carried. Messrs. Mahara and Greenhill paid their dollar at once, as did Mr. Kendall, Moses Harman, Mr. Smith, Mr. Bosworth, and others.

D. T. Ames moved that the two organizations be merged into one, and that the officers to be elected for both be the same. John Mahara seconded the proposition, and added an amendment that they use the name of the Secular Union. Mr. Putnam remarked that the thing couldn't be done, as the constitutions stood in the way. The chair agreed with him and that settled it. The proposition of Messrs. Ames and Mahara was then made as an advisory one, and in that shape carried.

A motion to elect by acclamation was carried. Mr. Barr of Chicago nominated Samuel P. Putnam, and then the nominations were closed, which elected him. Dr. Severance was made first vice-president, Judge Waite second, Dr. J. H. Greer third, Mr. Betz fourth. Mrs. Freeman was re-elected secretary, and the Secular Union adjourned.

Mrs. Freeman read a letter to the Union from Mr. Gardiner of Troy as to details of organization and another from Katie Kehm Smith on Secular Sunday Schools, which will appear later.

The National Spiritualists sent the following, which reached the secretary of the Congress at this time as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 26, 1894.

To the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation in Convention assembled, Greeting:

We are making a strong fight for no God in the Constitution of the United States of America. We stand by the Constitution of the days of Jefferson and Thomas Paine. Let us unite, and as this world is our home and doing good our religion, stand always together for Liberty and Progression.

HARRISON D. BARRETT, Pres.,
FANNIE B. WOODBURY, Sec.,
National Spiritualists' Association.

The secretary was ordered to reply, which he did in the subjoined:

CHICAGO, Oct. 27, E. M. 294.

To the National Spiritualists' Association, Greeting:

Your welcome message on the line of march was received by the United Congress of the Freethinkers of America with enthusiasm. We heartily reciprocate your good will, and we are instructed by the Congress to send to you our message of fellowship, and whether the march be longer or shorter we will always stand together in the cause of eternal right. Nothing is more precious than liberty, more necessary to human progress than human rights. With the fathers of the Republic "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." With best wishes of all members of the Congress, Yours truly, E. M. MACDONALD, Sec. of Congress.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

The Federation had its business session at this time, and cut it about as short as the Union did. Things were so harmonious that they went quick. E. C. Reichwald read the secretary's and treasurer's reports as follows:

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

The work of the Federation for the last year has been one of great importance; some gain has been made for Freethought, and the aggressions of the church hav been resisted and defeated. The ecclesiastical party, encouraged no doubt by its success in Congressional enactments for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday, introduced into both branches of Congress a bill to amend the Constitution, so as to make this a Christian government. It is known as the "God-in-the-Constitution" amendment, an amendment which, radical and revolutionary in its nature, would logically disfranchise every Freethinker.

For years the Christian political party has been laboring for this amendment, and it rallied all its forces in order to influence Congress to present this amendment to the American people. The President of the Federation, together with others, were present before the Congressional Committee, in order to combat the arguments of the clergy, who were about the only ones who seemed desirous of passing the amendment, as they would be the chief, if not the only ones, who would receive any benefit from the proposed change. The prospect of a long and exciting debate on questions of such vast importance seemed to disturb the Committee of Congress; and in order to avoid the whole matter the amendment was laid upon the table, so that for the time being the victory is with Freethought. But none the less does it demand unremitting watchfulness on the part of the Federation to see that this undertaking is not renewed and made more successful when more pliable and corrupt politicians are at hand.

This project of the church party having failed, a more determined effort was made for Sabbath legislation. Bills are now before Congress for this purpose, liable to be acted upon at any time; and it will require constant attention on our part to counteract their repeated efforts for the passage of a national Sabbath law. We must be in a position immediately to send a representativ of the Federation to Washington whenever this matter is before Congress, as it undoubtedly will be during the coming session.

The New York Constitutional Convention afforded another field for effort in behalf of Freethought. It was proposed, if possible, to induce the Convention to present to the people of New York an amendment in favor of equal and impartial taxation, so that church property could not be exempt even by legislativ enactments. A powerful pamphlet on "Church Property" was prepared by the Truth Seeker Company and widely circulated. Fifteen hundred copies were distributed over the state by the Federation, copies were sent to all the papers, to state and county officials, and to members of the Convention. The pamphlet attracted wide attention and quite numerous extracts were made from it by the secular papers; and even some Christian journals and clergymen admitted the force of its arguments. President Putnam visited Albany and conferred with many members of the Convention in regard to church taxation and found a large number in its favor and also in favor of prohibiting by constitutional enactment appropriations from the public treasury to sectarian institutions. Had the Convention devoted itself to universal principles instead of to party policy it might hav presented these great issues to the people as a matter of justice. But the Convention decided for what was expedient to the majority as representativs of a party organization, and not for the good of all the people.

But the agitation of these questions of Freethought has no doubt spread information among the people and set them to thinking, which will bear fruits for just legislation in years to come.

In connection with the American Secular Union the Federation decided to hold the present joint Congress. An appeal for funds was generously responded to. Mr. Putnam devoted two months of his time to the work of the Congress. Hundreds of letters and thousands of circulars were sent all over the country. Notwithstanding the industrial and financial depression the old-time enthusiasm of the Freethinkers was aroused, and through this Congress, no doubt, a fresh impetus will be given to our cause, and Freethinkers will work unitedly together.

The persecution of Mr. Wise in Kansas for sending passages of the Bible through the mails is a religious persecution, and it forces upon our attention the despotic spirit of the church, and shows that it is ready to resort to the most cruel and oppressiv measures in order to compel people to accept its authority. Freethinkers must rally to the defense of Mr. Wise and others who hav been attacked by these unjust laws which, enacted professedly for the benefit of morality, are in reality for the destruction of Freethought.

Utah is about coming into the Union as a state; a tremendous effort is being made by the churches to incorporate a religious declaration in the constitution of the new state, which was accomplished in Washington and Montana. There is a strong Liberal element in Utah, and the Freethinkers of all the Union should support Utah friends in the great contest which is now before them. If a sufficiently energetic effort is made the plans of the church party can be defeated.

In Chicago and many other cities, great efforts are being made by religious combinations to enforce a Puritanic Sabbath. It is necessary that we be on our guard against these efforts, and to maintain personal liberty. Great efforts are also being made in Chicago and elsewhere to destroy our state secular schools by the introduction of the reading of the Bible and other religious exercises. It is necessary for Liberals to be constantly vigilant in these matters. We must oppose a strong and crafty organization, which will resort to any means to carry out its purposes against American liberty. The Federation needs the support of all Liberals in its work. We must organize. We must labor together on the broad basis of state secularization. It is a matter of self-defense. We are being continually attacked; and we must resist, in order to preserve our rights and the principles of the republic.

The report of the Treasurer shows that the Liberals of the country hav confidence in the Freethought Federation and will sustain it financially as well as morally in its unceasing conflict with tyranny and superstition.

E. C. REICHWALD.

TREASURER'S REPORT.

At the time of my last report at our previous Congress there remained a balance in the treasury of $65.67. Since then I hav received by contributions, etc., $891.09, making the total receipts up to date $956.76. Out of this there has been expended as follows:

S. P. Putnam—services and expenses at Washington and Albany and for services for this Congress	$433 75
Franklin Steiner, for services	30 00
John R. Charlesworth, for services	58 13
Stationery	16 40
Printing	50 18
Postage	60 34
Stenographer	8 50
Folding and mailing	4 00
Express charges	2 45
Distribution of pamphlets on church property taxation	129 20

Incidental expenses, such as advertising, hall rent, signs, rubber stamp, etc., $21.30, making a total of expenditures of $814.25, thus leaving a balance in the treasury of $142.51.

Mr. Putnam was then nominated and elected President, Mrs. Freeman secretary, and E. C. Reichwald, treasurer. Vice-presidents are Franklin Steiner and N. F. Griswold. The remainder of the afternoon was utilized for ten minute speeches, and Mr. Barnett, Mrs. Power, D. T. Ames, Mr. Burdick, and Mr. Betz were heard. Mrs. Power's daughter read her grandfather's last poem, and a five-year-old boy sang a song. Mr. Morgan, a Christian with a buzzing wheel in his head, amused the audience with some incoherent remarks. Moses Harman made what he calls one of his "rambling talks," after which Mrs. Freeman read letters from Ernest Mendum and Louis Levine.

THADDEUS B. WAKEMAN, candidate for judge of the court of appeals on the People's party ticket in this state, spoke before the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening upon "Politics." A fair audience heard what he had to say upon that important problem. The present system of parties and manner of nominating people for office was severely condemned. We are suffering to-day, he said, from an oligarchy of demagogy, and he quoted Aristotle's dictum—oligarchy and a demagogy are the two diseases of democracy, and said that in a true democracy the people, not party bosses or machines, do the nominating as well as electing. Mr. Wakeman would remedy the present evil by restoring the town meetings which once characterized New England, and in every election district he would hav halls owned by the city or state where the voters could register and then nominate their candidates on the spot. This could be applied, he said, to assembly, state, Senatorial, and Congressional election districts and the people vote directly for the president and United States Senators. He also said, while he was in favor of the defeat of Tammany Hall in this city, the election of the anti-Tammany ticket would mean that in a few years, instead of the city being robbed by thousands it would be by millions and in a more legal way than the present style of corruption. The remedy would be to abolish the system which makes this disgraceful state of affairs possible, and glancing over the field of politics the People's party alone can accomplish this great reform.

Friendly in Wishes and Works.

BANNACK CITY, MONT., Oct. 14, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav known you for so long in THE TRUTH SEEKER prints that I seem to be familiar with you personally. Our friend Samuel P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" was received last night, and duly appreciated indeed. You hav certainly made a grand effort in getting it up; the engravings are simply beautiful. I hope you will be well paid for your work in the years to come; and the same wish is extended to the author of the book, our "faithful worker." I here inclose you $6.75—$3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $3.75 to pay for books and a trial subscription to a friend named in my letter.

Cotton and Coin.

BLANKET, TEX., Oct. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Credit my account with the amount you will find inclosed. You may count on my writing as long as you hav such able contributors as John Peck and George E. Mcdonald, provided I can raise the honest dollars. I think it is only a question of time when they will become so very honest we cannot get them at all. It takes now twenty-two and a half pounds of dishonest cotton to buy one honest dollar. The plutocratic press and corporation lawyers proclaim on every occasion that the producers and laborers are fools, and not capable of knowing right from wrong; that they hav a corner on the brains and intelligence of this nation, and all we hav to do is to hurrah for the party and tamely submit to be robbed; and the truth is we hav to hang our heads in shame and acknowledge that they are right.

Yours for Freethought and reform,

C. P. WHITEHEAD.

Protestants Would Pay Much the Most.

ROCK ISLAND, ILL., Oct. 14, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1.50 on subscription. There is no law in this state for or against having religious services in the public schools, yet it is and has been customary to read the Bible and hav the children say the Lord's prayer. I hav had some talk with the school directors and superintendent of city schools; the city school superintendent, though a Methodist, says he is not in favor of it, but does not feel like taking any stand against the time-honored custom.

I am making good use of five copies of "Church Property" and find many Protestants saying they are in favor of paying taxes for the laudable purpose of compelling the Catholics to pay on much more than they would. So you see the average Protestant Christian is very patriotic and liberal when he can do his Catholic brother a good turn.

Yours for the success of a purely secular government in the not-distant future,

J. L. BEAN.

A Namesake of Heston's.

DALLAS, TEX., Oct. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months, by or before the expiration of which time I hope to be able to send you another $1 bill. I hav been buying the paper from newsdealers for some years past, but was, for many years, from the first number, a subscriber. I am well pleased with the paper under your very able management. I enjoy Brother George's Observations immensely, also Putnam's letters, Susan Wixon's children's department, the Wettstein brothers and John Peck's letters, and, in fact, all good Materialists' writings suit me O.K.

Myself, wife, and three children are charmed with Heston's comical pictures, so much so that we hav named our youngest boy "Heston."

Our city and business is, and has been, on the decline now for three or four years, getting duller and deader. The boom left us with a lot of property to pay taxes on, and very little income from it. Compared with four years ago it is awful poor times with us here. ALLEN JOHNSON.

Honest Thought Will Do the Work.

BOULDER, COL., Oct. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It givs me great pleasure to be able to send you $21 on account and for subscription. Times are so very hard out here just now on account of Anarchist Cleveland and his gang cutting off the supply of needed money, by their infamous legislation last fall, that it is difficult for most people to get the ordinary absolute necessities of life, let alone buying what many of them would call wicked, blasphemous, Infidel books; and so they go rather slowly this year; but I manage to work off some now and then, and here and now once in a while, sometimes twice in a while, some one gets one eye partly open, and a little light gets into his theologically befuddled brain; and even a little light is a dangerous thing to theological superstition. If one of them gets to thinking for himself he is a gone case, it is only a matter of time; honest thought will surely bring people to right conclusions. I think I am the only one in this county who keeps your books on sale, and so will venture to order a few more to keep up an assortment. Hoping that the time may come even in our day when it will not be considered a disgrace to promulgate unanswerable truth, I am, as ever, respectfully and fraternally yours. L. Z. COMAN.

Threatened with the Boycott.

WATERTOWN, MINN., Oct. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Franklin Steiner delivered three lectures in the City Hall here on Oct. 9th, 10th, and 11th. His subjects were: "The Evidences of Christianity Tested," "The Morality of the Bible," and "Morality Without Christianity," and they were handled in a brilliant and scholarly manner, and his language was such as not to offend the ears of the most fastidious Christians, had they had the courage to attend. But no, they got up services in their churches or had "pound parties" at their parsonages, and the "sky pilots" all forbid their flocks going; but that was not enough, for all sorts of slanderous reports were sent out and also blackmailing threats made. There were several people who would hav been pleased to go and hear, but owing to blackmailing influences had to stay away. But in spite of all we had good audiences, and all those who did attend felt sorry when the last night's lecture was over and they could not hav any more.

This is the first venture of the kind in this place, but I hope it will not be the last, and perhaps by the time that we are able to hav some more lectures, more people will hav courage to come out and enjoy a feast of reason. JOHN P. THORNQUEST.

Earnest Liberals and Exceptional Christians.

SCAPPOOSE, OR., Oct. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from the convention of the Oregon State Secular Union, held in Forest Grove on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of October. It was a perfect success in every way. The musical, literary, and social entertainments were enthusiastically enjoyed by large and appreciativ audiences. The members took much interest in the business sessions, approving the past efforts of the actual laborers in the cause, and voting increased assistance for the future. The election of officers terminated in some re-elections, notably Mr. Jesse, president; Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, secretary; and Miss N. A. Olds, one of the vice-presidents. These laborers deserve much praise for their unremitting devotion to the Liberal movement in the state.

Especial notice should be taken of the Christians of Forest Grove, many assisting in the success of the convention by their presence, and some, astonishing to relate, actually freely entertaining visiting members! Verily the world does move when Methodists will volunteer the hospitality of their homes to Infidels who hav assembled to further the disintegration of Christianity! Moreover the professor of biology in that most orthodox university in Forest Grove invited the convention to visit the new school building now in process of erection, the university library, and museum of anatomy and natural history. Nothing loth, we, the Infidels of Oregon in convention assembled, marched there in a body and were highly and instructivly entertained in that most Christian institution by the courteous professor.

This liberal attention to our organization by these Christians is the result of their enlightenment by one of our most prominent lecturers, Mrs. A. E. Barker, who has labored untiringly during the past year in Forest Grove.

Much encouraged, I am

Respectfully, VIRGIL S. SMITH.

Once Taught in Sunday-School.

AVONDALE, ALA., Oct. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find seventy-five cents to apply on my subscription. I would send more, but times hav been so hard in this vicinity that it is almost impossible to make anything above a living. However, times are improving a little now and I shall soon be in position to renew my subscription. I hav been taking your paper for the past three years and I cannot do without it.

This is one of the suburbs of Birmingham and contains about two thousand inhabitants. We hav five churches within a stone's throw of each other and you may imagin how many "bums" we hav to contend with. I am the only outspoken Infidel in this place, but I frequently meet some Liberal-minded individuals.

I was once a Sunday-school teacher and believed the teachings of the Bible, but after reading "One Hundred and Forty-four Self-Contradictions of the Bible" I concluded at once that if the writings of the Bible had been inspired these contradictions would not hav occurred. I then read Professor Büchner's "Force and Matter" and became convinced that the whole religious theory is a fraud. I used to be foolish enough to get down on my knees and pray, but not having any of my prayers answered, I became disgusted and quit. Neither do I believe that anyone ever had a prayer answered. I would like to hear something more from our friends on Spiritualism. Is it a fraud, or is there such a thing as a spirit? If the dead can be conversed with we must giv up the idea that this life ends all. I can never believe in Spiritualism till I see these things with my own eyes. I would like very much to hav the Editor's opinion on this subject.

Hoping we may all liv to see these mysteries solved, I am,

Yours for Freethought,

W. P. PHILLIPS.

An Open Letter.

MARSH, IDA., Oct. 1, 1894.

REV. MR. PIERCE, Payette, Ida., Sir: Some few weeks since, by accident, I attended your Sunday evening service. You took a beautiful text, which among other things enjoined truth and charity, upon which there might be a good long sermon preached by one whose mind and heart were led in that direction. You started off by saying that the business men of your place wanted something more practical preached and you were sorry as you looked over your audience and saw none present, but remarked that you might get in a "lick" somewhere else if not on them.

You wound up by making the assertion that our prisons were filled by Anarchists and Infidels. When the service was over and your attention was called by me to the statistics of our prisons your reply was that you were as well informed as myself. You certainly ought to be much more so, holding the position you occupy and making such assertions in public. Will you kindly mail me some documents bearing on the subject or inform me where to send for them, in return kindness for the statistics, "Crimes of Preachers," mailed you this date. I cannot help asking you the question, Does it look well for a follower, or a professed one, of Christ coming from the land of fox hunting and bob-tail horses, and of the same blood as those who sent their hired Hessians across the waters to shoot down the grandsires of those who contribute most liberally to build our schoolhouses, keep them stocked with "useful" teachers, and pioneer in the wilderness among savages—yes, sir, does it look well for one in your position to get up in his pulpit and teach women and children (I overheard the remark that there was one man at your former discourse) to ostracize a class of citizens who will not be found below par with preachers when truth's record is forthcoming? I would not cast a stone at any decent preacher of the gospel—for we occasionally hav one in our midst—but they do not teach the uneducated women and children falsehoods to prejudice them against their fellow-citizen.

At your service, sir, in searching for truth, A. G. CHURCH.

Some Calm Reflections.

EUREKA, CAL., Oct. 11, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am home again and hav settled down to business once more, part of which is to scrutinize THE TRUTH SEEKER or anything else that comes along. Lately I read the letter of Mr. C. O. Hays and I hav been sick at the stomach ever since. Now comes Mr. J. K. P. Baker and givs us a recipe for making every person happy. There is a great difference in the two writers. The former is infallible, like the pope of Rome, and knows it all; the latter seeks for light on the subject. Mr. Hays's article contained neither sense nor argument; Mr. Baker's induces reflection.

Mr. Baker starts out with the claim that the cause of distress among the laboring classes is overproduction. Had Mr. Baker examined without bias all the pro's and con's which bear upon that subject he would hav found that there is no foundation for that claim. Overproduction is an impossibility. The production of all things depends upon their demand. When the demand decreases the production decreases likewise, and if the demand stops altogether, the production ceases. That warehouses are full of manufactured articles with no one to buy them argues nothing; it simply shows that the ordinary flow in that line has been interrupted. It often happens that articles are stored because there is no sale for them when thousands of people in the immediate vicinity are suffering because of the want of them.

The same may be said of labor. Labor, generally speaking, was never in excess, but it is often difficult to lead it into the channels where it is wanted. There are many causes that produce stagnation in business. Our protectiv tariff has been one of them and lately the main cause, and people hav been and are still idle on account of it. But this idleness on the part of the working classes does not prove that there is a surplus of labor; it merely shows that impediments hav been thrown in the usual channels of labor, and the impediments must either be removed or labor turned into different channels. Another mistake is that labor-saving machinery turns people out of employment. I was brought up in a manufacturing district and remember well when the power loom first came into use. People claimed that the country was overpopulated already and that the introduction of machinery must inevitably produce starvation. I left that country some forty years ago and last year I went back. I found all hand labor had ceased, the population had increased about one-third, and wages had more than doubled.

The cause of complaint is not that too many people work; it is that we hav too many drones in the hive whom working people hav to support. Mr. Baker's remedy for our social evils is worse than the disease, and he need not reflect much to be convinced that those who can hardly earn money enough to sustain life cannot afford to pension others.

ROBERT GUNTHER.

A Vigorous Protest Against Superstition.

HOUSTON, NEB., Oct. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please tell me through your columns if you hav or ever had in your ranks a Freethinker by the name of Robert Owen, and did he amount to anything? Did he at any time hold a debate with Campbell. the founder of the Campbellite faith? Which beat?

I am told by a Christian neighbor that Owen was beaten badly in the argument, and owned himself beaten. If this is true, he must hav been a poor excuse for an Infidel. The holy and sanctified in these parts hav completely lost their balance, if they ever had any, this summer, over the terrible drouth and loss of crops, attributing it all to the prevailing wickedness of the people, which has brought down the wrath of God upon their heads. The poor fools don't seem to be aware that both saint and sinner hav got it in the neck this year, and in many instances the former worse than the latter. One crack-brained fellow, an editor at that, berates the people soundly, because they are holding irrigation meetings, with a view to prepare themselvs to fight the drouth in a sensible and sure way. He accuses them of flying in the face of the Almighty and upsetting that gentleman's plans, predicts all manner of punishment on them for so doing, and so on. What a feeble, helpless God, whose plans can be upset by the puny arm of man! And what dolts and rebels are we who refuse to sit calmly down and starve and see our children starve, rather than dare to criticise his way of doing business, and take the reins in our own hands. A pretty God he is indeed, but not one-half so pretty as some of his dupes and tools. God might be excused for some of his foolishness, for if all accounts are true he must be in his dotage, and of course somewhat childish; but his army of servants are many of them in the full vigor of manhood and womanhood; hence supposed to exhibit a little sense. Great Scott! before we know it we will not dare to irrigate our own throats on a hot day with a draught of cold water, lest this curious, cranky, old-maidish God should fall into himself, all because we upset some plan of his. Yours for common sense,

L. E. R. LAMBRIGGER.

[Robert Owen was born in Wales in 1771, and became one of the most noted Freethinkers and social reformers of his time. About 1800 he became partner and sole manger of the New Lanark Mills, in Scotland, where he built the first infant schools and improved the dwellings of the workmen. From 1810-15 he published "New Views of Society; or, Essays on the Formation of Character." Having accumulated considerable property, and being patronized by the Duke of Kent, he was enabled to giv his views wide publicity. He created great excitement in 1817 by declaring that all the religions of the world were false, and that man is the creature of circumstances; that is, all effects are the resultants of causes. This statement of fact of course earned him the enmity of the priesthood, for it was a deadly blow aimed at the irrational dogma of the freedom of the will.

In 1824 Mr. Owen came to the United States and bought New Harmony, Ind., of the Rappists, to found a new community, but the experiment was a failure, as were others in the United States and Mexico, and a "labor exchange" in London. In 1828 he held the debate with Alexander Campbell at Cincinnati on the "Evidences of Christianity," which calls out the questions of our correspondent. The debate was published in book form, and if Mr. Lambrigger can find a copy of it he will quickly see who was worsted in the argument. Of course our Christian friends assert that Mr. Campbell came out ahead, but that claim is always made for each participant in a discussion, and in itself counts for nothing. Mr. Owen was an able man, and he had the right side of the question.

Mr. J. M. Wheeler observes that "Owen profoundly influenced the thought of his time in the direction of social amelioration," and Johnson's Cyclopedia says that "in spite of his failures he was universally esteemed for his integrity and benevolence. His later years were spent in efforts to promote a religion of reason and to improve the condition of the working-classes. His followers bore the name of 'Owenites,' and from them sprang the English Chartist movement."—ED. T. S.]

Asks Questions About Spiritualism.

COLUMBUS, O., Oct. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to me regularly and is about the only society I hav. This is probably the most priest-ridden, God-cursed town in the state. The Liberals are largely of the lukewarm, milk-and-water sort and permit the church bigots to lead them about by the noses as tenderly as asses are led to their oats. Over a year ago they closed the Sunday theater and baseball, and the past summer the Sunday park concerts were prohibited. I am informed that some of them here are becoming so pious that they are seriously agitating an ordinance prohibiting the Scioto river from running on Sunday.

Charlesworth was here about two years ago and held a series of meetings, but as soon as he left they were discontinued. It was about that time that I became a full-fledged Freethinker, and I went to the hall the Sunday after he left intending to unite with them, but I found the door locked and no one there to open it. Some three or four ladies were waiting outside. Be it said to their credit, they showed more enthusiasm than the gentlemen; it made me feel ashamed of my own sex and I did not stay long.

Considerable numbers of the Liberally inclined people hav, in the last two years, embraced Spiritualism and Theosophy. Mrs. Annie Besant's lecture here seems to hav proven very fruitful, for they rapidly developed a large and enthusiastic following. They meet regularly and spend much time in speechifying. It is a religion, not a philosophy; but as they are not filled with the spirit of tyranny, and hav no cruel dogmas to enforce, I shall not quarrel with them.

Spiritualism had attracted but little attention here, and was comparativly unknown, until Dr. Bennet, one of the leading divines of the city, preached a series of sermons against it, after which it immediately sprang into popularity, and now they are numbered by the hundreds. It seems that the D.D.'s guns had such a tremendous recoil that he injured his own cause more than he did that of the enemy.

I hav occasionally attended the meetings of the Spiritualists here, and also in Dayton, but their sermons do not seem to differ greatly from the orthodox harangs. All I hav been able to learn about the subject tends to strengthen my doubts in the disembodied spirit theory. The evidence appears to me to point toward the phenomena of this life rather than some other, but it is astonishing what slush some of them do swallow down after being converted.

If a man sees snakes where we are positivly certain there are none, we know at once that he is either crazy or drunk; if he sees human beings where we are equally certain that none exist, we immediately diagnose the case as Spiritualism. The prognosis of the disease is uncertain, but it is frequently incurable.

A prominent Spiritualist of this city was out driving one day, and his horse kicked up several times, and later, the same day, one of his medium friends, who was not present at the kicking, informed him of it, and told him that Big Buffalo, the spirit of a departed Indian, had caused the kicking by pinching the horse. The gentleman related the circumstance to me without the least indication of incredulity. I think he autually believed it. Now if the Indian could pinch that old black horse, why did he not pinch the driver? Why does he not pinch me?

Spiritualists show you their spook pictures as a sort of clincher; they seem to offer them as a kind of knockdown argument; but I hav a suspicion that many of the Spiritualists hav such vivid imaginations that they can often be led to believe that the spook represents some one whom they formerly knew, whether it does represent that person or not. One of them shows me a picture which purports to be that of his daughter, who died, a child, some fifteen years ago; but the picture represents a woman probably twenty years old. He also says this same woman has appeared before him, materialized, at seances, and has talked with him and shaken hands with him. How does this child's spirit know what she would look like had she lived fifteen years longer? How does he know? And yet he has not the slightest doubt about the genuinness of the phenomenon.

I hav been shown the picture of an Egyptian princess (?) who died thousands of years ago. She also frequently appears at seance, and talks with people, and is responsible for the statement that she is an Egyptian princess. The face represents a woman probably less than thirty years of age, with handsome and somewhat classic features, but not very strongly suggestiv of the Egyptian physiognomy. Now if the child who died only a few years ago has grown so much, why has not this princess grown older? One would naturally infer that she would now be wrinkled with age or dried up to a mummy. If people of mature minds, educated people, professional men, believe such things as these, what will they not believe? Where will this credulity end?

One explanation of the spook pictures is that the spirits hav to recollect what they looked like in the flesh, and then make up for the picture; but how can the infant who died at a few months of age recollect what it looked like? It also seems to me that a little child who dies at five or six would experience considerable difficulty in recollecting what she would look like had she lived twelve or fifteen years longer; and it is barely possible that the Egyptian princess would hav her memory subjected to a very severe strain.

I, too, hav been hit in the eye quite as hard as Mr. Swan. I am certain that no one knew the circumstances, except myself, that were related to me by the medium; but I knew them, they were in my mind; and in Mr. Swan's case, it seems to me that the shoe affair was in his mind, and the medium got it there. If the spirits were acquainted with the circumstance independently of his mind, why did they not tell me where the shoe was?

Before this subject can be of much practical use, it will hav to be put on a scientific basis, and the Spiritualist mind does not, as a general rule, seem to be built for scientific thinking; it is organized for wondering, believing, and dreaming, rather than for reasoning, doubting, and investigating. It is more anxious to prove that something is true than it is to prove that it is false.

The only proper way to hunt for the truth is to start in without caring where we are going to land, precisely as we do in solving a problem in mathematics; and we must also try just as hard to prove that a proposition, or result, is not true as we do to demonstrate that it is true.

If there be a spirit, what is a spirit? If there be spirits, what is gained by communicating with them? Can we benefit the dead? Can they assist us? Perhaps, if we knew more of the subject, we might be better able to answer these questions satisfactorily; but are there not thousands of questions pressing upon us for solution that giv promis of better returns? Is it not possible to become so absorbed in getting communications from the dead as to totally forget our duties to the living? One life at a time, is not a bad motto.

My letter is growing entirely too long. Let me say in conclusion, do not dispense with the "Observations." They are one of the most interesting features of the paper. George is all right on the silver and tariff questions. Three cheers for John Peck.

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.	$1.00
Fifty copies.	4.50
One hundred copies	8.00

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Golden Rod.

Along the Highland road I went,
And crossed the pastures fair;
And everywhere I caught the scent
Of perfume in the air.

The autumn fruitage censers swung
From every dappled bough and vine;
And jewels bright from nature's shrine,
On every side were gaily strung.

Ten thousand plumes of yellow gold
Were waving in the breeze;
And symphonies were sung and told
By lowly bush and trees.

I plucked the feathery golden rod,
And every tinted, sunlit spray
Made seas of royal splendor play
Upon the path my feet had trod.

Its serried ranks were full and free,
They glowed like burning fire;
A starry host they seemed to be,
In holiday attire.

The sunlight of those stately flowers,
Still glowing, on my pathway shines;
In many curved and graceful lines,
With gold they gild the passing hours.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

My Neighbor's Boy.

He seems to be several boys in one,
So much is he constantly everywhere!
And the mischievous things that boy has done
No mind can remember nor mouth declare.
He fills the whole of his share of space
With his strong, straight form and his merry face.

He is very cowardly, very brave;
He is kind and cruel, good and bad;
A brute and a hero! Who will save
The best from the worst of my neighbor's lad.
The mean and the noble strive to-day.
Which of the powers will hav its way?

The world is needing his strength and skill.
He will make hearts happy or make them ache,
What power is in him for good or ill?
Which of life's paths will his swift feet take?
Will he rise and draw others up to him,
Or the light that is in him burn low and dim?

But what is my neighbor's boy to me
More than a nuisance? My neighbor's boy.
Though I hav some fears of what he may be
Is a source of solicitude, hope and joy
And a constant pleasure, because I pray
That the best that is in him may rule some day.

An Indian "Genesis."

[Following is a legend showing how the earth and man were made, and why the implements for lighting fire came to be created, as related by Yavarino, a California Indian, aged 107 years.]

Before the earth was made there was nothing but water excepting Mount Tamalpais, a large rock on which lived Hulie, the great Chief of the Coyotes.

One day the Chief of the Coyotes, while wandering along near the water's edge, met Kucksin, the great Chief of the Grecco, and the two held a council and decided to make the earth.

The great Coyote ordered the Chief of Grecco to make a cora to bring down the earth and rocks from the sky, while he gathered reeds and rushes and tied them together, and spread them on the water to receive the earth and rocks. When the earth was finished they made the trees and plants. Then they held another council and decided to make people to occupy the land. The great Coyote proceeded to make them in tribes, and when he had enough for a tribe he threw them to the place where they were to liv. Thus the Napas fell in Napa valley, the Ochelamnes on the lower Sacramento, and the Locohomenes back of Mount St. Helena, etc. The trees and plants bore fish, venison, and all kinds of eatables ready cooked, so the people had only to pick when hungry. By and by the people became very lazy, and the great Coyote was displeased and said they were no better than rocks and stones; so he caused the trees to bear nuts and acorns, and the bushes to bear berries instead of cooked fish and meat. The people then had to hunt and fish for a living. The raw fish and meat did not suit their taste, and they appeale l to the great Coyote to giv them fire to cook with. The great Coyote then called the humming bird, as it was a swift flyer, to go up to the sky and search for fire. After being absent for a time, the bird came back and reported that it could find no fire. He sent it again and told it to go higher. It remained absent for a long time, and when it came down it came so swiftly that its body sunk into the ground, leaving only its feet above the surface. The Coyote pulled it out and asked if it had found fire. It replied, "No." He then ordered it to go North, where the ducks went to rear their young. The humming-bird then went North until it came to a hut built of flags and rushes, where a duck was rearing her young, and seeing a fire within, it watched its opportunity and seized a brand. While swiftly returning sparks flew in every direction, the large sparks fell upon maple trees, while the smaller ones dropped on other kinds of trees. Then the great Coyote ordered them to take maple wood and make their implements to light their fires. The people obeyed and never after lacked the means to light their fires.

A Boy's Composition on Bones.

Bones are the framework of the boys. If I had no bones in me, I should not hav so much motion, and grandmother would be glad, but I like to hav motion. Bones giv me motion because they are something hard for motion to cling to. If I had no bones, my brains, lungs, heart, and large blood vessels would be lying around in me and might get hurted, but now the bones get hurted, but not much, unless it is a bard hit. If my bones were burned, I should be brittle, because it would take the animal out of me. If I were soaked in acid, I should be limber. Teacher showed us a bone that had been soaked. I could bend it easily. I would rather be soaked than burned. Some of my bones don't grow close to my body, snug, like the branches of a tree, and I am glad they don't, for if they did I could not play leap frog and other nice games I know. The reason why they don't grow close to my body is because they hav joints.

Joints are good things to hav in bones. There are two kinds. The ball and socket, like my shoulder, is best. Teacher showed it to me, only it was the thigh bone of an ox. One end was round, smooth, and whitish. That is the ball end. The other end was hollowed in deep. That is the socket, and it oils itself. It is the only machine that oils itself. Another joint is the hinge joint, like my elbow. It swings back and forth and oils itself. It never creaks like the schoolroom door. There is another joint that don't seem like a joint. That is in the skull. It don't hav no motion. All my bones put together in their right places makes a skeleton. Cripples and deformed people don't hav no skeletons. Some animals hav their skeleton on their outside. I'm glad I ain't them animals, for my skeleton, like it is on the chart, would not look well on my outside.—Hospital Gazette.

What The Little Folks Are Saying.

Here is a story of a schoolmaster who promised a crown to any boy who should propound a riddle that he could not answer.

One and another tried, and at last a boy asked, "Why am I like the Prince of Wales?"

The master puzzled his wits in vain, and finally was compelled to admit that he did not know.

"Why," said the boy, "it's because I am waiting for the crown."—Tit-Bits.

AN EXTENSIV AUDITORIUM.

"Can you tell me," said an itinerant preacher to a Texas cowboy, "how far it is to the church where Brother Stone is carrying on a protracted siege against the stronghold of Satan?"

"Well, sir," said the cowboy, "you're in the church now, but it's nigh onto four miles to the pulpit."

"I do not understand you," continued the minister.

"Waal, it's this way: Preacher Stone's pulpit is a dry goods box under a live oak tree."—Texas Siftings.

WHY A BOY OBEYS.

"It isn't 'cause, perhaps, he'll get a whipping, mamma," explained a six-year-old, "that makes a boy do things you tell him; it's 'cause he's 'termined in his mind."

Which delicious bit of child wisdom is referred to parents as a valuable hint. Teach the boy or girl the obedience which comes of "'termining in his mind," and the battle is over.—New York Times.

EQUAL TO THE OCCASION.

BOB: "What did the lecturer say when you threw the cabbages at him?"

DICK: "Oh, he said he had hoped the audience would be pleased, but he really hadn't expected they would entirely lose their heads."—Courier Journal.

Correspondence.

DELLA, MD., Oct. 8, 1894.

DEAR FRIENDS: Herewith I send my contribution to the Children's Corner, an original composition to the tune of "Sweet By-and-By:"

There's no land that is fairer than this,
As by knowledge and reason we know,
And no father has promised us bliss
But the share that we get here below.
CHORUS.—In this good present life,
By all fears of the future unvexed,
In this good present life
We shall take not a thought of the next.

For the "father" must wish everyone
To prepare him a dwelling-place here,
And to make it his kingdom of love
To improve with each vanishing year.

On self-effort we therefore depend
To secure all the pleasures we seek,
For in this is the means to the end
And the bountiful joys we bespeak.

The reward of a life nobly spent
Every promis of future excels;
It repays us with rest and content
And the bounty of nature it tells.

Respectfully submitted by a friend of truth. Yours sincerely.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. JOHN E. REMSBURG'S WORKS.

Abraham Lincoln: Was He A Christian?

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

False Claims. Revised and Enlarged

As a Missionary Document it is unexcelled. Among the subjects considered by Mr. Remsburg are: The Church and Morality; Criminal Statistics, showing the creeds of the prisoners in the penitentiaries; the Church and Civilization; the Church and Science; the Church and Learning; the Church and Liberty; the Church and the Antislavery Reform; the Woman's Rights Movement; the Temperance Reform; the Church and the Republic. Price, 10 cents singly; 75 cents per dozen.

Price, single copies, 25 cents; 6 copies, $1. Special discount on larger quantities.

Sabbath-Breaking. This is the best and most thorough work ever written on the Sabbath from a rational point of view. Large and handsome print. The question is discussed under the following heads: Origin of the Sabbatic Idea; the Jewish Sabbath; the Christian Scriptures and the Sabbath; Examination of Sunday Arguments; Origin of the Christian Sabbath; Testimony of the Christian Fathers; the Sabbath during the Middle Ages; the Puritan Sabbath; Testimony of Christian Reformers, Scholars, and Divines; Abrogation of Sunday Laws. Price, 25 cents; 6 copies $1.

Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason," are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Gems of Thought.

THE character of the environment co-operate with the characters of human beings in determining social phenomena. —Herbert Spencer.

ONE cannot without a keen pang of shame and rage think of what we are when one remembers what we were; when one recalls our old and glorious literature, in the wide world unsurpassed; our literature noble and renowned, ever most glorious when most manly and daring.—James Thomson (B. V.)

NEVER a heart should be broken on earth,
If I were God;
Never a misery follow our mirth,
If I were God;
Never should longings be vile or vain,
Never be pestilence, famin, or chain,
Never be poverty, farewells, or pain,
If I were God. —Kenneth Lamar.

THE message is freedom. Freedom is not the end—it is the open way to many beginnings, many ends. It is the servant of equity. It is the key to moral self-hood. It is wing when we would soar and foot when we would walk. It offers us experiences which we must use. To its infinit vision the divine circle is revealed.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE new hatched radical leaves his cocoon of ancient theory behind him and for awhile he rejoices that he is free. But liberty soon tires the unused wings—the sweep of the unfenced universe givs a sense of terrifying vastness. The thin ether is insecure. He spins a new cocoon out of his new theories, and once more he sleeps. But to a true worshiper of the goddess, every day truth is new-born; every day, to the fearless explorer, a new landscape opens, a new outpost is gained in truth's limitless dominions.—Wayland H. Smith, in Conservator.

THE reveries of the true and simple are prophetic. What the tender poetic youth dreams, and prays, and paints to-day, but shuns the ridicule of saying aloud, shall presently be the resolutions of public bodies, then shall be carried as grievance and bill of rights through conflict and war, and then shall be triumphant law and establishment for a hundred years, until it givs place, in turn, to new prayers and pictures. The history of the state sketches in coarse outline the progress of thought, and follows at a distance the delicacy of culture and of aspiration.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

ALL the wisdom that lengthens and ennobles life—all that avoids or cures disease, or conquers pain—all just and perfect laws and rules that guide and shape our lives, all thoughts that feed the flames of love, the music that transfigures, enraptures, and enthralls, the victories of heart and brain, the miracles that hands hav wrought, the deft and cunning hands of those who worked for wife and child, the histories of noble deeds, of brave and useful men, of faithful loving wives, of quenchless mother-love, of conflicts for the right, of sufferings for the truth, of all the best that all the men and women of the world hav said, and thought, and done through all the years. These treasures of the heart and brain—these are the scriptures of the human race.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

WE should each of us arrive at a consistent theory of the universe for ourselvs, and of our own place in it. By so doing, not only shall we develop our own intellectual selvs, but we shall be better, wiser, and more useful citizens. We shall know man's life and the state we liv in; we shall know the general trend of human evolution, and whither our own community and all others are tending. We shall be able more surely to forecast the future; more wisely to help on the good that comes, to refrain from propping up the evil that is, or from obstructing and retarding the better things that are to be. Our self-development will be ten thousand times more useful to the world at large than any amount of self-sacrifice to a single individual.—Grant Allen.

ITS aims [science's] are distinctly beneficent. Its spirit is that of charity and human kindness. From its peaceful victories it returns laden with richer spoils than ever did warrior of old. Through its discoveries the hungry are fed and the naked are clothed by an improved agriculture and an increased food supply; the dark hours are deprived of their gloom through methods of ampler illumination; man is brought into friendly contact with man through means of rapid transportation; sickness is dimished and pain relieved by the conquests of chemistry and biology; the winter wind is shorn of its sharpness by the geologist's discovery of a mineral fuel; and so on, in a thousand ways, the comfort of our daily lives and the pleasurable employment of our faculties are increased by the administrations of science. —Daniel G. Brinton.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

"Crimes of Preachers"

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liber to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

The Truth Seeker,
28 LAFAYETTE PLACE, New York.

Not for Parsons.

HEARING it said that a Capuchin monk had been devoured by wolves—"Poor brutes!" exclaimed Sophie Arnould, "hunger must indeed be a terrible thing!"

ONE of our city preachers brought across the Atlantic the same sly sarcasm upon church disagreements from a different point of view. "A man whose evidences had never been satisfactory to the elders of a Scottish congregation, one day walking by the church with downcast countenance, was asked: "What is the matter?" "I hav been trying fourteen years to get in here, and I hav not succeeded yet." "Oh!" said the Lord (for it was he), "I've been trying twice as long and cannot get in either."

WE must remember that God did not act in those days as he acts now—he did not remain in the dim back ground leaving his poor children to grope for him in the dark. On the contrary, he was always turning up somewhere. He used to hav long chats with Moses on a hill-side. He paid a visit to Abraham's back kitchen, and carried on an animated discussion with Sarah. In Adam's time he took a constitutional in the garden of Eden in the cool of the day. In fact, two or three thousand years ago a man would be no more surprised at meeting God than at meeting his mother. When Abraham heard some one talking in the next room he would ask who was there, and Sarah would quietly reply: "Nobody in particular—only God."—Wallace Nelson.

"ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN."

One God there is from old Judee,
One God alone, not one in three.
Who was, and is, and aye shall be—
The Bible says so.

Three God's there are from old Judee,
Not one alone, but one in three,
Who were, and are, and aye shall be—
The Bible says so.

No man can ever liv and see
This awful God from old Judee;
The sight the mortal's death would be—
The Bible says so.

In perfect safety men did see
This awful God from old Judee,
And spoke with him, as you with me—
The Bible says so.

Affirm, deny, that A is C,
That black is white, that one is three;
You must be right, whate'er it be—
The Bible says so.

GULLAVESQUE THEOLOGY.

Rev. Miss Flora Brown preached last night in the gospel tent in King street just above Shepard. The scene on entering was weird in the extreme. Two blazing torches shed a dusky light over the dusky audience, who were seated, half squatting, on pieces of plank on the ground. The Rev. Flora mounted a small stand, on which was a table, on which in turn stood a lamp.

The evangelist, who is rather a short, rather dark negress, had at her command an extensiv budget of Biblical quotations, which she introduced at every turn into her discourse, pronouncing them with a most markedly Northern, not to say Bostonese, accent of a most superlativly cultivated kind and in a strident, highly pitched voice that was never procured by the owner south of Mason and Dixon's line, which contrasted queerly with the soft, low, "gullavesque" patois into which she relapsed when not quoting the inspired words.

The preacher did not state definitly that she had just had a conversation with Jesus, but implied it strongly. He had told her, she said, to preach to the people—the wicked people who were riding about on "wild, sinful horses in a mad career," and thereupon she started upon a highly emphasized discourse, the text being: "Paul and Silas prayed in the night and sang praises to God." Paul had gone round on a wild, sinful horse, she said, till the Lord had smitten him, persecuting the church, but when Gawd smite 'um he call pon de Lawd same like you call on 'um when de cyclone blow de water all roun' you foot in de cyclone.

"Da's so—da's de trute. Yes, Lord! O Savior! Sabe me! Sabe me! Amen. I'se gwine to glory! Amen. Chise is come. Born—h—women—m! Chise is come!" came from the crowd.

Den you prayed to de Lawd to take way de water from roun' you foot, and you pray and you pray, and you say [and here came in the Bostonese], "Spare me a little while that I may gather a little strength before I go forth to be forever lost, and Gawd I'll serve you all my life."

"Yes." "Amen." "Ebrybody dome um!" "O Gawd!" ejaculated the old maumas in front of the speaker.

But when Gawd done hear the prayer of some of de ole patriarch en done tek pity pon de people and tek way de water from roun' you foot, you gone and ketch de wile, sinful horses 'gen and git up pon top uv dem and gone tu caperin' roun' [Voice in crowd: "Yes, been do dat."] stead uv saying to de evil spirit in you, sister: "Come outer dere, I command you in de name of God." You got to command these devilish things to come out you, sister, and your brother, else dey'll stay in 'um and chain 'um down, and you too.

"Unless you seek Jesus, whose going to elevate from the bed of sickness?

"Nobody—y' ain' no man kin do 'um—no physic ain' goin' do 'um—ain' no root kin ellerwate you!" mingled with low groans, came from the crowd.

But Jesus kin—he'll giv you peace, he'll ellerwate you by peace.

"Yes, Gawd, by peace! O Christ! piece by piece! Yes, Gawd—tek me any way, Gawd!" cried the audience.

At this point of the eloquent Rev. Flora's discourse the writer was unfortunately obliged to leave—and is tormented by the thoughts of the gems he must hav missed by having to do so.—Charleston News and Courier.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificen work ever issued by the FreethoughtPress.

Progress of the Theocratic Movement.

There can be no reasonable doubt that among the really orthodox Christian people of this country the proposed Christian amendment to the national Constitution is receiving more and more favorable consideration and that the number of its outspoken advocates is growing larger year by year. Eventually all Christians must choose between the complete Christianization of our constitutions and statutes and the equally complete secularization of the same. Which position many of them will take will depend on how earnestly and wisely the Freethinkers of the United States champion their own cause. We must work as never before and we must let it be seen distinctly that in demanding the separation of church and state we mean just what we say and hav not the slightest intention of oppressing any class or church when our ideas become ascendant. In its issue of October 20th, the Christian Reformer givs two instances of the growth of theocratic sentiment. James Black reports that for three years he has presented in the state conventions of the Pennsylvania Prohibitionists a resolution recognizing the "Lord Jesus Christ as supreme ruler." This resolution has been defeated in committee year by year, but by decreasing majorities. This year it was defeated in committee by a vote of eight to seven, and then it was introduced on the floor of the convention itself, and there it was defeated by only a small majority. The Christian Reformer remarks that it seems strange "that friends of prohibition could find any argument against the recognition of Jesus Christ as the supreme ruler." However strange the finding of such arguments may be so far as Prohibitionists are concerned, if Dr. McAllister will send us ten cents we will mail to him E. C. Walker's "Bible Temperance," and in that he will find hundreds of Bible arguments against accepting that book as an authority in temperance, or Jesus as the ruler over temperance people. Now to the other illustration of the growth of theocratic sentiment: The Central Ohio Conference of the United Brethren has just adopted this resolution:

"We believe that our Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler of nations and that his will as revealed in the Bible is the standard by which all moral issues in national life should be decided, and that his authority and his law should be given national recognition in the supreme law, the Constitution of the United States."

Think of binding a free and enlightened people down to the moral code of the ancient Jews!

The Essential Immorality of Supernaturalism.

The Agnostic Annual for 1895 has a very interesting symposium on "Why Liv a Moral Life?" Among the contributors thereto is the Rev. Alfred Momerie, who has achieved considerable notoriety and some fame in the last few years as the author of "Lux Mundi" and other "advanced" Christian literature. We are surprised at the intellectual weakness of the man, as it is exhibited in the article under review. It is difficult to understand how he ever came to be known as a thinker, much less as a reformer. He appears to be enlisted in a crusade against facts, and to be without hope for truth, justice, mercy, peace, honor, and love if it can be demonstrated that the evolutionary hypothesis is correct.

In answer to the question which is the text of the symposium, Mr. Momerie says: "Faith—faith in God and immortality—seems to me the only rational basis for morality." Then he immediately makes this admission:

"I am bound to admit that there hav been men 'to whom the dignity of manhood and the fellowship of this life, undazzled by the magic of any revelation, unholpen by promises of anything higher or more enduring than the fruition of human love and the fulfilment of human duties, are sufficient to bear the weight of life and death.' I am bound to admit that there are men here and there who, with no conscious faith in God, are yet living noble, useful, self-denying lives, spending and being spent for others, taking the most enthusiastic interest in all that concerns the well-being of their fellow-men, content to work for blessings to be enjoyed by posterity, when they themselvs shall hav passed into non-existence. I marvel at the goodness of these men, but I could never hope to imitate it. Their universe is fundamentally irrational and immoral."

What right, in logic, has Professor Momerie to say that the universe of such men is fundamentally irrational and immoral? He admits that they lead lives that he could never hope to imitate if he believed as they do; has it never occurred to him that the fault would be in his mental and moral make-up rather than in the "logic of life" which to them is all-sufficient, as he confesses? But how does he know that he could not liv a good life if he accepted the evolutionary theory of the cosmos? Can he not conceive it as probable that the facts of existence and the incentivs to a decent life might appear to him in a new light under those circumstances? It cannot be supposed that he is willing to say that he is by nature so much more depraved than the Atheists he has in mind that he could not possibly keep his hands from crime were it not for belief in the white-hot furnaces of hell. Yet this is what he seems to say in every paragraph of his article. Following the last sentence quoted above he draws a picture of the universe as the scientist conceives it: In the beginning the atoms, which he speaks of as "dead, inanimate;" they fall through space and come in contact; heat is evolved, worlds condense, "animals, men, instinct, reason, memory, imagination, will, thought, worship, love" come into existence. "If this were all, we could rest content; progressiv evolution must be the work of God." But the "Atheistic philosophers" sketch the future of evolution also; all the mental and moral attributes developed are to "pass away and be no more;" the stars and planets will cool down, their heat will be radiated into space, and they will become frozen blocks. "The curtain of history is to fall on a lump of ice!" The prophecies of science may be verified, in part, or wholly, but we are living in the world at the present time and hence this prospect has for us only or chiefly the interest of an abstract truth, and yet Professor Momerie is led by the contemplation of it to say:

"If then the universe be so fundamentally irrational and so diabolically tantalizing, why should I trouble myself about character? If in so ridiculous and contemptible a world there be one thing more stupid than another, would it not be the attempt to act as rational and moral beings? Would not a belief in the reality of right and wrong be the maddest of all delusions? What does it matter, what can it matter, how I act, if my life be but a momentary and accidental gleam of consciousness in the passage of the atoms from the fiery cloud to the frozen block? Surely there can be no right and wrong for a being who has been made, and who will be unmade, at the caprice of dead, unthinking atoms. For myself at any rate, I can say that if I believed in a godless, soulless universe, I should be stricken with the paralysis of despair."

What wonder that the history of the Christian ages is written in characters of fire and blood! When we realize that the Christian world has believed that the only reason why men should respect the rights of their fellows was that they might get into heaven and escape hell, and that, no matter what monsters of cruelty they were, "Jesus paid it all," and all they had to do was to repent and his blood would "wash all their guilty stains away," can we marvel that the church has made the horrible record that she would fain erase? Professor Momerie has unthinkingly indicted Christian Theism at the bar of common sense and human justice.

He has shown us just what we may expect if the church should succeed in her struggle to regain political supremacy in the world. He has revealed the essential immorality of the gospel of Christian salvation. He has made it possible for the most dull-minded to see that "Christian morality" is based on the fear of the hangman's noose and that we shall never hav a rational system of ethics, accepted and lived by the masses of the people, until we hav laid Christian Theism away in the crypts of the dead superstitions.

What could be more foolish than the utterances we hav quoted from this clerical moralist? Does the acceptance of the scientific theory of the gradual development of the cosmos, of sentient beings, of the various attributes which man manifests, and of the probable extinction of planetary activities, alter one single fact of human relations and the relation of man to the other forces of nature? Does the acceptance of this theory dispose of the facts that fire tortures, that water smothers, that carbonic acid gas poisons, that savage beasts tear and devour, that murder kills, that theft despoils, that cruelty destroys peace and causes suffering, that love thrills, that the scent of flowers is pleasing, that the odors of decay are nauseating, that slavery degrades, and that liberty elevates and educates? Is sympathy less desirable, is order no longer good, has food lost its flavor and does starvation bring joy to its victim? Even if there be no future existence for that hand with which Professor Momerie penned these despairing words will he deliberately put it in the fire and let it slowly melt into ashes? Granting that the babe which plays on his knee has no prospect of singing with a ransomed few in the courts of God, will he hate and abuse the little one, and all because of his doubts about the future life in which he has been taught to believe? When did the florist cease to plant roses and lilies because the fragrant and beautiful blooms are not everlasting? Because houses decay are they not desirable as shelters and homes? Because we may not liv in the future in some other world do we think it wise to neglect sanitary precautions and get in the way of cyclones and rattlesnakes and railway trains?

Has it not entered the mind of Mr. Momerie that the very fact of the brevity of life might induce a reasonable man to make the best possible use of the few short years that are his? Experience has amply demonstrated that the happiness of others directly and indirectly contributes to our happiness; if one citizen is insecure in the possession of property, liberty, and life, that insecurity inevitably weakens the safeguards of all other citizens.

It might be well for Professor Momerie to tell us why we should be more moral if we believed in God and immortality than if we rejected those two concepts or were in doubt concerning them. He has made no attempt to do so, having contented himself with bare assertions that there is nothing but stupidity in any endeavor to liv moral and rational lives if the universal laws of growth and decay are not suspended in man's favor. But do not the very words used imply that it is well to "trouble about character"? What incentiv can there be to lead an *ir*rational life? Is not the fact that a life is irrational a sufficient condemnation of it? Why should a young man deliberately do that which he admits is not in any way reasonable? But there is more here than has yet been seen by the minister. If the universe is so bad that there is no inducement to be moral if the earth is some day to become a "frozen block," what sort of a god is it who made the world? If he made a world so very imperfect and immoral that it will take an eternity of happiness in some other sphere to justify his previous colonizing of the human family in this, what warrant hav we for suppposing that the commands that are attributed to him are in any way ethical, and why should we assume that he will do better by us in "heaven" than he has done on earth? If the vice, crime, and agony that he has made inseparable from our existence in this world were not and are not incompatible with his infinit goodness, purity, and justice, what evidence hav we that vice, crime, and agony will not be inseparable from our existence in the "world to come"? And if a future life of happiness is the necessary complement of the life which we lead in this world, what is to be done for the other forms of sentient existence which we so glibly call the "lower animals"? They hav suffered and do suffer terribly, and need as much as does man another life in which to receive compensation for the miseries of this.

The conception of the universe as created by an infinitly powerful and wise god carries with it the implication that he premeditated the vice, crime, and agony that hav cursed all forms of life through all the ages. What consolation or hope is there in this for the man who wishes to lead a moral life? On the other hand, the conception of the universe as the resultant, in its particular manifestations, of its own inherent, non-moral energies does not fill the mind with despair, for it is seen that with individual consciousness has come an ethical desire and some measure of ethical accomplishment, thus giving room for hope that as man grows wiser he will grow better, that is, he will more and more clearly perceive that his personal well-being is one with the well being of his fellows, and that the influences that reduce the sum total of cruelty in the world are conserving influences, as they must be, for self-preservation is the "first law" of all forms of life.

At Last They Notice the Charge.

It will be remembered that we hav often charged that the attempt to introduce Christian ideas into the laws has been productiv of corruption. In the nature of things it could not be otherwise. In an age like this, when science, historical discoveries, and critical examination are discrediting and disproving the old theological notions, it must be taken for granted that a large proportion of the educated and acute men who aspire to hold public positions hav lost faith, to a greater or less extent, in the various dogmas of the Christian churches. It could not be expected that these men would vote for the Christianizing of our constitutions and laws unless they were influenced thereto in some potent way. That way was found when Christians decided to vote for no office seeker who would not do as they wished him to in this matter. They told Congressmen, when the resolution for closing the World's Fair on Sunday was pending, that those who did not support that resolution would hear in a very unpleasant way from their constituents on the next election day, and to make this threat sufficiently appalling they flaunted before the Congressmen's eyes what were claimed to be the petitions of not less than twenty-five million citizens in favor of that resolution. It had the desired effect and Congress hastened to do the bidding of the church and enacted a law in the interest of the clergy.

The fraudulent nature of those petitions has been shown scores of times, in Freethought, in secular, and even in religious papers, but heretofore it has been impossible to get the theocratic journals to consider the allegations which reflected so seriously upon the honor of the Sabbatarian leaders. They hav persisted in boasting of the twenty-five to forty millions of citizens who were said to hav indorsed those petitions for Sunday closing, but they paid no attention to the well-sustained charge of fraud. At last, however, they hav ventured to notice the matter. For some months the Christian Reformer has quoted at length from THE TRUTH SEEKER and lately has attempted to meet the issues presented by this journal, in particular our often reiterated affirmation that the effort to unite church and state still more closely has tended to the demoralization of politicians. It now accuses us of obscuring the issue, saying that while we asserted that law makers "hav been bullied into voting for all sorts of unconstitutional laws, and hav made all kinds of promises under duress of threats of defeats in future elections if they did not giv their public indorsement to the demands of the theocrats," we had exclusiv reference to Sabbath legislation. This is a mistake; we did not hav exclusiv reference to Sabbath legislation; the theocrats hav induced the lawmakers to vote for and in some instances to enact other unconstitutional statutes, but we confined our exposure to the chicanery connected with the World's Fair business, partly because the subject was one which had attracted the attention of the whole country, and partly because there was grave reason to suppose that more of the legislators who voted for Sunday closing were unduly influenced by the threats of the theocrats than were so influenced in the case of some of the other unconstitutional enactments. We propose to hav the Sabbatarians stick to this question, now that they hav at this late day recognized the fact that there is a question of the genuinness of the petitions for Sunday closing. Now we will see what the Christian Reformer has to say in the premises:

"Reduced to its lowest terms the charge of THE TRUTH SEEKER is that certain legislators hav been persuaded by Christians to vote for Sabbath laws. It claims, however, that there was exaggeration as to the number of people who wanted the World's Fair closed on Sabbath, that in some states more people were claimed on this side of the question than these states contained, and that this astonishing result was reached by taking the vote both in churches, in Christian Endeavor societies, and in other Christian associations, so that many people would thereby be counted twice. On this point we hav three things to say. 1. We are not sure that the charge is true. 2. If it is true, those who gathered the petitions and figured up the results made a mistake. If they did the thing charged intentionally, we denounce it as a stupendous fraud. Our cause needs no such methods. 3. We do not believe that any man or number of men deliberately planned any such fraud. If the number of Christians in any state who opposed the opening of the Fair on Sabbath was overestimated, it was done by mistake, and not of set purpose. And if it was done purposely, neither Christianity nor the church is responsible for it, but only the few individuals who did it."

Not only is it charged that many people were "counted twice," but it is charged that they were counted three, or four, or more times. The Presbyterian minister, Rev. Mr. Cross, testified before the Congressional committee that names were counted "three, four, or five times," as he knew. The editor of the Christian Reformer had this statement before him at the time he wrote, for it was in the very editorial of ours that he was criticising. Why did he ignore it? His evasiv remarks will not dispose of the issue raised by Mr. Cross and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"Not sure that the charge is true"! "If it is true . . . it was a mistake"! Even "if it was done purposely, neither Christianity nor the church is responsible for it, but only the few individuals who did it"! All this is ridiculous. These charges hav been public property ever since the claim was made that twenty-five millions of people had indorsed the Sunday-closing petitions. The claim was false on its face, and every minister, paper, and church that has countenanced the claim is responsible. It was only a few months since that the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, North, solemnly declared that "a large majority of our American people" had "expressed" their "convictions" in favor of the closing of the Fair on Sunday, and there has appeared time and again in the Christian Reformer, the Christian Statesman, and other theocratic and Sabbatarian journals, the uncontradicted assertion that from twenty-five to forty millions of our people had so expressed themselvs. The theocrats knew that the claim had been disputed, knew that it had been shown that it could not be true, knew that they had been challenged repeatedly to make good the claim and clear themselvs from the imputation of trickery and deception. It is preposterous to say at this time that those who gathered the petitions and figured up the results are responsible for the fraud, "if" there is any fraud. Of course there is fraud, and those upon whom rests the heaviest responsibility therefor are the men and women who hav assisted in giving circulation and credence to the monstrous story since the heat of the conflict has cooled. There was no possibility that the claim could be true. Suppose that we take the smallest number of alleged petitioners, twenty-five millions:

At the time of the World's Fair we had a population of sixty-five millions or less. Call it sixty-five millions. The census of 1890 givs the United States families to the number 12,690,152, but we will let it go at an even thirteen millions at the time the Fair was held. The average number of persons to the family is within a small fraction of five. This would giv, in round numbers, twenty-six millions of men and women who might hav signed petitions. From the sixty-five millions are to be deducted the aliens who could not legally petition and the Indians not voters. Of the more than seven and one-half millions of colored people how many signed the petitions, and of the other millions of Germans and other foreign born citizens, how many could the Sabbatarians fairly count on their side? Then there were the Unitarians, the Adventists, and the Freethinkers, including the Spiritualists, who are largely nativ Americans, and who can be reckoned almost to a man for Sunday opening, saying nothing of the millions of the non-church members who take no stock in Sunday legislation. After all these are deducted where are you to find those twenty-five millions of petitioners for Sunday closing? But forty millions were claimed for a long time, and one often sees the latter figure in Christian documents even to-day. In the light of these facts and many more that we hav not the space to display here what can we think of the partisans who talk about "ifs" in trying to dispose of the awkward charge of fraud in connection with the vote to close the World's Fair on Sunday?

On the 13th of October there was unveiled at Batavia, New York, a tablet erected in memory of Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution. Nearly all of the cabinet officers were present, as well as several state officials. Secretary Carlisle delivered a historical address. There was a very large concourse of people on the ground. In making arrangements for the ceremonies care was taken that the two great divisions of the church should hav an opportunity to advertise themselvs. After the tablet was unveiled Bishop Ryan, Catholic, delivered a prayer. After luncheon the exercises were resumed at the State Park, where Bishop Coxe, of Buffalo, the arch anti-Catholic of the state, said his little prayer, and "Zion Awake" was sung. At the close of Secretary Carlisle's address Rev. Philo G. Cook of Buffalo delivered the closing prayer and the benediction. We do not know whether Mr. Cook is a Protestant or a Catholic, and it does not make any difference. The essential truth is that all these religious services were wholly out of place, and were an insult to every self-respecting citizen, regardless of his or her religious belief Where church and state are separated the clergyman has no official functions. He may, and often does, usurp them, as Bishops Ryan and Coxe and Rev. Mr. Cook did in this instance, but he is an interloper and a mischief-maker. The Christian Advocate objected when the mayor of Waterbury, Connecticut, received a Catholic dignitary officially, and it will now of course censure all concerned in this affair at Batavia. If it does not, shall we not be justified in saying that it does not mean anything when it avows its adherence to the principle of the separation of church and state?

The Sunday-law people always walk backward. On October 30th–31st the Pennsylvania Sabbath Association held a convention at Williamsport to celebrate the centennial of the Pennsylvania Sunday law, which is one of the worst statutes of the kind that disgrace the law-books of these states. In its call for the meeting the Association says that the law in question has preserved the Sabbath for the people of that state during the one hundred years now just passed. This amounts to a confession that a rite of the Christian church would hav fallen into desuetude had it not been for the arm of the civil power, which means, again, that there is not enough of vitality in the religion of the Nazarene to keep it alive; it must be artificially sustained by constables and judges. Which means, still again, that church and state are united and that the theo. crats rejoice that they are, despite their protestations to the contrary.

The Chicago Herald observes that while it seems quite easy for a few ministers to get the ear of the postal department at Washington and secure "instant attention," it appears "to be absolutely impossible for the business men of Chicago, for the great mass of the people for whose accommodation the postal service is supposed to exist, and who pay so enormous a proportion of the general postal revenues of the country, to get the attention of the department." The American Sentinel answers that there are two reasons for this state of affairs, one of which is "the religious prejudice of the officials," and the other the non-union of the business men, who hav not yet learned to "knife at the polls any politician or party that refuses their demands." "The political boycott is a powerful weapon and the political churches hav learned how to use it." This is true, and we shall never be respected by the political assassins of religious liberty until we learn to so use our votes as to retire them from the turmoil and strife of public life.

Credit should be given to the editor of the Testimony, a Sabbatarian paper of Buffalo, for telling the truth when it reflected on his fellow-Christians. He is evidently not a thick-and-thin partisan, and his honorable action is a lesson to all reformers, particularly to those who think that it is an unforgivable offense to criticise one's fellow-workers. He had read in the writings of "a Boston theologian and historian" this quotation from the "Table Talk" of Martin Luther:

"If anywhere anyone set up the day on a Jewish foundation to be observed for the day's sake, then I command you to work on it, to ride on it, to feast on it, to dance on it, to do anything whereby this encroachment on Christian liberty may be removed."

In seeking to verify this quotation the editor of the Testimony purchased successivly three editions of the "Table Talk," edited by three clergymen, of different sects. He found that each minister had omitted some things that would tell against his own sect, and all had left out the above quotation. The editor also read quotations from the prose works of Milton which were against Sunday observance and the doctrin of the trinity. Consulting an edition of Milton's works, he found these things carefully excluded, and "the learned editor, the 'pious doctor of divinity,' coolly informs the reader that he omitted these things because had he lived in our day he would hav been as much ashamed of such opinions as we, or words to that effect." All of which is commended to the careful consideration of the good Christian gentlemen who got up the stuffed petitions for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday.

The mingled stupidity and dishonesty of some propagandists is wonderful. A society paper, in playing at drawing a contrast between the teachings of Catholics and Protestants, says that the former teach that "God cursed the human race because Eve ate." The dishonesty in this is the implication that the Protestants do not teach the same thing, and the stupidity consists in supposing that anybody will be fooled by the assertion. Of course the trap was set to catch Freethinkers, but these know that the Protestants hold to the same belief in regard to the effect of Eve's "transgression" that Catholics do, and that the source of and authority for this superstition is the Bible, which the societies of which the paper indicated is one of the organs are determined that the school children of this country shall be compelled to study, regardless of the objections of their parents. The same sheet says that the Catholic priest teaches that God made a forty-year-old man in a minute. Of course he does, and likewise does the Protestant minister, and not an orthodox Protestant church in Christendom dares to put a denial of the truth of the alleged miracle in its official creed, and this society paper knows it. Freethinkers will not fall into that trap, either.

The Sunday worshipers are working on the nation, the states, and the cities and towns. They are quite rapidly adding the latter to their lists, and certainly are doing very thorough work when they can get such ordinances as this recently adopted by the council of St. Louis, Michigan:

"SECTION 1. No person shall keep open his or her store, shop, restaurant, grocery, or other place of business, pleasure, or amusement, or sell or offer for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise, within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday.

"SEC. 2. No person shall do any manner of work, or take part in any sport, game, or play, or be present at any dancing, public diversion, show, or entertainment within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis on said first day of the week."

Sec. 3 permits works of necessity or charity to be done, and allows drugs and medicins and undertakers' goods to be sold, but those are the only privileged actions and commodities. The minimum and maximum fines are five and ten dollars, and the costs are to be added. Think of the insolence of forbidding the playing of croquet, lawn tennis, and checkers on Sunday! Talk about trying to secure "rest" for the laboring people when they are forbidden to do the very things that would giv them rest! Who is so blind as not to see that the whole business is a scheme to make life so dreary on Sunday that the people will be forced, in sheer ennui, to go to church? Where is this thing to end?

A movement is on foot in Illinois to organize what its projectors are pleased to call a good citizenship political party. The Christian Endeavor Society, with a membership of forty-five thousand, is the originator of the scheme. To these hav been joined the Epworth League with thirty thousand and the Baptist Young People's Society with ten thousand The leaders think that they will absorb the Prohibition party and that they can secure the assistance of the Catholics, thus enabling them to wipe out the liquor traffic at once. All this shows us how rapidly we are approaching the time when political issues will be decided on religious grounds, the time when secular political parties will hav become religious political parties, and Christ will be king, as Miss Willard says, of our "camps and courts." The Prohibition party is the one that we should naturally expect would be the first to undergo this transformation, because it has a less number of secular garments to doff than any of the others. The Congregationalist thinks that with concert of action the Christian Endeavorers should be able to control the politics of both the old parties. It is certain that they with their fellow-theocrats did hav their way with the politicians of both organizations, and the People's party as well, so far as the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday was concerned, and we may be sure that they will hav their way all the time if we do not realize that their success means the destruction of liberty, and fight them to the death.

In the Episcopal Diocesan convention Rev. Dr. Bradley spoke of "unbiblical debauches." Presumably he meant some other kind than the class of which Lot's and Noah's and the "well drunken" time they had at the wedding in Cana were examples.

"THE BIBLE" is the title of the lecture that will be delivered by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll at the Star Theater on Sunday evening, November 11th. It was first delivered under the auspices of the Chicago Press Club in the great Auditorium of Chicago a few nights ago. It created the most profound sensation of anything the inimitable master of speech has uttered since he first burst like a ray of sunshine dispelling the gloom of ignonorance and blind faith. The press of Chicago united in declaring it to be Ingersoll's masterpiece—the calm, dispassionate pronouncement of judgment by a philosopher and a friend of humanity. He prefaced the lecture by a characteristic explanation, as follows: "I hav long thought that somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible. But I knew that the politicians dared not; they would lose their election. Ministers dare not; they would be driven from their pulpits. Editors dare not; they would lose their circulation. Professors would lose their positions; society men would lose their caste; merchants would lose trade. So, having the leisure and the inclination, I thought I would attend to the matter myself." His lecture is a serious analysis of the Bible, and he maintains vigorously throughout, its theme: "In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." The climax of interest in the lecture was reached when after he had exhaustivly enumerated the wrongs to humanity that hav been done in the name of Chirst he declared that "if Christ was in fact God he knew all the future. Why did he go dumbly to his death, leaving the world to misery and to doubt? I will tell you why. He was a man, and did not know." The Times said: "When Mr. Ingersoll reached the words 'He did not know,' a great sigh went up from the audience. There was an instant's silence and then a storm of applause that rose and surged and echoed from stage to topmost gallery. The hand-clapping died away, then rose again; this time a great burst of cheering accompanied it. · · · Ingersoll, like his hearers, knew that he had just achieved one of the great triumphs of a life that has been crowned with triumphs. Men who hav heard him time and again in the years past shook their heads gravely and said he had never done anything so masterful, so superb, and so full of resistless eloquence." Throughout the lecture, Colonel Ingersoll called upon the clergy to attempt to dispute any of his statements, and it is quite likely that some of them will respond with the usual result, after he is safely away. Colonel Ingersoll has determined to do more lecturing this season than usual. His plans include a brief Western trip this month, a tour of New England in December, an extended Western trip in January, and a season in the South in February. C. A. Davis, of 1293 Broadway, has charge of the Colonel's lecture business.

Observations.

A gentleman of the name of Thomas A. Janvier, writing a book just published by the Harper's, and called "In Old New York," givs a "glimpse" of Thomas Paine. He himself did not see Mr. Paine, but his "informant" did, and Janvier solemnly reproduces the picture. It was in 1809, when Paine lived in a house in Herring street which is now 293 Bleecker. The description is as follows:

> The sash was raised and a small table or stand was placed before him with an open book upon it which he appeared to be reading. He had his spectacles on, his left elbow rested upon the table or stand, and his chin rested between the thumb and fingers of his hand; his right hand lay upon his book, and a decanter containing liquor of the color of rum or brandy was standing next to his book or beyond it.

The informant might hav done better than that. Provided he possessed any imagination whatever, a slight exercise of its powers should hav enabled him to say that one foot which Paine had elevated to an adjacent mantelpiece was seen to be cloven, although his shoemaker had endeavored to disguise the deformity; that, coiled about the back of his chair, and only partially concealed by the long coat which he wore, was a diabolical tail with a notable barb at the end; and that a pair of horns were visible through the locks of hair now thinned by age. That was the popular conception in religious circles of Paine's appearance at the period mentioned, and if Mr. Janvier had seen fit to giv the story these few additional touches it would be picturesque enough for the use of Sunday-schools. Disciples of Paine may say that the decanter contained only cold tea, or hard cider at the strongest, but the hoofs, horns, and tail could not, I apprehend, be disposed of quite so flippantly.

I hav made a few notes on the campaign we are now sustaining which I will here introduce. I write this too early to announce the result of the election, but that is not of importance except to those who hav bets on it or are running for office. If any rascals hav been turned out, we may still sleep peacefully at night, calmed by the certainty that greater ones hav been turned in.

Note 1. The campaign has not been without features of distinguished die. The women hav been in it to such an extent that even those who wore bloomers hav had to hold them up; and as has been noted by several persons, the ministers talked politics while the politicians were sermonizing. Parson Parkhurst, who preached against the proposed constitutional amendment providing for woman suffrage, has, to use a scriptural phrase, plowed with the heifers to overthrow the Tammany Samson. He was not short-sighted enough to appeal to women's intelligence as it might be exercised at the polls. Heads is not what he wins on. He prefers the Delilah method to that which we may imagin would hav been favored by Hypatia. His trick has been barred out of the prize-ring, but is still, I believe, regarded as legitimate by the clergy.

Note 2. As I make out the issue of the campaign in New York, it is a question of legal or illegal robbery—whether protection money shall be paid to the poor devils in policemen's clothes, or whether it shall go "higher up." It is a question whether it is more economical to giv a patrolman a dollar or to pay the taxgather, the license clerk, or the police justice from two to ten. Some prefer to giv alms with their own hand rather than through a charity organization, or to assist the heathen round about them instead of making their contributions to a missionary society for tranmission abroad. On the same principle they like to conduct their own affairs without the too officious interference of a body of politicians designating themselvs the state. The investigations by a committee of senators headed by Senator Lexow is one phase of the problem. It is a suit brought to determin whether all the perquisits, or what is vulgarly called the "boodle," of New York city offices shall be retained by their local incumbents or be distributed among the senators and members of the assembly. The corruption known to exist has been unveiled, as might be expected, but if a committee from the police department should investigate the senators, the only difference, I take it, would be in the size of the game.

Note 3. As usual, there is great activity among the hunters after mercenary voters, that is, the poverty-stricken citizens who sell their votes for a few dollars. They ought to go "higher up" in this matter. Nobody believes that our state senators and assemblymen are pure or that corporations hav no influence on legislation. It is charged that even members of the Lexow committee hav been the attorneys for railroads at Albany. Half the country is convinced that votes of United States senators hav been bought with the money of sugar trusts, while it is a chestnut to describe the president as a tool of Wall street. I presume that all the charges are true. Officials who offer no resistance to the demands of religious hypocrisy, who hav not backbone enough to bar the door against religious thieves, moral prudes, and theocratic conspirators, would not naturally possess sufficient moral courage to decline to be bribed. Having parted with their manhood, they might as well sacrifice their honesty too, and let the tail go with the hide. Meanwhile they may divert public attention from their own rascality by passing and amending laws to jail the voter who disposes of his political influence for two dollars and a half.

Note 4. There are picturesque features, too, that should be kept in sight. The other night a political orator of New York named Wetmore, in predicting the defeat of the other party, delivered himself thus:

> For it is coming. You can hear it in the air. From the dark forests and mountains of the North, from the hill-embosomed lakes of the South—from the green waters of Niagara to where our own bay opens her beautiful arms to welcome the world, from the workshop and the home, from the lonely farm and the teeming city—louder and louder comes the sound of a people arousing in their wrath. Let vice shrink in its dens and wickedness tremble in its parlors, for the day of the Lord is at hand. Over base intriguer and truckling politician, over perjured officer and thieving ruffian, the flood shall roll and bury them so deep that never again shall they rise in public life—not even when the political seas giv up their dead.

That is fine and should hav been produced earlier in the campaign for general use throughout the country. It would sound as well in the mouth of any other party orator as it did in Mr. Wetmore's; but it will be as applicable next year as this. The wave of indignation has the same periodicity as the election, and is always to be remarked at this season of the year. It is a deplorable fact, though, that the base intriguer, the truckling politician, the thieving ruffian, and the rest of them know how to swim.

Note 5. The sporting gentlemen who run horses for the purpose of betting on their speed adjourned business about the middle of last week in order to lay their money on the candidates. These fellows, however, are no more than chubbers when their stakes are compared with those of the plunging senators, representativs, and other officials who make and enforce laws against gambling. As a sporting event, an election is second in interest only to an encounter between eminent pugilists.

The members of the Epworth League must be a highly impressionable lot of young people. At one of their late conventions in the West, as reported by a local paper, Dr. Berry, editor of the Epworth Herald, sang a song of which the refrain is,

> When the roll is called up yonder
> I'll be there, and the audience went wild. There was surging, and shouting, and other wild demonstrations. In fact, the reporter avers that "the effect was electrical." If Dr. Berry, in addition to saying that when the roll was called he would be there, had assured his listeners that he intended to stay all night, there is reason for inferring that asylums could not contain the lunatics he would hav made.

I suspect that about one-half of the thoughtful people of the civilized world hav either written "poetry," attempted to do so, or wished that they could. What proportion of these hav ever paused to inquire whether, before making verses, it is useful to learn anything about the art, I will not giv a guess. I estimate the percentage to be small, though, because so much so-called poetry proves its authors' neglect of such study. Yet nearly all the school grammars contain lessons on prosody, and a brief survey of any of these would enable the student to see that verse, like arithmetic, has rules; that it is as necessary to measure the lines of a poem as the several legs of a table, and that, like a yardstick, it is composed of feet. During my service as a printer I hav been more or less troubled by persons who paid no attention to these facts. They of course knew that in figuring they must giv a proper value to numbers, and that a house could not be built by inspiration, but they took no advantage of such knowledge when planning and erecting their poems. They were careful enough that there should be something like a correspondence of sound in the terminal words or syllables of their lines, thus providing for the rhyme; and that seemed to satisfy many of them. Others, I observed, had counted their syllables, under the delusion, apparently, that nothing more was needed. Now, if the rhymers will get their grammars and turn to the lessons on Prosody, they will perceive that a verse (and verse means line) is divisible into sections or feet, and that the words or syllables in these sections hav a certain relation to one another with respect to number and length. It may be imagined that the lines given by the grammarian as examples were cut up in that way just for fun, or to show what could be done with those particular verses, but neither theory would be the right one; the truth being that all poetry must be susceptible of similar treatment. It is an oversight of the grammarian that no hint of this is given, and I hav a few specimens that will serve to prove how reckless writers are of the same fact. These specimens were withheld from publication out of regard for their authors. I will apply the dividing or "scanning" process to a line or two and see how they come out. A young writer begins his poem thus:

> I wish I was a man like papa,
> And educated, too;
> I'd buckle on my sword and shield
> And bravely march right through.

The first line scans as follows:

1. I wish | I was | a man | like pa- | pa,

The grammarian calls that meter "hypercatalectic," because it has a syllable hanging over the end of the line. Take the next:

2. And ed- | uca- | ted, too;

Pure iambic, and above criticism; but look at the line which is to be read to correspond with line 1:

3. I'd buck- | le on | my sword | and shield

My son, your third line is short. It must hav escaped from some other poem. Now for the fourth:

4. And brave- | ly march | right through.

But you can't keep step with those two long fellows there at the end. The "ted" in line 2 only serves to mark time, but "right" is a full step in itself. Compare the first with the closing stanza, which is as follows, scanned to avoid repetition:

1. I'd plant | its glo- | rious ban | ner
2. On some | sublime | hight,
3. And un | to all | the world | let it be
4. A guid- | ing star | a shin | ing light.

Observe that "hight," a long syllable, stands alone in line 2. Then see the group of particles at the end of the next, and note that line 4 has an extra foot as compared with No. 2, which has but three, and one a game foot at that. Let's even things up if we can:

> I'd plant its glorious banner
> On more than Alpine hight,
> To be to all the people
> A burning, shining light.

It is not good poetry yet, but it can be depended upon to stand the stress of voice. If my young friend has a notion of music he will find it advantageous to tinker his lines until he can sing them to some tune without slurring the words or putting in extra notes. They will then be mechanically correct. Furthermore, if the author of the lines below will not take offense, I would suggest that he apply the same test to his verses. This stanza is from a hymn designed, says the writer, to be sung to the air of the "Sweet By-and-Bye." It will illustrate to the reader how the lyrical calipers giv the rule-o'-thumb poet away. Let somebody pitch the tune and we will proceed:

> The satisfaction in living a noble life
> Excels every future promis,
> And rewards us in meeting every strife—
> The highest theme of nature, the father.

Not pausing to inquire why the writer failed to chuck in the adverb "rather" as a terminating word for his second line, to rhyme with "father" in the fourth, it is proper to point out that words to fit the music of the "Sweet By and Bye" must hav anapestic feet, that is, three syllables—two short and a long one—to wit:

There's a land | that is fair- | er than day.

But the line, "The satisfaction in living a noble life," could not be cut up in that shape with an ax, nor could any of the others in the stanza. Nevertheless, if you don't write it that way it won't go. The rules of prosody are ossified. The throb of rhythm is as regular as the ticking of a clock. No one but Walt Whitman was ever permitted to write poetry in prose paragraphs indented like those of a catalog.

A religious paper, the Star of Bethlehem, published at Leeds, York county, England, is accredited with the following item of news about the late railroad strike:

> A big revolution is now going on in the United States of America, and there is little doubt that the government will be defeated. The dictator, Debs, has been driven from his palace, and he and his wife are now hiding in the mountains. The greatest trouble has been experienced in the capital of Chicago, where Grover Cleveland has obtained complete control. The railroad at that place has been torn up and thrown into the Mississippi river, and the stock yard has been razed to the ground.

It will be apparent to American readers that the Star of Bethlehem has greatly exaggerated the difficulty; also that its knowledge of our affairs is defectiv. If the foregoing clipping may be accepted as rightly showing how short our English brethren are on information regarding American institutions and geography, the editor of the London Freethinker may be let off with a light sentence for elaborating Ala. into Alaska, and locating Montgomery, Alabama, four thousand miles or so from where it really is. And we are not prepared to throw stones, either. The other day a nativ of Maine applied for registration in New York as a voter, and the intelligent inspector demanded his naturalization papers.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The Freethinkers' National Congress.

Among the letters read at the Congress of Freethinkers held in Chicago October 26th, 27th, and 28th, was the following from Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union:

SECULAR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

It was only by great effort, expense, and thoughtful care that immense palms and other matured trees were taken from their nativ soil to the Columbian Exposition, and to make them liv, thrive, and look natural in a climate unnatural to them required further thoughtful care and large expense.

It included providing those conditions of soil, heat, moisture, etc., which the nature of the particular trees required.

The success of transplanting trees involved a thorough knowledge of their natural requirements, a plan for artificially providing those requirements, and skillful handling.

Take away the conditions necessary to make the trees flourish at Chicago, and nature would assert herself in the withered leaves and subsequent decay of branch and trunk.

Could the seed hav been planted, or even the young tree set out there, and thus been gradually acclimated, it might hav flourished with less artificial assistance. In other words, the tree would flourish because it had been so developed that it had within it those essentials to make it liv and grow in a different climate, still retaining its nativ peculiarities.

Nearly every person has had sufficient experience in horticulture or floriculture to know that the seed or the young plant can be better developed, and with less care and expense, than the plant or tree which has reached or is nearing maturity.

The commonest man or woman knows that what I hav said of trees is true.

When I apply nature's laws to the cultivation of trees, or improving the breed of cattle, they listen, think, and understand, but when I undertake to tell them that children are like trees and cattle and can be stunted by bad conditions, or improved by good ones, they will not listen, will not think, and will not understand. Their religion has settled the fate of children. God sent them as they are; perfect or imperfect, blind, deaf, dumb, or crippled, it is God's will, and investigation is useless.

Yet just as surely as what I hav said of the vegetable and animal kingdom is true, so is it true of the development or molding of the minds of the human family.

Men and women are the matured trees. Heredity, temperament, environment, education hav molded their minds, shaped their bodies, and so fixed their ideas that it requires a tremendous effort to change them, not only a tremendous effort, but a continuous effort.

How different the child-mind. The child-mind is but a twig, and the twig is easily bent.

The most important question, then, before us as Secularists is: Shall we bend the twigs, or let Christians bend them? Shall we continue our efforts to transplant the matured trees? Shall we devote our energies, our time, and our money to changing the minds of men and women, or shall we devote them to shaping the minds of children?

If we shape the child, we will hav no adult to change.

Is it not time that we comprehend the meaning of the priest's words, "Giv me the child until he is twelve years of age and he will never depart from the faith?"

What do these words mean, and what can we learn from them? They mean that priests learned long ago the best method of propagating their religion. They hav learned by experience that if they plant the seed, the harvest is theirs; that a plastic mind is easily molded, and when once it has imbibed their teachings, so long as the child livs its mind will revert to its first training.

The priest realizes that it is just as easy to instill into the child's mind error, as it is truth; that it is not capable of distinguishing the true from the false, and if, day after day and year after year, it imbibes superstition, and is placed where it can hear nothing but such teachings, of course it is true that it will likely "never depart from the faith."

With this end in view priest and preacher hav left nothing undone to provide society and entertainment for the young, as the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Woman's Christian Association, the Society of Christian Endeavor, the Young People's Guild, the Young People's Prayer Meeting, the Young Men's Institute, the Boy's and Girl's Brigade, the Christian Sunday-schools, and even the Baby's branch of the Christian Church, will testify.

While Secularists hav been trying to transplant matured minds, Christians, by means of these societies, hav taken advantage of the social nature of children, and provided attractiv entertainments for them, knowing that if they succeed in drawing the children into their fold, the parents would naturally follow.

The social part of their meetings is the drapery ever hiding the ugly skeleton of their religion. It is a kind of perfume which overcomes the noxious smell of their decaying creeds. It is the paint and powder which covers the deceitful face of superstition and givs to it the appearance of health and beauty.

Even Secularists are caught in these Christian webs, and permit their children to be caught, too, thinking and saying: "Oh, well, I don't think it will do them much harm, and it is a way for them to get into society."

Is it true that it will not do them much harm? Would you say it will do your child no harm to be taught a falsehood? Will it do him no harm to be taught that the Bible God, the devil, heaven, and hell are facts, when there is absolutely no proof of their existence? Will it do him no harm to be taught to ask Jesus for help, when it cannot be proven that Jesus ever helped anybody? Will it do him no harm to be taught that a good God could be the author of so many ridiculous and bad things as are credited to him in the Bible? Will it do him no harm to be taught that the many unreasonable, unnatural, and impossible statements and stories found in the Bible are true, when all experience and science proves them to be false? Is it best to teach him to do right through fear of hell and hope of heaven, or to do right because it is right to do right?

You know very well that every wrong idea or impression that your child gets will in some way affect his conduct, to his injury.

Now, why should you send your children to these schools, where faith is valued higher than facts; where emotions are appealed to and reason ignored; where all the teachings, songs, pictures, and prayers naturally tend to destroy reason and nourish faith?

Examin the lesson leaflets or catechism. The foundation of these is the Bible, which the children are told is the inspired word of God.

The first thing the child is taught is that God made him, and made him expressly to glorify his name; that the highest good in this world is, therefore, to work for God. These lessons teach the child of Bible heroes and heroins, and hold them up as shining examples of God's chosen people, and yet these same men and women would not be tolerated in respectable society of to-day.

Why do the Christians not teach in their Sunday-schools something useful and sensible? Something that will awaken thought or develop reason? Why do they not teach things which pertain to this world, to the good, the true, and beautiful of earth; of the sweet here and now instead of the sweet by-and-by; of our relations to one another instead of to the gods; of how we must liv in harmony with nature's laws if we would hav health and happiness, instead of praying for these things?

The teachings of the Christian Sunday-schools are for the most part foolish notions on the origin and purposes of life, and deal with subjects concerning which we know absolutely nothing, namely, of God and a future life. The welfare of the body is lost sight of in their anxiety for the welfare of something or nothing called the soul.

Is it possible that clouding the tender mind of the child with error will do it no harm?

Are there not enough known facts to teach our children that would interest and benefit them? Cannot children be brought together on Sunday and hav a good time, and be taught truth and sense instead of lies and nonsense?

Is there anything more important for us to do than to provide a place for our children where their minds will be free from such detrimental environments? Hav we not too long been permitting priest and preacher to bend the twigs?

It is only natural that children should want society, and they will hav it. It is right that they should hav it. The social nature in them was not born of the Christian religion or any other religion. It is as natural as the singing of the birds or the unfolding of the bud into blossom. Christians hav taken advantage of this part of human nature in all their organizations, and it is for this reason that they hav been successful.

Would we, as Secularists, hav equal success? Then let us be wise and learn although from the enemy. We know that human nature cannot be entirely changed in a day nor yet a year. Indeed we would not, if we could, educate out of men and women that desire to mingle together and cultivate the social side of life.

The most important thing for us to do is to unite our strength, our forces, and supplant Christian young people's societies and Sunday-schools with similar organizations controled by and in the interest of Secularism. The secular Sunday-school must supplant the Christian Sunday-school if we would hav the child's mind rightly developed.

The future of Secularism depends upon the Secular Sunday-school. As the Christian Sunday-schools are the nurseries where are trained the future workers for the cause of Jesus, so the secular Sunday-schools must be the nurseries where will be trained the future workers for the cause of science and humanity. Nor does it require a vast amount of care, time, or money. The success of the Christian Sunday-schools is the result, first, of a splendid working system, evolved from years of experience, and second, the simple manner in which the paraphernalia is arranged.

Anyone who can read the English language and who will giv sufficient time and energy to the work can conduct a Christian Sunday-school; and we must hav our paraphernalia so systematized, our instructions so plain, that any Secularist who can read and who is sufficiently energetic can conduct a Secular Sunday-school.

The Secularists of Oregon hav made an effort in this direction, and while our system may not yet be perfect, yet it is working so admirably that we believe it is on the road to perfection.

The ideas involved in all our work are, First, to make it as simple as possible, so that the child can easily grasp its meaning; and second, to make it as attractiv as possible, so that the child will be happy in the work.

The play instinct is natural to every child; therefore the younger the child, the more play we seek to bring into its work. For the first group, then, we hav adopted kindergarten work and teaching by means of objects, and all children from the ages of four to nine are included in this group.

The second group is provided with lesson leaves which contain ten questions and answers. These lessons are on subjects which pertain to this world, alternating lessons on ethical subjects with those on science or perhaps the life of some poet, historian, or inventor. These lessons contain what we call a "Concert Gem of Thought," which all the members of the group recite in concert. They also contain a "Thought to be Remembered," as, "A little help is worth a deal of pity," each lesson having a different thought for each pupil.

For the third group five questions without answers are provided. These being for pupils from fifteen to twenty-one years of age, it is expected that they will be able to find the answers themselvs, and thus there will be room for more thorough discussion of the question than if the answers were furnished.

The next group is called the "Progressiv Bible Class," composed of those over twenty-one years, who choose any subject they wish for discussion, or they read and discuss the Koran, the Bible, or any of the other so-called sacred writings.

All Secular Sunday-schools hav the same opening and closing songs, read the same concert poem—all of which, with the lessons, constitution, and by-laws, etc., are furnished by the Oregon State Secular Union. About twenty minutes are allowed for lessons; then comes a review of lessons by the superintendent; then a calisthenic drill, followed by recitations, songs, essays, etc.; the exercises concluding with a military drill in which flags are used instead of guns.

The members of the different groups are to be provided with badges, at the side of each group being a banner with the name of the group and the portrait of the person after whom it is named. The kindergarten group will wear white badges, their banner containing the name and portrait of Frederick Froebel; the second group will wear blue badges and their banner hav on it the name and portrait of Susan H. Wixon, and so on.

The calisthenic and military drills, conducted with vim, are especially attractiv to the children, but we aim to make everything so simple and so interesting that the children will tease to come to our Secular Sunday-school.

Each Sunday-school will hav its own library and museum, and many of the lessons are written about the minerals, insects, and flowers which the museum contains.

It is true that our schools involve labor, thought, and some expense, but it is the planting of seeds and twigs—less labor, less thought, and less expense than transplanting matured trees, and there is more certainty of permanent success.

Every child stopped on the road to superstition, and turned into our schools, is a "stitch in time." It will not cost half as much to start him right as it will to get him right after he is grown.

There is not much labor, however, for those who conduct the schools, as all the paraphernalia is furnished by the Oregon State Secular Union, just as the Christian Sunday-schools are supplied from headquarters.

The real labor is in the preparation of the lessons, which, so far as this state is concerned, has been done by myself and Mr. Smith, for, after a thorough investigation, the executiv committee of the Oregon State Secular Union was unable to find any lessons published that were suitably arranged, or that contained the subject matter which it was desired to introduce into our schools.

We are confident that the organization of Secular Sunday-schools on these or similar lines is the simplest, surest, and quickest way to reach the young, and cut off the supply which supports Christian superstitions.

Is this work not worth our united effort? Shall we not devote more time to children, instead of all our time to grown people? Shall we not be more and more constructiv in our work? Is it not best everytime we pull up a weed of superstition, to then and there plant in its place a seed of truth? Will we remember that just as true as superstition is born in man, so it must be bred and educated out of him?

The Secularists of Oregon answer in the affirmativ, and invite the coöperation of Secularists everywhere in this necessary, aggressiv, and fruitful work.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

The committee on resolutions, of which E. M. Macdonald, Franklin Steiner, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, John Mahara, and W. Bogard were members, reported the following, which were adopted:

CHURCH TAXATION.

Resolved, That the exemption from taxation of over two thousand million dollars' worth of church property in the United States, which property is constantly increasing in value while a large portion of it is used for business and not religious purposes, from which the churches derive a vast revenue, is a most dangerous and unjust form of class legislation, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, which declares the equal rights of all and special privileges to none. The churches are protected by the government in their rights of property, the religious freedom of every citizen is guaranteed, and for these benefits, if for no other reason, churches should contribute their just share to the burdens of taxation. To exempt churches on any ground whatsoever is a violation of the rights of all, compels the non-Christian to support a religion in which he does not believe, and therefore makes the churches a standing monument of injustice, fraud, and tyranny. Against this gigantic wrong the Freethinkers of America protest.

SABBATH LEGISLATION.

Resolved, That the attempt to enforce the observance of the Christian Sabbath by legislativ enactments, or by the revival of ancient laws which are practically a dead letter on the statute books, is a most unwarranted attack upon the liberties of the American citizen. The Christian Sabbath is an ecclesiastical institution, and is solely for the benefit of the churches, and not the people. The maintenance of the Sabbath by the power of government is a fruitful source of oppression and persecution. Good citizens, for no other reason than that they believe in and obey the Bible, are torn from their homes, are dragged to the prison house, are sent into exile, are stripped of their property by these iniquitous Sabbath laws. We demand the repeal of all these laws, which are a relic of superstition, unfounded even upon the Christian religion itself, and the only effect of which is to increase the despotic authority of the clergy.

We demand that every citizen shall decide for himself which day he shall keep holy, or on which day he shall rest from his labors. The interference of the government in a matter which alone concerns the individual is contrary to every democratic principle, and subversiv of personal liberty, and all Sabbath laws of any kind whatsoever should be persistently and unflinchingly opposed by every true American.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

Resolved, That the common school system of the American republic is the bulwark of free institutions; that the prosperity and greatness of our country and the virtue and progress of its citizens are based upon universal intelligence. The ballot should be the expression of knowledge and not of ignorance; it should be the enlightened judgment of a great people. This cannot be except by the establishment of common schools in every community. These schools must be purely secular. No sectarian or religious teaching or exercises of any kind whatsoever should be allowed in these state schools. There should be no Bible reading, no prayers, and no religious hymn. Not theology, but science, patriotism, and human rights should be taught. The cross is for the church, but the American flag is for the school-house.

All are taxed for the support of the public schools; all hav a common ownership and interest in them, and therefore to mingle religious training with secular education is a perpetual outrage upon the rights of the citizen, who is taxed for the support of them; and we regard as disloyal citizens those who are trying to pervert and destroy them. In the words of the immortal Grant concerning the education of children under the authority of the government, Freethought affirms, "Keep church and state forever separate."

MAILS.

Resolved, That the prosecution by the United States government of citizens for sending portions of the Bible through the mails is an example of the grossest tyranny; and is a direct blow against free speech and a free press. If, for the sake of wreaking their vengeance on an honest Freethinker, the churches, through the pliant power of a corrupt and cowardly judiciary, are willing to declare their own sacred book so obscene that it is unfit to be sent through the mails, we will not join in this unjust crusade. Let the shame and the disgrace fall upon the Christian churches themselvs. We defend the right of every man to utter his honest thought, to speak it, to write it, and to send it through the mails; and any law which prevents this is solely for the purpose of religious persecution and not for the advancement of morality. We demand that all such laws be at once repealed. They are for the despotism of religion, and not for the purity of the people.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Resolved, That the principle of equal rights and impartial liberty affirms that woman is in every respect the equal of man, that she has the same right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," the same right to develop her own being to the utmost of her power, and to be untrammeled in every department of human activity. A government whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed must be representativ of woman as well as of man. A government of the people, by the people, and for the people does not exclude from its citizenship one-half of the people. The Declaration of Independence is for woman as well as for man; is for her liberty, her honor, her advancement, and her moral, social, legal, and political elevation. The Freethinkers of America are committed to the emancipation of woman from the bondage, degradation, and infamy imposed upon her by the barbarous theologies of a past age, and would endow her with every right possessed by any human being.

METHOD OF WORK.

Resolved, That in our contest for the principles of Freethought we do not war upon persons; we do not war with any man or woman on account of any religious belief; we war with systems, with institutions which are committed to the enslavement of the human race. We affirm the largest intellectual charity, and we do not hold the individual to blame for what is the result of long continued and widely spread conditions of human society. Our battle field is in the domain of thought. It is against superstition, fear, ignorance, tyranny, crime, and falsehood that we lift our banner. We defend the rights of the Christian as unflinchingly as we defend our own rights. We claim no right or privilege for the Freethinker that we do not grant to every other human being. We contend for universal principles whose triumph will be for the benefit of all.

REFORM.

Resolved, That the true method of reform in this age and land of freedom and enlightenment is by evolution and not by revolution; that the time has arrived when peace and not war will be the pathway of liberty. So long as every American citizen holds in his hand the ballot there is no need of a resort to violence or bloodshed. In the great struggle of the future for justice and humanity it is agitation, education, and arbitration that will bring forth the noblest fruits of human endeavor for the amelioration of wrong. Organized Freethought is in sympathy with every effort for human welfare. It affirms the dignity and the rights of labor and that poverty should be removed as an unnecessary evil; but it affirms that science, mental emancipation, and political justice are the necessary means to social and industrial progress. It therefore declares the supremacy of its work and that the secularization of all human governments is the greatest step toward the perfection and happiness of mankind.

The resolutions, on motion of John Mahara, were adopted unanimously.

Mrs. Freeman read some more letters from absent friends, among them one from Mr. Beck, regarding the founding of a college, as follows:

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Oct, 23, E.M. 294.

S. P. PUTNAM, ESQ., CHICAGO, ILL., Dear Friend and Brother: As you will soon be having the Freethought Congress in Chicago, I write you to say that I regret that I cannot be there in person; but I send you and the Congress my greeting and best wishes that you will hav a successful meeting, that the cause of Human Liberty will be advanced and strengthened, and that finally Freethought will prevail in the United States. I wish to say that I hav Ingersoll Springs yet. I also hav another quarter section adjoining, and will renew the offer that I made in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September, 1893, to giv ten acres of land for the Ingersoll College and home for aged Freethinkers; and as I hav more land now I will double the offer and giv twenty acres for the same purpose. The springs are fine and sufficient to water a large town and irrigate a good tract of land besides with proper water works, and it would make a paradise on earth if improved. I would like to get the matter started as soon as I can, because I am sixty-three years of age, and I want to make it go while I am living. With the proper appliances every person living there could hav good spring water in houses and on the lawns.

Wishing the Federation and Union the great success they deserve, I am, Yours fraternally, G. G. BECK.

Ernest Mendum wrote:

BOSTON, Oct. 24, 1894.

To the Friends and Delegates to the Annual Congress of Freethinkers, Greeting:

The Boston Investigator is pledged to the work you hav in hand. For over sixty years it has waged uninterrupted warfare against ecclesiastical tyranny and all forms of superstition. On the universal acceptance of the Nine Demands of Liberalism rests the welfare of this nation If this republic is to endure the church must take its hands off our throats and out of our pockets. Religion must be divorced from the government, and people must learn that true salvation comes more from the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge than through "the blood of the lamb"

Your work has the inspiration of justice, liberty, and truth. May harmony and wisdom characterize your deliberations, and may the result of your convention be an impetus to radical thought that shall stir this country to better things from center to circumference ERNEST MENDUM.

Other letters were read making suggestions on organization and publications, but the Congress, while regarding all of these as good, seemed to consider their adoption impracticable at present, and took no action thereon.

The concluding portion of the Congress was a succession of speeches. Saturday evening Mesdames Ames and Roberts interested the audience, the former endeavoring to answer the question, "Is the Spirit of the Age a New One?" the latter with some "Thoughts on Hell." The Rev. Mr. Chunn, who was scheduled to appear at this session, wrote that he could not keep his appointment.

Sunday morning Franklin Steiner discoursed on "The Struggle for Religious Liberty," making a good speech, which will be utilized by the two organizations in their political work this year. He was followed by Dr. Juliet Severance on "Our Work: How Shall We Best Carry It Forward?" She said in part:

The distinctiv work of the Secular Union is to educate the public mind in those principles of liberty and equality clearly set forth by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

Little by little, in various ways, through state legislation, has religious liberty been invaded. At the present time, in seven states the testimony of an Infidel will not be taken in a court of justice. For example, I may see my son murdered, my daughter ravished, my home laid in ashes, yet because I cannot believe in a God my testimony is refused, while that of any criminal, even a murderer, will be received if he first swears he believes in a God—and most criminals do so believe.

We are all taxed for the support of religion against the express spirit and letter of the Constitution, for the hundreds of millions of church property that pays no revenue to the government causes an increase in the amount every tax payer is assessed, thus in reality compelling every one to pay tribute to the church; as also in the case of all chaplaincies, appropriations to sectarian schools, etc. The injustice of exempting all church property from taxation was protested against by President Grant in his last message to Congress. He recommended taxing churches that claim the protection of government the same as any other property and prophesied that if it were not done bloodshed would be the final result. Garfield also, in a speech in Congress, made a strong argument against the exemption of church property from taxation, declaring that the divorce between church and state should be absolute.

Teaching religious dogmas in our schools supported at public expense is also an outrage upon individual rights, as there are many who disbelieve in the doctrins thus instilled into the minds of their children, claiming the right to direct their religious training as they may elect.

The laws compelling every citizen to observe certain days as holy, under the pains and penalties of fines and imprisonment, is an outrage upon the principles of religious liberty that our forefathers fought and died to establish.

Requiring the judicial oath from those who disbelieve in theologic dogmas is unjust and an infringement of personal rights.

We hav formulated and adopted what we denominate the Nine Demands, and upon these principles we stand, and to secure these rights we hav banded together. This is our particular work as an organic body. How best to accomplish this is the burden of my thought this morning.

The churches are strongly organized, hav plenty of money at their command, are popular and in their methods unscrupulous. They believe in a God who wreaks his vengeance upon all who disobey his decrees. They are very godlike in this respect, as is manifest by the bitter persecutions everywhere meted out to offenders as instanced in the cases of the Seventh Day Adventists in Tennessee, who hav been persecuted with a malignancy worthy only of Christianity. They are bound to damn in this life all who obey not their will, as they believe God will in the next those who are disobedient to him.

A belief in a God, a ruler of the universe, who rewards obedience and punishes disobedience is, in my judgment, the foundation of all religious superstition, hence the first and most important work in the line of liberalizing the minds of the people is to eradicate the god idea—root and branch. This is a difficult and thankless task, and can be accomplished only by patient work, sound logic, familiarizing the mind with the facts and theories of evolution, the correlation of forces, the natural combinations of matter in accord with inherent qualities; in fact, the naturalness of the world and its inhabitants, with no dependence upon any external ruler, or governor, or first cause, or oversoul, or any other modification of the God idea. All these fetishes we worship come alone from the child-condition of the human brain, that has not yet outgrown the demand for a Santa Claus, or what is equally a myth—a God.

The plane of authority is a natural one. The child in its development must take its parents' and teachers' word as authoritative. As manhood is reached that condition is outgrown, and the demands of reason must be met, facts must be proven by demonstration.

The last faculties of the human brain to reach maturity—a ripe development—are the reasoning faculties. What is true of the individual is true of races. When the manhood plane is reached in the evolution of humanity, all beliefs that cannot admit of demonstration will be relegated to the chambers of rejected superstitions.

If, as I claim, the God idea is the basis of all superstition, once remove that and the superstructure builded thereon will surely fall to the ground. Holy days, prayers, religious feasts and fastings, will be replaced by scientific education and demonstrated facts.

To bring this happy state to mankind will require heroic endeavor. The church is bent on subjugating the people to her power. She has marshaled the women of the nation (a power Liberals too little appreciate) under her banner, and "the Women's Christian Temperance Union," says its president, Miss Frances E Willard, "local, state, national, world-wide, has one vital organic thought, one absorbing purpose, one undying enthusiasm; it is that Christ shall be this world's king, king of its courts, its camps, and its commerce, king of its colleges, and its cloisters; king of its customs and its constitutions. · · · Concerning the platform of our next national Prohibition convention, I am content to leave it substantially as it is, save that it should declare Christ and his law to be the basis of government and the supreme authority in national as in individual life."

Thus organized as professed temperance agitators they are by every means in their power fastening the shackles upon the limbs of cringing slaves more and more securely.

The Anti-Vice Society, guilty itself of not only vice but grossest crimes, has caused the world the loss, so far as physical presence is concerned, of some of our most valiant workers. D. M. Bennett and E. H. Heywood, as well as others, were victims of its cruel persecutions, as no doubt their deaths were caused by the effects of prison life. To-day Moses Harman is at large on a writ of habeas corpus, and may be incarcerated again at any time. Lois Waisbrooker, a woman worn and battle-scarred by her life-long fight for liberty, is now awaiting trial under that odious Comstock law, enacted alone for the infamous purpose of persecuting and ridding the world, so far as possible, of religious and social heretics. And there are professed Liberals who justify the law and would help enforce it. They must, it seems to me, be very stupid or exceedingly vicious.

The right to the safe, unmolested transit of the mails is one like free speech and a free press, that should be kept inviolate. In fact, we cannot hav the latter without the former.

To right these wrongs, to re-establish the religious liberty constitutionally ours, will require long-continued self-sacrificing labor, and few there be with love enough for humanity to take their lives in their hands and, facing obloquy and scorn, the misunderstanding of friends, do this work, in season and out of season, for the enlightenment and liberation of the world. A man or woman who engages in this grand educational work should feel the sacredness of the mission. The eyes of the people are upon him. Does he fail in honesty and integrity, it is attributed to his irreligion. Does his life not square with the highest code of morals in the line of sobriety, chastity, and other virtues, it is because he is not a believer in religion, and his usefulness is largely destroyed.

A worker for the higher civilization should feel a mighty responsibility resting upon him—should, for the sake of his work, for the sake of other workers, for the sake of those he would redeem from the thraldom of superstition, set an example of the highest living in every possible aspect.

The world is moving forward, faiths are broadening, disbelief in creeds is on the increase. Then, why are we not a greater power in the nation, to bring about the repeal of those laws so unjust and cruel, by which theologic impudence and cupidity persecute and imprison the people most honest and intelligent?

It is because we hav not yet outgrown credal sectarian jealousies and petty bigotry, because of our stupid intolerance and lack of unity of feeling, that church malevolence dares arrest, fine, imprison, yea, persecute to the death, those among us who are brave enough to dare be true.

We have in these United States millions of Spiritualists, all of them believers in a Secular government. Why are they not working with the Secular Union for just legislation against church domination? Listen. There is only one reason—Intolerance. Intolerance of Materialists manifest toward Spiritualists and vice versa. Here is common cause with common ground for united work, whereby this world can be bettered here and now. Every intelligent man and woman knows that ecclesiasticism is determined to subjugate to its will the people of this nation.

Catholicism is on the increase, its adherents even now outnumbering those of Protestantism in New England. Protestantism is growing fat on its success in enforcing Sunday laws in many states, persecuting with godly zeal even those who for conscience' sake dare disobey its edicts. Our workers for free thought and free lives are being hounded to the death, both Spiritualists and Materialists, by the accursed Comstock gang, while some of the professed Liberals uphold the nefarious work.

It is time a halt was called. It is full time that all Liberals, whether they hav belief or knowledge of a future life or think death is an endless sleep, should join hands and stop making faces at one another and calling names. They should stand shoulder to shoulder, united in the noble purpose of resisting the ecclesiastical monster that threatens the life of the republic. Life is as important here and now as it can ever be in any future state of existence, and whether civilization goes on with ever-increasing excellence and beauty depends upon the question of that freedom necessary for the growth and unfoldment of the blossoms and fruits of progress. I seem to see, with the poet Massey, "'Tis coming."

Sunday afternoon Rev. A. T. Jones occupied the entire session with an address on the "Judicial Basis of a Religious Despotism in the United States." Mr. Jones's address is in pamphlet form and can be had for ten cents. In the evening Mr. Peacock, of Chicago, the Zither Club of the same place, D. T. Ames, of New York, and others occupied the platform a few minutes each. They were followed by Mr. Remsburg on "The Sabbath Question in Secular Government." Most of his lecture is already familiar to many of our readers, as is Mrs. Freeman's "Ideal of '76," which she delivered in her usual acceptable, eloquent, and poetic way. Judge Waite being absent, the closing address was by Mr. Putnam alone, who said:

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

The flag of our country is not something that has been manufactured; it is not an artificial creation, like the forms and colors of a fashion-plate. It is a growth like the flags of the great nations of the world. It was born of a people's fervid life. It has a history and a meaning deep and wonderful as the sublime aspects of nature herself. It is the child of the past; it is the prophet of the future. It is not a thing; it is a symbol. Like the stars of heaven it is freighted with the light of ages. It beams with the struggles of centuries; with the victories of many a hard-fought field. Years of darkness and years of glory have poured their greatness into its shining folds. It is the jewel of man's richest blood. It is the blossom upon the azure fields of earth's noblest harvests.

We honor our flag. We welcome it with throbbing hearts. We believe in its gracious promise. We would give our best efforts to make more illustrious its sweeping splendors.

What does our flag mean, not simply as it floats at the head of armies, but as it streams from a thousand hights, from the domed capitol and the roof of school and home?

First of all, it represents the unity of man. It is the emblem of world-wide fraternity. Formerly flags represented strifes and division. They marked the boundaries of nations. They kindled the passion of war. They floated to strains of martial music, and surged in the fury of battle. But in the evolution of man flags begin to represent the victories of peace, the intermingling of nations, the federation of the world. The old savage war spirit ceases. The soldier becomes a comrade. The stars upon our flag multiply not by conquest, but by the cultivation of the earth. The national spirit becomes international, and the flags of every land blend in one blaze of glory. We believe in the universal republic, in the commonwealth of all mankind. This is the ideal of the future. Our government shall broaden and brighten until it embraces the millions of the earth. In the folds of our banner shall shine the happiness and progress of all. But unity must not destroy liberty, and our flag stands for liberty—for the individual freedom, for local government, and not a centralized government.

We do not want a consolidated empire. We must keep the powers of government distributed among the people, and close to the people. The citizen must not be subordinate to the state. The state is for the citizen. It is for the defense of his rights; not to take them away. The state is not to be a "divine power" above and beyond the people, but it is to be the continuous expression of the people's will. The authority of the government is the consent of the governed, and this consent is to be perpetually given. Not the general government, but the town government, is the foundation of the American republic. The town government must be preserved, for it is that which is most closely in connection with the life of the people. To destroy the town government and substitute general government would abolish the real glory of the republic. Its vitality would cease. Its union then would be a despotism. It is liberty and union that constitute the true glory of a state. The state exists for the individual, not the individual for the state. The despotism of a democracy is no whit better than the despotism of a czar. Let there be liberty in unity and unity in liberty. Our flag also stands for labor, its worth, its dignity, its rights, its advancement. Labor was once the mark of degradation; it was the vocation of a slave. He who labored was trampled under foot. He sweat for others. He was a beast of burden.

Labor is now sovereign. The republic of to-day and of the future is the republic of working people. Not to work will be dishonorable hereafter. Labor shall have its just reward; its share of earth's golden harvests. There shall be homes for all. Poverty shall be abolished. Does not our flag mean this? Was it not born of the people? And are not the people the workers of this planet? Is not work the glory of humanity? Is not this the true grandeur of nations? The farm and shop must take the place of camp and palace; and the hand of toil must wield instead of the scepter.

Again, the flag of the republic means the education of the people. The school-house is greater than the throne of any king. Where there is a school-house there is the guardian of liberty and justice. Knowledge is power, knowledge is virtue, knowledge is happiness. Ignorance is the mother of vice and crime, as well as of devotion and tyranny. Teach children the truth; teach them nature; teach them humanity; teach them human rights; teach them to honor themselvs and others; teach them industry, health, good citizenship. Then shall the republic be great and beautiful. Then shall art and science flourish. Then shall superstition cease, and tyranny and fear. Then shall the mind be free as well as the body, and win its noblest triumphs.

And so, finally, our flag, representing unity and liberty, labor and education, shall be the banner of man's radiant progress. Ours is the flag of the future; the flag of hope and promise. Our flag is the prophecy of golden to-morrows. Let us have faith in its glorious beauty. Let us believe that the world is growing better and wiser from day to day; that liberty and justice shall be bright realities; that knowledge shall make virtue, and virtue happiness; that wrong shall be defeated and right triumphant. Our flag has been through many a stormy scene. Torn, but flying, it has still swept to victory.

From year to year while the vast republic extends from sea to sea, has it not gathered increasing promise in its starry folds? Does it not grow more dear and precious as more and more it represents peace and justice to uncounted millions? Great struggles are before us; great contests for the right. Liberty is not yet achieved. Truth is not yet on the throne. The press and platform must take the place of sword and cannon in still mightier combats in the arena of the world. But shall we not hope that our flag, the flag of the American republic, the flag of wondrous and inspiring history, the flag of a new world, shall ever be the flag of liberty, the flag of man's onward march, that flag whose first rays flashed from the genius of a Paine, which was defended by the sword of a Washington, which challenged and overturned kings with the pen of a Jefferson and the lightnings of a Franklin, which unloosed a million chains in the freighted words of Lincoln? That flag, in spite of falsehood and tyranny, of ignorance and superstition, shall yet float in stainless splendor

O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

Considering various disadvantages under which the two organizations labored the meeting was a good one. Not so many from out of town were present as at the last Congress, but Saturday and Sunday brought the number fairly well up, and the local attendance on Sunday was large. The officers, all of them, deserve great credit for their efforts, though to Mr. Putnam, as usual, fell most of the work, and he is entitled to special credit. The Federation and Union now hav the same president and secretary, and their work will of course be identical. The vice-presidents, however, and directors are not the same, nor the treasurers, Messrs. Wettstein and Reichwald retaining their positions as of old. Mr. Wettstein is at present in Europe, and his son attends to the matter for him. Otto Wettstein, jr., is a capable young man, pleasant to meet and good to know. He is with his father in the jewelry business at Rochelle, Ill. Mr. Reichwald is head of the firm of Reichwald Bros., fruit and vegetable commission merchants, at 234 South Water street, Chicago, Ill. He is a good man for our farmer friends to write to when they hav produce of any kind to sell. He has achieved success in business through close attention and integrity in handling the commissions intrusted to him. The other officers hav been before the Liberal public for years, and are so favorably regarded because of their devotion to Liberalism. There ought to be some good work accomplished this year.

Treasurer's Report.

The most successful Congress in the history of Freethought has come and gone. Many friends we hav met, and new ones added to our acquaintance. This was truly a business Congress from the beginning to the end. More good has been accomplished than at the World's Fair Congress, and I hope the next will eclipse this. We hav received splendid notices from our daily papers as well as the press outside, which we never had before. The Federation is in good financial standing; it has borne nearly all the expenses of the Congress, and still has a balance of $142.51 in the treasury to oppose Sunday, Bible-in-the-schools, and God-in-the-Constitution legislation.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10 for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and list of books inclosed, including "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I was never a believer in the "holy queer," although my father was a deacon in the Presbyterian church, and when a youth I asked questions. I was given to understand that I was a very wicked boy, and still my questions would not be answered. I hav read the Bible a great deal, but the more I read the worse it became, and it took me fifty years to get rid of the superstition that I had inherited from seven generations. My children are all Freethinkers and some of my grand children. T. G. POND.

Puzzled the Lecturer.

TURNER, IND., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please excuse this time, as I am getting old, seventy-eight, and my mind is somewhat impaired. However, I hav to answer and ask some questions just for the fun that we Infidels get out of it. There was a smart Aleck lecturing some coal miners (himself being a miner) on this mythical creation. There was a little lull in the conversation, and I said, "By your leave I would like to ask a question or two." "All right." "What produced the light before there was any sun, moon, or stars, which were not made until the fourth day?" No answer. "On the sixth day the gods created man, male and female, but forgot to make a farmer, and after a while they found they had forgot to make a milk-maid. Then they put them in a garden. Did God know or did he not know that they would partake of the fruit of that tree?" I asked him too many questions; the audience commenced laughing at him. Yours with regard,

JESSE MAURER.

Activ in Kansas.

BENTON, KAN., Oct. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The fall and winter campaign for Freethought was opened here on Sunday, the 21st inst., by two lectures in the afternoon and evening by Chas. C. Millard, of Wichita.

The lecture in the afternoon, on "Illusions; or, Other People's Religion," was historical in character, being a review of the morals of the Dyaks of Borneo, the ancient Greeks, the Mohammedans, and the Spiritualists; showing that all religions are similar in character, and that the morals of a nation or people are in no way dependent upon their religion. It was delivered from manuscript, in a clear and impressiv manner, and showed much care and thought in its preparation.

The evening lecture was on "Equal Suffrage," a subject soon to be decided by ballot in this state. It was a masterly production in favor of equal rights, and was listened to with interest and greeted with applause by a fair-sized audience of ladies and gentlemen. We expect to hav lectures here once a month.

Read With Pleasure and Profit.

HAWTHORN, IA., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am expecting THE TRUTH SEEKER this afternoon and that also reminds me that my subscription will soon expire.

I subscribed for Mr. Bennett's "World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers" before it was in press and I assure you that father and I hav not only read it with interest and pride, but showed it to our friends.

Our Saturday papers are none of them void of interest, because they are kind of Sunday visitors, which are always entertaining.

I think that every Freethinker should assist THE TRUTH SEEKER in some way. If we cannot get new subseribess, then we can subscribe for two years and profit ourselvs as well as the paper.

This, the last day of September, is mild and clear for western skies.

I will acknowledge receipt of "Four Hundred Years" by renewal of subscription. WALTER RUNNELS.

Seed by the Wayside.

LEESBURG, O., Oct. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Your postal of the 14th ult., stating that "we shall be pleased to send the copies to the people you specify," was received, but I was absent at the time of its arrival, hence delay in answering. I inclose you a list of sixty-six names with post-office addresses, made up of indifferents, doubters, and Infidels.

The list may seem quite large, coming, as most of it does, from one locality, but "the woods are full of 'em" if looked up. If you could adopt some plan for obtaining lists of names from all the post-offices in the states, particularly the rural districts, it would largely increase the circulation of your paper. In fact, has not the time arrived to giv more attention to the every-day working people of the land?

I will soon secure contributions for another lot of "Age of Reasons," which will be promptly forwarded. And by the way, no better thing has ever been placed in the hands of the casual reader.

JACOB HILLIARD.

Will Theologians Read This?

ITHACA, N. Y., Sept. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been financially embarrassed so that I had to stop my paper, but I hav commenced again. I wish to ask a few questions through your valuable paper. I wish to hear the answers of all theologians, and if they will giv any satisfactory answers I will turn Christian. 1. Was there ever a time when there was no earth? 2. Was there a being, or beings, that did create the earth? 3. Did that being, or those beings, foreknow what the earth and its inhabitants would do? 4. Did that God, or those gods, know that he or they would hav to hav a devil to lead poor little Eve astray? 5. Is that devil, or are those devils, granted power to persecute the whole world? 6. When he, the Lord, placed those trees in the Garden of Eden did he know, or did he not know, that those poor innocents, tempted by the devil, would partake of the forbidden fruit? 7. Was it necessary to create a devil? 8. Is this God, or are those gods, good to the human family? 9. What did Job do that the Lord should set Satan at him? 10. Did Job hav the same wife and family and flocks that he had when the Lord told him to go and smite them? 11. Was it not a dirty trick on Joseph the husband of Mary? 12. If no person believed in devils how many would go to church? Well, if you print this, I shall hav occupied space enough. With my best regards, I am, the only genuin Infidel in Ithaca,

WM. L. MARSH.

Laughs at Their Wrath.

GARDEAU, PA., Oct. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2.50 to apply on the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, the best journal published. Hard times or not, I must hav it. Long may it liv to fight the battle against superstition and bigotry. It is tiresome (that isn't all), it's irritating, to liv where orthodoxy so abounds as in this place, where there is not a soul to speak to but Christians; where the people think there is no crime so great as unbelief in the so-called holy scriptures. Nonsense, what foolishness! It is too absurd, too ridiculous for a fool to tolerate, much less people who call themselvs civilized. They know not the first rudiments of civilization. "Christian civilization" is debasing, though they claim for it elevation. If my financial means would permit, I should place in the hands of the principal sky-pilots and other bigots in general, works that would set them to thinking. I love to debate with them; they always get angry and use harsh words, also insulting language, and I laugh at them and say, "That is no argument at all, only a little freak of Christian nature." Just God-like is all their wrath; it knows no bound. I am then delighted. They are not apt to try to bring me to the fold of Christ, as they phrase it. They say that I am a hard case to handle. "No use to bother with her. It is a pity a woman over half a century old should reject Jesus."

Yours for liberty,

MRS. E. N. FAIRCHILD.

Nature Is Beautiful, but Priests are Vile.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., Oct. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.50, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I received a copy of this book a few days since, and am very much pleased with it from what I hav read, and want another copy to loan to those who will read it.

This beautiful valley of San Bernardino, where the sun shines on us three hundred days in the year, where nearly all kinds of fruits and vegetables are grown to perfection, where the purest of water flows from hundreds of artesian wells and streams from the snow-capped mountains! On the north, east, and west is located the city of San Bernardino, where intolerance prevails and municipal laws are made to suit the priests. About one year ago our city fathers passed an ordinance for the closing of all business houses, excepting livery stables, undertakers' establishments, and drug stores, the latter not being allowed to sell anything except medicins prescribed by physicians. This was rather hard on the young church people, as they could get no soda water, ice cream, or candy after church hours, so the city fathers were prevailed upon to modify the Sunday closing ordinance, and allow the sale of the above mentioned commodities. But the man who wants a cigar, a little fruit, a drink of wine or beer for the "stomach's sake," must wait until the holy Sabbath is past; or if the traveler wants a shave, or his boots blacked, he cannot get anything of the kind done here on the Lord's day. The result is that people go by rail sixty miles to Los Angeles, where they can get what they want every day in the year. Many hav left this place on account of the radical puritanical laws and priestly rule.

Respectfully yours, WM. MCDONALD.

Interested in the Wise Persecution.

SAMOTH, ILL., Oct. 7, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "The Holy Bible" and "Is Suicide a Sin?"

The supernaturalists, it appears, cannot for an instant entertain the self-evident fact that Christ the man-god curtailed his own career by self-slaughter—that their untenable system of religion is founded upon self-murder. Oh, no! that would be "jumping from the frying-pan into the fire."

I am enlisting more than a passing interest in the prosecution and persecution of our crippled comrade and co-worker, J. B. Wise. Mr. Vennum, who "loves his enemies," calls on the godless government to vindicate himself and God from the irrefutable argument of the irreverent scoffer.

If the Theists convict Mr. Wise, it will prove our point that the Bible should be excluded from the mails, if any book should; if he is acquitted, it will doubtless demonstrate that Comstock censorship has been defeated by their own keen scent for the "indecent." Yes, this case cuts the theologians like a "two-edged sword;" it places them in a precarious position. I am eager to see the outcome.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Vennum and the other "small fry" of "other worldliness" will exercise more discretion before they again endeavor to reënact the horrors of the Inquisition. Furthermore, it will show that the law which incarcerated D. M. Bennett, E. H. Heywood, and Moses Harman for similar acts is a farce.

Freethinkers everywhere, take heart, hold on, we are surely "gaining ground." The citadel of "faith without evidence" is perceptibly crumbling.

The Chicago Times, in an article under the caption of "The Coming Church," says: "It is rarely that the church can be brought to openly confront and honestly discuss from a practical standpoint the social and particularly the industrial problems of the day. Occasionally, however, a preacher of courage, intellect, and wide human sympathy drops his professional platitudes and comforting generalities and tackles the rough, hard knots of conditions as they exist," etc.

Is this not tantamount to the tenets of THE TRUTH SEEKER?

Drinking a toast to your health and happiness, I am still a friend to freedom.

England's Reactionary Clergy.

LONDON, ENG., Oct. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It is somewhat difficult to understand why the bishops of that branch of the civil service misnamed the Church of England should so strenuously oppose marriage with a deceased wife's sister, for no valid reason has been assigned by any of the clergy for their doing so; the absurd argument founded on a disputed passage in their fetish book is worse than childish. If marriages were forbidden to be celebrated before a clergyman, and recognized as in France solely as civil contracts, and legal only if performed before a registrar, their opposition would not be quite so strong, although it would still be exercised, simply because the clergy do not like to lose any hold they hav upon the superstitious laity, and they look upon such a concession as merely the insertion of the thin end of the wedge which would tend to lessen their authority; at the same time, if they had nothing to do with the matter, and would thereby be unable to make any money in the shape of fees as they do at present, the question would not be considered so important to fight about. It is a disgrace to any people, more especially to those who are so frequently bragging of their freedom, and comparing themselvs so favorably with other nations, that they should still be slaves to the clerics, and allow them to exercise any power of legislation, for it is certain that of all men these are least capable of giving an opinion on any subject of interest or welfare of the people. In the towns the paralyzing influence is not so much felt and is comparativly innocuous, but in the villages or hamlets it is a tyrannical power, exercised without mercy, and in many places the peasant is nothing more than a serf of the church.

Emboldened by their victory in this instance, they hav since tried their hand at a further attempt at tyranny, and through their mouthpiece, the bishop of London, introduced a bill into the House of Lords demanding complete control of the liquor trade. It must be admitted that this trade is a pernicious one, and, as it is at present conducted, one of the greatest curses of the country; but if controled by the clergy, it would be even worse than it is now; and so, fortunately, the bill was defeated. It was base ingratitude on the part of the church, because hitherto beer and the Bible hav been closely allied, and the principals hav been sworn friends in demoralizing the masses. It may be that the bishops see that a public-house is such a profitable business that, ever greedy of worldly wealth, they want to secure all the profits of this trade in addition to the millions of which they already rob the country; but the distiller and brewer, although great admirers and supporters of the church as by law established, draw the line here, and do not intend to giv up everything, even to such good friends as the priests. If the bill had been for the purpose of putting an end to adulteration, and making it a penal offense to use any deleterious substitute for pure malt and hops, it would most probably hav met with general support; but this would reduce profits, and no parson could ever entertain such a revolutionary idea as that. An ardent churchman told me that as the church is infallible in its ministers, they ought to be placed in a position that would empower them to govern all public affairs; and I understand this is not a solitary opinion, but firmly believed in by the majority of churchmen. The Protestant church would be quite as intolerant as its Romish mother, and the dissenting sects would be no better; altogether it is a deadly upas tree, this Christian religion, and there will be no millennium until it is extirpated by the common-sense of future generations.

A temporary victory has been secured by the "Lord's Day Observance Society" at Leeds, who hav secured a verdict against the "Sunday Lecture Society" for giving lectures on this most holy day. It was charged against the lecturers that they actually had the audacity to amuse as well as instruct their audiences, and as no one has any right to be aught else but gloomy on this day, a greater crime could not be committed. The whole thing was so ridiculous that the judge, who is not a particularly liberal or enlightened man, could not help saying that in his opinion the prosecution was ill-advised, and likely to do more harm than good; nevertheless, an intelligent jury convicted, though they expressed an opinion that the act of Parliament should be repealed. The case stands over for argument on points of law.

"Time is Standard" but Not Uniformly Productiv.

DELLA, MD., Sept. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to offer some remarks upon J. K. P. Baker's proposition to pension every laborer, to show that the pension system is unjust and wholly unnecessary in a free and natural state of society in which all are given an equal chance in the natural field, or opportunity to labor according to their desires and ability, or at least to maintain themselvs, provided they do not seek to obtain a surplus. The earth and atmosphere surrounding it naturally belong to them, or rather to all that can make use of it, both human and animal, and all hav a right to that which they can enjoy, and you cannot enjoy morally more than you produce, but to hav a variety outside of your own field of production you would desire to produce a surplus (by this is meant surplus over your own needs) and this surplus, which represents labor already performed and not consumed, would enable you to exchange for the variety which you like, or products of others; therefore on an equitable basis of exchange you would enjoy all you could, and would naturally hav all you could enjoy. To illustrate: Suppose I am a planter or agriculturist and produce a surplus, which goes on the natural market; if there is demand for my products they are sold; if no natural demand, placed to my credit, not in dollars and cents, for there was no demand and therefore could be no equitable basis of arriving at values, consequently they were entered as pounds or bushels of thus and so, and stored in a common store-house maintained by a tax upon the products in store, each creditor bearing his pro rata share of the expense of the management of the store-house economically administered. Now then, if all laborers should consume all they produce and a drouth or famin should exhaust the surplus, the managers of the store-house would also hav to labor in the fields to produce in order to liv, but as there is already a great surplus and increased facilities will tend to keep up a surplus in spite of famin and increase in population, all laborers would hav a certain credit in the great store-house, and when they or any one desired to retire from actual labor he would draw on his surplus in the store-house and subsist off that or exchange it for such articles as he wanted in the market. In this way all laborers would produce their own pension and receive such pension as they produced surplus, less cost of storing, and this is the only equitable system of distribution and could not be termed a pension system. Now, if this is sound theory, then the only question at issue at present is our system of exchange, our money system. Certainly it is not possible under the present unjust and inadequate money system. By inadequate I do not mean insufficient money issue, but inadequate because not distributiv or self-circulativ, and instead is accumulativ.

From the standpoint that the only wealth producer is labor and industry (embracing all manner of labor) then to hav an equitable system of exchange we must hav a labor basis of money issue, a labor exchange, where each class of labor would naturally adjust itself; or in other words a time money; that is to say, to reduce it at once to a decimal system, suppose six minutes of time shall constitute a labor unit, then one hour of labor would be ten units and ten hours, an ordinary day's labor, 100 units. Let this be the equivalent of a dollar as at present, but instead of reading, "This certifies that there has been deposited in the treasury of the United States one gold or silver dollar," hav it certify that there hav been rendered one hundred units of labor. Now I do not wish to be misunderstood, and will repeat that if a laborer engages in growing corn, he does not go to the banker and register his day's work in the corn-field or any other field of labor for that matter, but his surplus corn goes on the market at market value if he receives credits, or better, labor unit certificates. The editor brings his products on the same market and receives subscription in labor units; so, too, the surgeon, the mechanic, the poet and musician, and, in fact, every avenue of labor would naturally adjust itself, and industry receive its full reward.

Thus it will be seen that there would be as much money issued as there was wealth or labor produced (real wealth), and it would not be accumulativ but self-circulating, requiring no act of government to make it circulate. Now, to go one step farther, on the Jeffersonian doctrin of government (for defense of property and order), government would hav to be voluntary, supported in the same way as the store-houses, and such voluntary organizations of defense would hav to go on the same market.

The above, I think, will fully meet the gentleman's views, and over-production would not, and does not, even now, under the present rotten money system, inflict more destitution than famin. But there is no labor exchange, and opportunities are monopolized by the few, and our good government by the people for the people and of the people fosters and supports monopoly. Gold and silver are no better commodities than others, and on a natural market of exchange would fluctuate according to supply and demand; thus neither of these metals, nor any other commodity, would furnish a standard for money-issue. Furthermore, if any special commodity is used, why not all commodities for basis of money issue? On the other hand, time is standard and labor the true means of producing wealth. This furnishes an equitable basis and is self-regulating.

Trusting I hav not made my letter too long for publication, I am yours for truth,

CHRISTIAN J. ZEITINGER.

In the Far Northwest.

ST. PAUL, ALASKA, August 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty of writing a short article descriptiv of the country in hopes that it may prove interesting to some of the readers of your paper, providing you deem it fit for publication.

The United States steamship Alert, one of the Bering sea patrol fleet, detailed for the protection of the sealing industries, left Port Townsend, Washington, May 17th last for the North, skirting the coast line and arriving at Unalaska on May 29th.

After leaving Cape Flattery the coast line presents one continuous succession of desolate islands, bleak, rocky cliffs, snow-capped mountains, and extinct volcanoes. Mount St. Elias is generally supposed to be the highest peak in the United States, but surveys made this summer, and just completed by the United States government survey boat Patterson, hav established the fact that Mount Logan, the neighboring peak, is nearly one thousand feet higher, and towering considerably over nineteen thousand feet above the sea level, presents a grand and majestic sight, and it is also a pretty well established fact that Mount Wrangel is still higher, its actual hight being unknown. From Unalaska we went directly to the seal rookeries at Pribylov Islands. About the 10th of July they begin to congregate for breeding purposes, and flock here by thousands. The Pribylov group is composed of the four islands of St. George, St. Paul, Otter, and Walrus, but St. Paul is the principal rookery, over ninety per cent of the seals congregating here. It is estimated that over five millions of them hav been seen here at one time. The Alaska Commercial Company and North American Commercial Company hav the monopoly of the sealing industry. They are limited by the government to taking fifteen thousand per year, and the whole number are taken in about six weeks' time. Wherever a killing is made the nativs go in a body to the rookery, get between the seals and the water and drive them toward the place of slaughter, sometimes nine or ten miles distant. Seals cannot travel more than two or three miles per hour, and even then some of them become exhausted on the way and hav to be killed. Arriving at the place of slaughter they are detached from the main body of seals in groups of twenty or thirty at a time (a drove generally contains from five hundred to fifteen hundred seals or more), and run the gantlet between the nativs ranged on either side. One man stands with a long club, givs them a sharp, quick blow on the head, which is very tender, breaks their skull and kills them; others divest them of their hide, and the others cut the blubber and steaks off them, which they use as food. The object is to get all three-year-old skins if possible, as they are the most valuable. After a seal becomes six years old its skin becomes tough and is practically worthless from a marketable standpoint, therefore the old seals are never molested. The females are also excluded from slaughter. The seals possess Mormon proclivities to a great extent, and one bull seal often has as many as sixty or seventy wives. They leave here about the middle of August, and it has never been ascertained where they go. They hav been followed as far as the lower coast of California, where all trace of them has been lost.

Last May a whaling vessel, the Ethan Allen, with a crew of thirty-nine men, was up here on a sunken reef about one hundred and forty miles from Unalaska. They utilized the small boats and took refuge on the small island of Aknum near; finally two of the men made their way to Unalaska and reported their comrades to be in a starving condition. The United States revenue cutter, Bear, was sent to their rescue. They had experienced some very rough weather, the ship became unmanageable, was blown on the rocks; the crew had to leave the ship, take to the small boats, and make for Aknum island. Their provisions lasted only a short time. There were plenty of fish around the island, but they had no means of catching them. Seven of the party had died of cold, hunger, and exposure, and were buried there, but the unfortunates were finally reduced to such a strait that they dug up one of the dead men and made a meal of him, and they dug up the second, cut him up and put in the kettle, and had him on the fire cooking when they were found and rescued by the Bear and taken to Unalaska, where they were transferred to the steamer Cresent City bound for San Francisco.

The inhabitants are mostly Indians, Russians, and others who depend on the whale, seal, and fishing industries for their sustenance. There are a few Americans who transact all the business, and a few Catholic priests who do all the thieving and roguery, abuse the women and teach the nativs to do likewise. The Holy Roman Catholic church is pretty well represented up here, most of the islands being named after Bible saints. One rock here claims the title of Priest and holds the distinction of being classified as a bishop, and I hav no doubt that if I were to pursue my investigations far enough I might discover Jesus Christ himself hidden away on some of these islands frozen to death and buried under a mountain of snow. This is such a desolate country that it is open to navigation only four months in the year, and from September to June is completely isolated from the outside world. I call this God's country, and my reason for doing so is because it is like everything else in connection with and pertaining to God—no good. Nothing but the whale, seal, walrus, and reindeer will thrive here, and the simple nativ together with the pulpit-pounding, psalm-singing Catholic priest.

Please respond at once and oblige an unregenerate, liberty-loving Infidel of the most pronounced type. F. J. A.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Kansas Sunflowers.

The laughing sunflowers nod in every lane,
And every nook of Kansas is aglow
With luster that eclipses e'en the sun.
They scorn at modesty and proudly gaze
Athwart the hills into the purple dawn,
Until their brilliant rival lifts his head;
Then fix their gaze upon the ether path,
And drink its course until the zenith foils
Their eager watch. Then pausing for a rest,
They turn their faces to the occident,
And watch their rival as he fain retreats
Behind the hills. Then folding up their lids
They slowly drop their heads, and fall asleep
To dream of naught but triumph in their wake.

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

A Kiss for the Baby.

There is a dear little baby girl out in the town of McPherson, Kansas, just about a year old now. We never heard of her until a few days ago, when we received her photograph and the information that her name is Susan Wixon Kubin. Had she been born eight days before, she would hav made her advent into the world on the very day of the very month as her namesake.

Her picture represents the sweetest, dearest, healthiest little face and body imaginable. Her eyes indicate that she is a bright, intelligent little Liberal, and she snuggles down in the warmest place of the Children's Corner, as if she knew that she belongs there. May she liv, grow, thrive, and be a constant joy and blessing wherever she may go.

May health and strength and happiness
Forevermore adorn her;
And may her shadow ne'er be less—
Our baby of the Corner.

ED. C. C.

Ray, aged six years, youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. D. McReynolds, of Litchfield, Ill., died on the 8th of October of croup, after an illness of about one week. Ray was the pet of the household, and a favorit wherever known. Parting with Ray was a sad occasion for the parents, relativs, and friends. Mr. and Mrs. McReynolds are Freethinkers, usually called Infidels, Atheists, etc., and, as the orthodox would say, "without faith and without hope." But hav not these parents, relativs, and friends something better than the average Christian's "faith and hope" to comfort them in these hours of grief? Yes, they know that their loved one livs again, and will always liv in their hearts. They know the little world in which he moved and loved and was loved is better for his life, though brief. Is the Christian's hope and faith any more desirable? Is not this knowledge more satisfactory than the orthodox dream—a faith that no one does, or can, know anything about?

Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Oct. 23, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My little sister, not a great while ago, wrote a little letter to the Children's Corner and that has in a way prompted my writing.

At that time I was a disbeliever in Freethought, although brought up in a family that were purely Freethinkers. I cannot say with truth that I am a Freethinker yet; there are still some things I cannot believe. I really think that in the course of time, if a few things are made clear to me, I may yet be numbered with that honored class.

There is one thing I should like to say here, and that is, that in all my association with Freethinkers, I hav discovered that they are all of the smartest men of the present century.

I still go to Sunday-school, and for that reason I do not like to say anything against them that might ever be repeated. I go, though, for purely social interests, and for the purpose of having good times.

My grandfather is undoubtedly well known to you. I am proud to giv you his name—Lewis G. Reed.

There was a time when I used to be angry with him for telling me things that I now see are truths.

There was a time when I could not bear the name of Freethinker; that, however, is now past. I hav probably made my first letter a little too long. I am not acquainted with any restrictions, and therefore ask pardon. I hav graduated from Grammar School No. 17 this June. I am now a music teacher. I would be pleased, and not at all ashamed, to see this printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope you will kindly do so, and believe me sincerely,

One who is desirous to learn the truth,
LILLIAN G. BOYD, aged fifteen years.

[We advise no one to accept Freethought without investigation. Study its principles, compare them with other and opposit ideas. You will find Freethought a garden of beauty as well as a storehouse of useful knowledge and wisdom. Mr. Reed is one of our most valued correspondents, and we shall be pleased to enroll Lillian among our friends of the Corner. We will be glad to hear from her often. —ED. C. C.]

CROSBY, TEX., Oct. 17, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will attempt to write to the Children's Corner for the first time. Father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I love to read the Children's Corner. I am a Freethinker, and I hav five brothers and one sister; they are all Freethinkers. We are the only Freethinkers there are in this little place, but I think there are some people here who are of the same belief, but are afraid to speak out. I am not afraid of going to that horrid place the Christians talk about. The people around here are afraid of us because we are Freethinkers. I gave a friend of mine a copy of the Freethinkers' Magazine to read and her mother sent me word to not send any more of them there. I guess they were afraid to read it. We hav no church here and I am glad of it. Our school is out and I am sorry, because I get so lonesome. Well, I will close for this time. Hoping this will escape the waste-basket, I remain,

Your friend, BELLE HARVEY.

[Our cause will not suffer in the town of Crosby so long as the Harvey family reside within the limits. We shall be always glad to hear from Belle, or any other member of the Harvey household.—ED. C. C.]

Something
UITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD.
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A Nineteenth Century Novel.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. By the census of 1890, the above is the value of
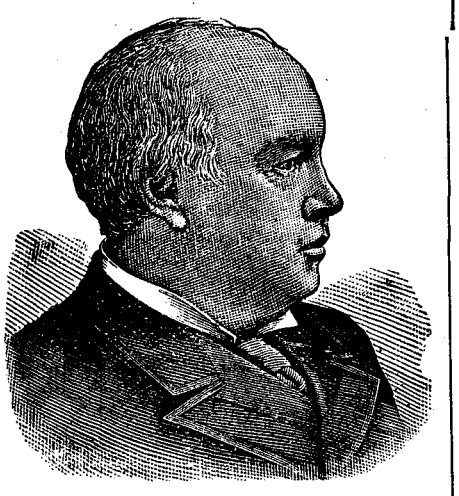
Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.



Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Gems of Thought.

FREEDOM, enlightenment, and well-being for all!—Ludwig Buchner.

SADLY the blast of thy tremendous word,
Whate'er its mystic purport may hav been,
Echoes across the ages, Nazarene;
Not to bring peace mine errand, but a sword. —William Watson.

I FEAR to breathe any treason against the majesty of love which is the genius and god of gifts, and to whom we must not affect to prescribe. Let him giv kingdoms or flower-leaves indifferently. — Ralph Waldo Emerson.

How can one man establish the inspiration of another? How can an inspired man prove that he is inspired? How can he know himself that he is inspired? There is no way to prove the fact of inspiration. The only evidence is the word of some man who could by no possibility know anything of the subject.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

NOT as adventitious therefore will the wise man regard the faith which is in him. The highest truth that he sees he will fearlessly utter; knowing that, let what may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world—knowing that if he can effect the change he aims at—well; if not—well also; though not so well.—Herbert Spencer.

THEY hav stormed the stars with their passion-cry
For hope or mercy or justice here—
Plead that their darlings should never die—
Plead with many a sob and tear.

Folly! for never an answer came,
And never an arrow was turned away;
It sped to its beautiful mark the same,
Whether they prayed or scorned to pray.
—Kenneth Lamar.

BY a moral life, it need scarcely be said, no merely formal conduct is understood, guided by petty conventions and hedged around by narrow restrictions, but that healthy existence, consistent with natural principles and obedient to wise and universal social experience, which has proved itself the best and the happiest for the individual, and most conducive to the comfort and well-being of the race. Such a life is not dependent on any form of religious belief.—The Author of "Supernatural Religion."

Go your own way. From all the parlors and cloisters will come cries of warning. Go your own way. Gather flower and grain. Be these your gift to the social treasury. You can contribute generously when you are big in yourself. To borrow that you may giv puts a lien on your future. All the debts must be paid. Out of your personal private riches you can giv and giv, and never reduce your store. But if you will put yourself in bond that you may play philanthropist, borrower, lender, and receiver are deceived and defeated.—Horace L. Traubel.

WE see that to prepare ourselvs for the duties of paternity and maternity, by making ourselvs as vigorous and healthful as we can be, is a duty we all owe to our children unborn and to one another. We see that to sacrifice ourselvs, and inferentially them, is not a thing good in itself, but rather a thing to be avoided where practicable, and only to be recommended in the last resort as an unsatisfactory means of escape from graver evils. We see that each man and each woman holds his virility and her femininity in trust for humanity, and that to play fast and loose with either, at the bidding of priests or the behest of Puritans, is a bad thing in itself, and is fraught with danger for the state and for future generations.—Grant Allen.

SYMPATHY did not wait to be called into life by religion. It was born among brutes. Cub, whelp, and nestling are nurtured by that parental instinct which constitutes the altruism of the animal world. Sexual attraction reinforces the sentiment already roused into action, and teaches that the normal life is happiest when linked with the life of others. In the case of man the sympathy which issues first through the natural emotions of family and sex is spread over an ever-widening area by the power of imagination. A greater faculty of entering into the feelings of others goes along with a deeper sensitivness to their pains and joys. Their experience becomes ours. Our self is blended with theirs. We pity their actual sufferings, and, calling up in imagination the suffering our conduct might entail, we shrink from committing a wrong. To ease the smart of pity, or, if the phrase please better, to intensify our pleasure, we hasten to relieve a neighbor's grief or add to his happiness. Pity is the characteristic mark of the later ethics.—F. J. Gould.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

Not for Parsons.

MINISTER: "Is your father a religious man, my son?" Small Boy: "Guess so; snarls every time we speak to 'im."—Plain Dealer.

"YES," said the Vermont deacon, "I always go down to the camp meeting, and always come back feeling good. Do you see that magnificent horse in the field? Well. you ought to hav seen the old plug I took down."

A SMALL young curate rebuked a lady, conspicuous for her good deeds among the poor and outcast, with the words: "You're a good woman, but why don't you do some really religious work, such as embroidering an altar cloth?"

A FLORIDA friend writes us to tell the following true story: In one of the smaller towns of that state a lady went into a book store and inquired of the proprietor whether he had the "Heavenly Twins" for sale? He replied: "No, madam; but here is a book of the same general character, entitled 'Stepping Heavenward,' in which I think you will be quite as deeply interested."—Buffalo Commercial.

SHOPKEEPER: "I should like to do more for you, but business is not what it used to be." (Givs a dollar to the parish collector, who then retires.) Friend: "And is trade so very bad?" Shopkeeper: "I didn't say so. On the contrary, it is just booming. I said it was not what it used to be, see? But that's no reason I should giv $5 to the church when I can stand them off with $1."—Boston Transcript.

SHE is only eight years old, this small New Yorker, but nourished in a Freethinking family she has absorbed the Agnostic theories of her elders, has decided opinions of her own; in short, is an out-and-out small Atheist. For some time past she has been much interested in a little companion, a recent acquaintance, but to the surprise of the family, recently she positivly refused to accept a tea-party invitation from the child. Being pressed for an explanation she at last gave it: "Well, I'll tell you why. I just cannot play with her. She's one of those common kind of children who believe in hell."—New York Sun.

THE preacher was having a sort of test meeting by asking the congregation questions on their conduct. "Now, brethren," he said, "all of you who pay your debts will please stand up." In response to this there was an apparently unanimous uprising. "Now," said the preacher, asking the others to sit down, "all those who do not pay will please stand up." One man alone arose. "Ah, brother," said the preacher, "why is it that you, of all this congregation of brethren, should be so different?" "I don't know, parson," he replied slowly, as he looked around over his friends and acquaintances in the meeting, "unless it is that I ain't a liar."—Detroit Free Press.

HEROD MAKIN, a baby farmer, was hanged at Sydney for murdering a dozen or more infants. He wrote a very pious letter to his wife and accomplice, who was reprieved from the capital sentence, expressing a hope to meet her in heaven. The Sydney Bulletin givs a versified version of his letter, from which we clip the following:

Dear Sarah, if still you were keeping the Farm,
The Farm where we used to make hay,
I might hav some dread of your coming to harm
When death took you off and away;
But since you are fixed up in prison for life—
Reprieved by command of the Gov.—
The world, with its strife, cannot get at my wife,
I think you should meet me above—
I will speak to St. Peter, my love.

How pleasant it feels to be "washed in the blood!"
(See 2d Corinthians—Paul),
There is comfort and joy in the sickening thud
With which I shall presently fall.
The judge asked the Lord to hav mercy—you heard
The cant of that gentleman grim.
The judge did—absurd! I am thinking, my word!
I had better be praying for him—
There's no "drop" of salvation for him.
Now, stick to the Bible, my Sarah, and kneel
Until you are sore at the knees;
There's a mansion where sinners can't enter and steal—
Do lay up your treasure there, please.
You've gone from the path that you formerly trod,
So try to be gentle and mild;
The kingdom of God, though it strikes you as odd,
Is just like a dear little child—
A poor little baby-farm child."
—London Freethinker.

SOME weeks since Secretary of the Treasury Carlisle had a young Englishman, John James Howard by name, arrested under the contract labor law. Howard was brought to this country by ex-Vice-President Morton, Republican nominee this year for governor of New York, as under coachman. United States Judge Lacombe held that Howard was illegally arrested, as the contract labor law exempts private servants from its provisions, but he said that only the secretary of the treasury had authority to release the man, as the law put all power of enforcement into the hands of that official. After considerable further delay Mr. Carlisle made a cabinet question of the matter, but that did not result in anything definit, apparently, and after still more delay the prisoner on Ellis Island was released on November 3d. Nearly all the influential Democratic papers of the country condemned the action of the secretary as a contemptible campaign dodge.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Yea

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will gv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promiised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the move ment. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificen work ever issued by the FreethoughtPress.

Christianity in the Orient.

Ex-Secretary of State John W. Foster has been on a trip around the world, and he recently told the Presbytery of Washington about some of the things that he saw and the conclusions that he drew therefrom. He referred to the menace that China, with its 400,000,000 of people, would be to the world if that vast population should be trained in the arts of modern warfare and become possessed of the resources of Western science, "if once inspired with hatred of Christianity." It was, however, he said, the judgment of all travelers in the East "that Christianity would travel in the wake of commerce, steam, and electricity in entering China." Now how is this? Are we not constantly told that Christianity is itself the great civilizer, and that all these marvelous inventions and mighty commercial enterprises which distinguish the present epoch are directly due to the influence of Christianity? Has the child usurped the place of the parent? Cannot Christianity do with the civilized people of the Orient what she is asserted to hav done with the savages of Europe? But is not Mr. Foster too sanguin? Is it at all certain that Christianity will win its way in China, even with the advantage of having steam, electricity, and commerce to pioneer for it? It is doubtful, for even Mr. Foster tells us that in Japan the results hav not been such as the Christian missionaries and their backers had hoped they would be. He says that the marvelous advance in civilization of the latter country has "not been kept pace with by an advance in Christianity," and he repeats the anecdote of the Japanese delegate to the Parliament of Religions, who wrote home that the Parliament was called because Western nations had realized that Christianity was a failure, and were meeting in convention to learn what the best religion was, and also that Buddhism had been found to be the best, and Americans were ready to accept Japan's superior religion. Mr. Foster says that he was in Asia at the time of the Parliament, and that the Hindoo and Mohammedan delegates had similar impressions, and as one of the results are preparing missionary movements for the conversion of the Americans. This cannot fail to hav a good effect, for it will help to bring home to the consciousness of thoughtful Christians the foolishness of most of the missionary work. The ex-cabinet minister added that the Parliament was disheartening to missionaries abroad. Undoubtedly, for it was an indirect but none the less effectiv assault on the dogma of exclusiv salvation.

Is Morality in Itself a "Quixotic Weakness"?

Continuing his argument for supernaturalism as the only adequate basis for a moral life, Rev. Alfred Momerie says in the Agnostic Annual:

"It may be objected that he who truly loves goodness loves it for its own sake, and that he neither seeks nor needs reward. But if in the end the wages of virtue is to be dust, you can never prove its reasonableness, you can never prove that it ought to be the supreme aim of life. If goodness be doomed to annihilation, it loses all its charm, and devotion to it becomes unreasonable—an amiable but quixotic weakness."

How can this be true if the experience of the race demonstrates that respect for the reasonable wishes of our fellows is conduciv to the gratification of our own reasonable wishes? And it is certain that the experience of the race does demonstrate that truth. Out of human experiments and suffering hav come all the moral codes of all the ages. Man found that certain actions were, so far as he could see, injurious to him, while other actions were beneficial to him. But all men did not see that this was so, and therefore those who did tried, as men do to-day, to force their fellows to accept their view and liv in accordance therewith, and for that view they invoked supernatural sanctions. As Max Müller says, they stopped all disputes over mooted points by declaring, "This is divine truth, given to us by immediate revelation of the deity." But that which they called the truth did not come from the skies; it was the child of human weakness and strength; it was a growth, a development of a better from that which was not so good, and in its turn it gave way to make room for that which was still better. And this evolution of ethics continues through all the centuries of man's existence; there are, or should be, constant revisions of the ethical code, for the race is ever adding something to its store of knowledge; the fundamental principles of honesty, honor, truth, mercy, justice, equity, are not likely to be superseded, but we hav an infinit lesson to learn regarding the actions which are and those which are not in harmony with these fundamental principles. From our point of view it does not seem at all necessary to take into account the existence of a God or the continuation of our personal life after these bodies hav run their course. The scientist in his experiments operates with and upon the forces and material of what we call nature, and no theory about a God will help him in the least, while, as we all well know, the belief in a God has been one of the most potent of the influences which hav confused and hindered the investigator of natural phenomena, and to-day that harmful influence is painfully felt in the domain of ethics and sociology.

Whatever may be the facts regarding our consciousness after the change that is denominated death, it is very certain that we hav all that we can do to attend to the duties of this world while "it is called day" with us, and so need not worry about the "wages of virtue" after we hav closed our eyes in dreamless sleep. It is sufficient that we know we are happier and more secure and that those we love and leave behind us will be happier and more secure if we take good care of our physical health and respect the property, liberty, and life of our neighbor, as we would hav our own respected. There is not, in our estimation, anything which is more easily demonstrated than the reasonableness of an honorable life, wholly regardless of its effect upon a possible future existence, and we hold it to be one of the most grave objections to Christianity and Theism that they induce in the minds of such men as Professor Momerie a feeling of hopeless pessimism regarding the moral nature of man when unbuttressed by belief in the dogmas of supernaturalism.

Why should "goodness lose all its charm" if doomed to annihilation when manifested by some particular organism? Is the rose bereft of present beauty because it perishes in a day? Is the chiseled marble form hideous because it will at some future time yield to the erosion of the elements? Is the shelter hateful because it cannot always endure? Do thick garments fail to keep out the cold in winter because they are not indestructible? Similarly, is the kind word made unkind by the fact that the one to whom it is spoken may not liv in another world? Is immurement in a prison cell desirable because the sunshine will not forever, so far as we know, reveal to us a landscape of green or crimson and the ocean beating on sandy beach and rocky headland? What do we confess ourselvs to be if we can say that we should delight in the robbery, in the torture, in the slaughter of our fellow creatures if we did not think that we should liv in another sphere? It so happens, however, that those whose especial joy or whose self-assumed duty it was to despoil, mutilate, and kill those who did not agree with them in belief, or who had the misfortune to liv in another country or to be of another race, were almost without exception believers in one or more gods and had a "sure hope" of immortality, and among those wholesale murderers none were more cruel than the Christians. What will Professor Momerie do with this indisputable fact? Those bloody destroyers did not think that the "wages of virtue is to be dust," but their abundant faith absolutely failed to make them lead moral lives. In this connection it will be well to quote a few more sentences from Dr. Momerie's article:

"It seems to me that the last word on this subject was said ages ago by the author of Ecclesiastes. He did not believe in immortality, and therefore he was a pessimist and a sensualist. By all the laws of logic the three things are inextricably bound together."

It is to be presumed that the author of Ecclesiastes is called a pessimist and a sensualist because he looked out on existence with open eyes, and did not care to stultify himself and deny the truth by vociferously proclaiming this to be the best possible of worlds. Unfortunately for Professor Momerie's contention, he did not, although a believer in the mortality of man, think that there was no inducement to liv amicably with his neighbors, for he says that there is no good "but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life," which seems to hav been a common sense conclusion, and one which it would be well for us all to reach. As to the "sensuality" which is said to be the logical product of doubt concerning or rejection of the belief in immortality, it is necessary to remark that the word is a very elastic one, capable of covering either a multitude of sins or a multitude of virtues. Neither should we be afraid of the word "pessimist"; generally speaking, Freethinkers are not pessimists; they do not think that this is the worst possible of worlds; it certainly is not the best possible world, but it is an improvable world, and as such they regard it, and are earnest in their determination to take advantage of the opportunity to make it better, for it is the only home of which the majority of them hav any knowledge, and they believe in making the most of the present chance to be comfortable, if not happy. So does Professor Momerie, and probably he would not change in that respect, even if he should become a Freethinker, but things would then appear vastly different to him. However, let us listen to some more of his lamentations:

"If there be no future life, then everything is in the last resort vanity. And if everything be vanity, there is but one pursuit that will bear serious investigation, and that is the pursuit of pleasure. We hav been dragged out of nothingness, and made to endure the heartache and the thousand natural ills that flesh is heir to, only to be hurled back into nothingness at the last. We may hav struggled bravely to liv a useful, heroic life, to help on the progress of the world; but the object for which we hav worked we shall never see. Long ere that we shall hav been "cast as rubbish to the void." And those for whom we labored were not worth the effort. They, too, are ephemeral and contemptible. They, too, will shortly be flung into the same bottomless abyss. In such a universe the man who tries to act morally is a fool."

And these are the empty husks that are offered us as the rich harvest following nineteen centuries of Christian and fifty thousand years, say, of Theistic cultivation of the human mind! It is a pitiful exhibit. Reasoning by analogy, Dr. Momerie will do nothing for his children's material comfort and prosperity because they must die sooner or later. And he would let them plunge into crime and vice without extending a restraining hand if he believed that "death ends all"! Well, it is extremely fortunate that, having been so poisoned in his moral nature by the deadly drugs of religion, he does not lose his faith in God and immortality. For those who find no inward satisfaction in a loving, peaceful and honorable life there must needs be the restraining influence of superstition or the civil law.

Last week we quoted Dr. Momerie's admission that there are those who, wholly lacking his faith in God and a future of bliss, yet "liv noble, useful, self-denying lives," but now he declares that men who so liv in a world such as they believe this to be are fools. Really, they should thank him heartily for the left-handed compliment he tosses to them before he proceeds to brand them as imbecils for making the best they can of the world in which they find themselvs through no choice of their own.

We are told that because we may not always be cognizant of the world whose progress we hav helped on there is no reason why we should take any interest in progress of any kind. An architect might say with equal unreason that as he could not liv as long as the cathedral would endure he would hav nothing more to do with his profession—he would make no more designs, and would henceforth subsist on charity and die a pauper. So might the sculptor refuse to longer devote himself to his art, saying that as the statue would outlast him for perhaps hundreds or thousands of years there could be no possible reason why he should not starve to death at once; that the man was a fool who wasted time creating things of beauty which might survive their artificer.

The Christian has never failed to argue as though pleasure were to be found always in "sin," and virtue were the most painful of actions or conditions. This is confusing, misleading, and demoralizing, and the mistake has its source in the assumption that only self-denial is moral. Self-denial is in itself neither moral nor immoral. It all depends upon conditions. There is no more effectiv way in which to discourage right living than that adopted by the Christian moralist. The next quotation from Professor Momerie illustrates what we mean:

"Pleasure is always pleasurable more or less. But the struggle for perfection is painful and, in this life at any rate, unsuccessful. To sacrifice pleasure for character—apart from immortality—would be to giv up the certain for the uncertain, the real for the chimerical, the possible for the impossible. The art of life is to be in harmony with one's environment. But if there be no immortality, the universe is rotten to the core, and therefore devotion to goodness is the crowning folly of the race."

If the god who Dr. Momerie imagins made this world has charge of conditions in the world which the minister thinks will complement this, what right hav we to take it for granted that there will be any better chance for ethical culture in that world than there is in this, where, as we are told, the struggle for perfection is painful and unsuccessful? Taking this common sense view of the matter, does the belief in continued existence and in God make the outlook much more hopeful for moral development and happiness? And will the struggle for moral improvement continue to be the cause of suffering while the pursuit of wicked pleasures is productiv of happiness? If the pursuit of virtue in this world for use and enjoyment in this world is "uncertain" and "chimerical," and its attainment impossible, as Professor Momerie asserts, then the God who made this world is infinitly lower in the scale of ethical excellence than are thousands of the men and women who inhabit the planet. But it is not true that it is more painful to be merciful, loving, and just than it is to be cruel, to hate, and to be unjust. That is, it is not so for some, and the number of these is constantly increasing as theology loses its hold on the mind and emotions of the human family. Finally, if man must be immortal in order to make the universe moral, no less must all other forms of life be immortal, for all nature is stained with blood, and the suffering of our relativs calls as loudly for "compensation" as does our own.

After all that has been said in this connection, it will not be amiss to remind Professor Momerie that character has nothing to do with a man's chances to get to heaven. It is a question of belief, not of conduct. As Professor Büchner well says in the article which immediately follows Professor Momerie's:

"The Bible tells us distinctly that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over a thousand righteous who need no repentance. Whosoever believes this doctrin, be he honest or rogue, will receive salvation. Jesus himself assured the thief upon the cross that for having believed upon him he would that very night join him in Paradise. Mere belief givs more assurance of Paradise than an entirely moral life if it hav not been accompanied by such belief."

Warm Praise for a Great Work.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought" has received a most cordial welcome from those who hav had an opportunity to examin it, but its author is no doubt particularly proud of the four earnest commendations which follow. The first was written by

THE GREATEST ORATOR OF THIS GENERATION.

NEW YORK, Nov. 4, 1894.

DEAR PUTNAM: Well, I hav read the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is a book that every Freethinker ought to hav, and that every child of superstition ought to read. Every clergyman should study its pages, so that hereafter he can tell the truth about the mental pioneers of our race.

I forgiv you for having given me too great credit, for having multiplied and exaggerated my virtues and ignored my defects.

The book is written with great clearness—with great force and beauty. Many of the pages are poems, and these poems are filled with philosophy. Every line is warm, alive, and throbbing with enthusiasm—with love for the right and for man.

You hav done a great service to a sacred cause, and I thank you with all my heart.

Yours always, R G. INGERSOLL.

The second is from a review in

THE OLDEST FREETHOUGHT PAPER IN THE WORLD.

This long-promised book of nearly 1,000 pages is already in the hands of those who hav subscribed for it, and undoubtedly they will agree with us that it is a great book in more respects than one. When one glances at the vast amount of information contained in the eight hundred and seventy-four pages between the covers of the book he will realize that Mr. Putnam set for himself an herculean task and will not wonder at the delay which attended its production. "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is a valuable acquisition to Freethought literature. The subject matter is presented in Mr. Putnam's most fascinating style and covers the history of the Freethought movement from Columbus to the present day. As a book of reference it is invaluable and it should be in the hands of every Liberal who wishes to hav in concise form matter available for the warfare against the church. It is an interesting book, ever new, a book that Mr. Putnam and the publishers, the New York Truth Seeker Company, may well be proud of. —Boston Investigator.

IT HAS THE BREATH OF LIFE IN ITS WORDS.

BEAR CITY, ARK., Nov. 7, 1894.

E. M. MACDONALD: I hav read all of Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and placed it permanently in my library as a book of reference. It is complete and comprehensiv. I was sure Brother Putnam would giv us a good book, but he has far exceeded my expectations. It would be difficult to get more or better matter in one thousand pages; and when we consider the short time occupied in preparing it, it appears to be what Christians would call a miracle.

The portraits make a noble gallery, while the language is terse and eloquent. The words hav the breath of life in them. May it run into numberless editions. Yours for Freethhought,

JNO. Q. CARTER.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S VIEW OF IT.

LONDON, ENG., Oct. 31, 1894.

DEAR PUTNAM: I hav received your book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and am delighted with its contents. It is an excellent production—your masterpiece—and reflects great credit upon your industry and mental power. I hav already sold twelve copies and ordered more. Depend upon my doing my best to make it known in this country. It is a library in itself, containing more information about the Freethought movement than is to be found in any other one work. The "get up" of the book is also very good. CHARLES WATTS.

Samuel P. Putnam last week shed the cheerful sunshine of his smiles upon the Gothamites, after several months of absence. He was hard at work, as usual, and is ready for lecture engagements anywhere.

President Cleveland has issued the customary unconstitutional Thanksgiving proclamation. It is a humorous production of the labored sort that is popularly supposed to be the most dear and cherished weakness of our transatlantic relativs. Mr. Cleveland takes occasion to remark that "the American people should render thanksgiving and praise to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe [capitals his], who has watched over them with kindness and fostering care during the year that has passed." It was wisdom in the chief magistrate to issue that proclamation before the election was held; we do not believe that he would write it now.

Referring to the case of Joshua S. Helmer, the late president of the Merchants' bank of Lockport, New York, who was convicted of embezzlement, the Niagara Falls Cataract agrees with THE TRUTH SEEKER that "'the glory of God' is best conserved by being honest, rather than by suffering because of dishonesty." It will be remembered that it was announced by Helmer's family that he and his wife had spent the day before sentence was passed in prayer, and that they had reached the conclusion that "it was all for the best; that the Lord had summoned Joshua to go to prison for his glory." The implication was that God had instigated the crime which opened the way to the penitentiary, else Helmer could not hav gone there for the deity's glory.

Among the other "blessings" for which we are to be officially thankful are "the harvests that hav rewarded our husbandry," Let us see how this is: If the harvests hav "rewarded our husbandry" it is fairly to be presumed that the harvests are the results of the husbandry, and hence that we ourselvs are the ones to thank therefor. What is the average yield per acre of the wheat and corn that the "Supreme Ruler" cultivates without man's help? While we are examining this problem it may not be impertinent to ask the president what those farmers hav to be thankful for whose husbandry has not been rewarded with any harvest? Those, to illustrate, who hav toiled early and late only to see the fruits of their labor and the bread of their children cut to pieces by God's hail, or swept away by God's cyclones, or burnt up by God's drouths, and forest and prairie fires, or borne away to the sea by God's floods, or devoured by God's bugs and worms?

In a religious disquisition which he gave out for publication a short time ago the present occupant of the White House expressed the opinion that "surely He who has given us comfort and plenty will look upon our ministrations of charity as the work of hearts truly grateful, and as proofs of the sincerity of our thanksgiving." That has a soothing sound, but it does not enlighten us as to the cause of God's partiality. Mr. Cleveland should make an attempt to tell us why God, in his "power and goodness," made such a distinction between his children—why he gave "us" "comfort and plenty" and left others "destitute." "Surely," if he gave "us" what we hav he must hav withheld it from the "poor and needy" of whom the president speaks, and so left them destitute, or else endowed "us" with a better equipment of muscles and brains with which to acquire "comfort and plenty." In either case he has shown himself to be anything but an impartial "all-father."

Following the "whereas" of President Cleveland's Thanksgiving proclamation comes this paragraph:

"Therefore I, Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday, the twenty-ninth day of November instant, as a day of Thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed by all the people of the land."

Is this a recommendation or a command? As a private citizen Grover Cleveland may without offense commend to his fellow-countrymen the observance of a day in thanksgiving and prayer, but as such he has no authority to command them to engage in these or any other religious exercises, while as an officer of the government he has the right neither to command nor to recommend them to giv thanks or to pray. "To be kept and observed by all the people of the land"! Will Dr. McAllister tell us how he interprets that? Must we obey? And how will it be when the National Reformers hav got God, and Jesus, and the Bible into the Constitution? Will it then be may or must?

Some of the proprietors of New York barber shops are engineering a movement to secure from the city council an ordinance closing all barber shops on Sunday after 1 P. M. It does not seem to hav entered their heads that they do not need an ordinance to enable them or any of them to close their doors at any hour they choose. There is no valid reason, no reason which is good in any ethical sense, why those who do not want to close should be compelled to close by those who personally want to shut up shop. The president of this new association is John E. Knierim, 939 First avenue, and the secretary is George Koernig, 1030 First avenue. The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write to the officers named and present to them the secular position regarding Sunday legislation. Show them in addition that if the law can rightfully prescribe the hours when they shall not work it can just as readily prescribe the hours when they shall work. In either case, the intervention of the law is the recognition of the principle of chattel slavery.

The Friends, who are among the recipients of government money for the support of Indian schools, admit that there is likely to be an end put to the business, a committee appointed at the last yearly meeting at Baltimore reporting as follows:

"There has been a disposition on the part of the Indian bureau to discourage the further extension, if not to abolish the government contract school system. Under the system the schools established by different churches are assisted by government aid. Congress having appropriated $1,025,000 for the education of the Indian children, a large part of this amount is paid to denominational schools, the government allowing $167 for each child per annum in these institutions. The Roman Catholics, having more schools than any other denomination, received a larger share of this sum, and this has caused some feeling among the Protestant churches and may lead to a withdrawal of government aid from all denominational schools."

This shows how the Catholics came to get the lion's share of the appropriations, and the probable outcome of the quarrel illustrates anew the truth of the adage that when the despoilers of the people fall out among themselvs justice has a chance to come into its heritage.

In an article in Kate Field's Washington, V. T. Rann tells some stories about "The Dead Czar" and his family. Among the rest we find an account of the railroad wreck in which the Czar and the royal household were "miraculously" saved. The little Grand Duchess Olga and her English nurse were thrown down an embankment. The nurse let go of the child, "who jumped up and ran wildly toward the first opening that offered itself, screaming, 'Don't kill me, good God! Don't kill me, good God!'" The nurse called her back, and then she saw that her father and mother and her brothers and sisters were all safe. Flinging her arms about the neck of the nurse, she cried, "How I would like to throw my arms around God's neck and kiss him for saving us all!" The conception of God as a man with a neck and other human parts was perfectly natural to a child trained in the schools of superstition, but did it not occur to the teller of the story that the god that the little girl wanted to kiss for saving the lives of herself and those she loved, as she thought he had done, was the same god who put them in such deadly peril? He had merely saved them from himself. We may ask, even if the Grand Duchess Olga did not, why he murdered the twenty-five or more people who were mangled and killed while the autocrat and his family escaped.

Two weeks ago the Pennsylvania Sabbath Association held a glorification meeting at Williamsport in honor of the Pennsylvania Sunday law of 1794. The first fruit of this celebration of the survival of barbarism is a new Sunday ordinance adopted by the invertebrate city fathers of Williamsport. It forbids the selling of anything on Sunday except bread, milk, and medicins and also lays a fine upon the owner of any shop, store, or other place of business, who permits persons to congregate therein on Sunday. This law is more severe than the old (1794) statute, which permitted the sale not only of milk but "of the necessities of life" before nine in the morning and after five in the afternoon. The penalty is raised from four to ten dollars. The prohibition of the gathering of a merchant's friends in the store is a new twist of the thumbscrew. The American Sentinel sarcastically remarks that the people of Williamsport are still "permitted to congregate in the churches on Sunday and drop their coin into the collection-box for the payment of the preacher." Of course; that is the industry that Sunday laws are enacted to stimulate. One of the editors of the Adventist paper above named delivered two addresses in the court house at Williamsport on the Sunday and Monday evenings preceding the convention on various aspects of Sunday legislation, and the Adventist church circulated fifty-two thousand pages of Sunday liberty literature and also one thousand copies of the American Sentinel. The Pennsylvania Sabbatarians are trying to get the penalty under the state law raised to twenty five dollars. The Freethinkers of that state should be represented at Harrisburg during the session of the legislature.

The legislativ season will soon be here. Congress and the law-making bodies of the states will get to work, and then will be the opportunity for the political Christians. During the next six months these meddlers will be more activ than ever before. We want each of our readers to consitute him- or herself a committee of one to keep watch of the enemies of the secular state. Report to us immediately every movement of the theocrats. Look out for new Sunday laws and attempts to more rigorously enforce old ones; watch for appropriations to the church and to institutions under the control of the church; gather all the facts that you can in relation to the exemption of church property from taxation; be vigilant in regard to religious teaching in the schools; note what is said and done about the employment and payment of chaplains; do not fail to keep informed and to inform us as to the attacks which the anti-naturalists are sure to make on the agencies of expression and transmission. Do not assume that the Editor will find out all about these things through the daily papers; there are hundreds of those journals, and there are only seven days in the week; something of vital importance to our cause may escape his eye and yours may catch it in the nick of time; it will be better for him to hav his attention called to it several times than not to see it all. So send along the items. In this connection we will request all the members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps and all others who will now engage to write one letter each week to the target selected by the Captain to send us their names and addresses, not for publication, but that we may know how many there are, and so be better enabled to direct their activities. Let us make the coming year memorable in the annals of Secularism.

The Liberal Club.

The bright lights of the German Masonic hall at 220 East Fifteenth street, last Friday evening, put a gilt edge on the largest and handsomest audience that has attended any meeting of the Liberal Club this year. Not only were all the chairs filled with manly proportions and female loveliness, but campstools were elicited from their retirement, to be tested suspiciously and diffidently sat upon by late comers. Mrs. Beckwith, vice-president, had the club on her hands on this occasion and presided with aplomb, provided the same be not too austere a word. The lecturer of the evening was Samuel P. Putnam, who discoursed about "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought."

When the preliminaries had been attended to Mrs. Beckwith kindly presented the speaker to the audience and rang the jingle bell, as it were. Spiritualism, said Mr. Putnam, offers a series of phenomena to the world, and solicits an explanation for the same. In order to clear the ground for close work he would dismiss the most of these phenomena as fraudulent. The series might be further reduced by throwing out the large portion referable to delusion, while aberration of mind would also account for a great deal of the belief in spirits. As for the residuum, Mr. Putnam felt under no obligation to deal with it, but he rejected the spiritualistic inference that the phenomena were produced by intelligences which once controled individuals now deceased, for the reason that the cause assigned was unnecessarily immense as compared with the effect. It was a canon of logic, called the law of parsimony, he said, that in assuming a cause for any phenomenon we are not to assert one greater than is required to produce it. The spiritual theory presupposes a world of disembodied people millions of times more numerous than the inhabitants of the earth. All this to account for the scratching of a pencil on a slate, a few raps on a table, the thrumming of a guitar, or the appearance of human forms in the part of a darkened room where nobody was supposed to be located at the time. He held that the phenomena were insignificant as compared not only with what should be expected from so extensiv a spirit world, but also as compared with the phenomena of this lesser physical world. Another canon of logic instanced by Mr. Putnam as one violated by the spiritual hypothesis is that which forbids us to assign an unknown cause until known causes hav been shown to be unequal to producing the effect He contended that for aught proved to the contrary the human mind contained the powers and potencies necessary to the production of all alleged spirit phenomena.

Still, in spite of their shortcomings, Mr. Putnam held that Spiritualists were essentially Freethought people. The phenomena were but the shell of the philosophy; in themselvs were not new or unique and added nothing to human knowledge or belief, since spirit mythology is as old as the race. The value of modern Spiritualism is in its philosophy of the unity of all life, personal responsibility as opposed to vicarious atonement, and eternal hope and progress as against the orthodox dogma of despair and the arrest of development at death. If there was another life the speaker believed it would be subject to the same law of progress that obtains in this.

Taking up Theosophy Mr. Putnam gave the gist of its doctrin, in which he took no stock; but as its philosophy affirmed evolution, the supremacy of reason, and the brotherhood of the race, he claimed that Theosophists belonged in the secular ranks.

The third division of the lecturer's subject comprised an exposition of Freethought in three aspects. Political Freethought is expressed in the Demands of Liberalism. Secondly, the articles of its creed, if it has any, are the facts of science. In place of the deity he would put humanity as an object of solicitude and affection. Here he introduced very effectivly the poem about Abou Ben Adhem.

At the close of the lecture there was applause and a collection, both quite generous, and then the critics supervened. Mr. Wakeman was not complimentary to Spiritualism, and Wilson McDonald was not flattering toward Mr. Wakeman, and other speakers' contributions to the debate were more an exposition of their own views than a criticism of what the lecturer had said; all which made it easy for Mr. Putnam in his closing remarks.

The Religion of Buddha.*

Buddhism, the most widely spread of all religions, was founded by a Freethinker. His name was Gautama Siddhârtha and he claimed to be Buddha, the enlightened one, the teacher of gods and men who had found the way of salvation. But his religion is different from other religions in so far as it has no dogmas, but enjoins its devotees to rely upon themselvs and hav no other guide than the truth. "Hold fast to the truth as to a lamp" were the significant words of Buddha in his farewell address to his disciples before he died. He bowed to no authority, and set up no creed, no dogma. He denied the divine inspiration of the Vedas, refused to recognize castes, rejected rituals as irrelevant, denounced sacrifices as inhuman, ridiculed prayer as useless, disdained to worship Brahma, exposed the fallacies of the belief in the creation of the world by a good Lord, and also in the existence of a soul entity. In a word, he opposed all the favorit notions of Brahmanism, the religion of his time. And yet he was not an irreligious man. On the contrary, he was a deeply religious man, certainly more religious than any of the priests who denounced him as irreverent. Such was the influence of his powerful personality that his disciples spread his doctrin over all Asia, and his religion has even in its aberrations preserved the moral earnestness of its founder.

The life of Gautama Siddhârtha was adorned with legends which bear a remarkable similarity to the accounts of the life of Jesus in the gospels. Buddha, like Christ, was of royal, not of priestly, lineage, and his life, while he was still a babe, was jeoparded by King Bimbisara in the same way that the infant Jesus' was by Herod on account of the transcendent glory of his future. Buddha, like Christ, led a life of poverty. He wandered about without a home, without family, without property. Both Buddha and Christ lived like the lilies of the field and preached to all people, to rich and poor alike, without distinction of class, the deliverance from evil. Both Buddha and Christ were hailed soon after their birth as the saviors of the world by celestial spirits, by a religious prophet, and by sages. Devas, like the angels in the Christian gospels, sang hymns. Asita is the Christian Simeon, the Naga-rajas are the Magi.

The apocryphal gospel of pseudo-Matthew contains a passage in which we are told that "when the most blessed Mary with her little infant had entered one of the temples in Egypt, all the idols fell prostrate on the earth." The same story is told in the Thibetan Life of Buddha. The king, his father, took the child to the temple, but the Yaksha gods bowed down at his feet. When the king saw the Yaksha gods bow down at the child's feet he said, "He is the God of gods," and the child was called Devadatta-deva.

Both Buddha and Christ excelled their teachers. Both were tempted by the Evil One. Both professed it to be their mission to establish on earth a kingdom of righteousness. Buddha sent out his disciples to preach the gospel, and he spoke as follows: "Go ye now, O disciples, and wander, for the gain of the many, for the welfare of the many, out of compassion for the world, for the good, for the gain, and for the welfare of gods and men. Let no two of you go the same way. Preach, O disciples, the doctrin which is glorious in the beginning, glorious in the middle, glorious in the end, in the spirit and in the letter; proclaim a consummate, perfect, and pure life of holiness. There are beings whose mental eyes are covered by scarcely any dust, but if the doctrin is not preached to them they cannot attain salvation. They will understand the doctrin. And I will go also, O disciples, to Uruvela, in order to preach the doctrin."

Both Buddha and Christ "walked on the water." Both attended a marriage feast and helped the host by a miracle to entertain his guests. In Buddha's presence, as we are told in the story of the marriage feast at Jambunada, a small supply of food proves over and over sufficient for a great number of guests. The idea of turning water into wine at the marriage feast at Cana is un-Buddhistic. Both Buddha and Christ tried asceticism for a time and carried their fasts to the extreme, but both abandoned self-mortification for a middle way, and were in consequence of it suspected, by former believers, of flagging in their religious zeal. (See Luke vii, 19, and Matthew ix, 3.)

Both Buddha and Christ were powerful preachers, and fond of parables, concentrating their teachings in pithy aphorisms, which were both impressiv and easily remembered. Both were keen thinkers and invincible in controversies, as a rule bringing the debate to a climax by presenting a dilemma, and always pressing the moral application of their theories. Both exercised an extraordinary influence; they looked into the hearts of men and swayed their minds through purity of motiv and the authoritativ earnestness of their personality. Both objected to the traditional method of clinging to the letter of religious belief which is satisfied with rituals and prayers, and both substituted for it the spirit of religious devotion and moral conduct. Both loved to express their sentiments in paradoxes such as "By giving away we gain; by losing our soul we preserve it; by non-resistance we conquer." Both spoke in parables, and many subjects of their parables are the same; as such we mention the sower and the lost son; the worldly fool who builds a large residence with store-rooms, but dies suddenly; the comparison of good deeds to seeds sown on good and bad soil, according to the nature of the people, illustrating the truth that in bad people the passions choke the growth of merit. Buddha calls the Brahmans, and Christ the Pharisees, "blind leaders of the blind."

Both Buddha and Christ show an unexpected graciousness toward a woman sinner, and a Buddhist disciple had an encounter with a woman at a well analogous to that of Christ in Samaria.

Both Buddha and Christ were, like Krishna, transfigured shortly before death, and above all, both inculcated the utter extinction of desire, lust, and hate in their very germ, so as to forbid all assertion of self, even the resistance of evil, and both demand the practice of love of enemies.

Remarkable as these parallels are, they by no means exhaust the subject; and the similarities are the more striking, as among the dissimilarities there are two which exhihibit an irreconcilable contrast. This contrast, which is well known to Buddhists themselvs, touches the two most vital points of religious belief—the idea of a personal God-Creator and the conception of an individual soul-entity as a separate being, a thing in itself independent of the body. We read in Charles D. B. Mills' book, "Buddha and Buddhism," p. 76:

> The regent of Lhassa declared perpetually to the Catholic missionaries Huc and Gabet, as they tell us, "Your religion is like our own, the truths are the same; we differ only in the explanation [exposition]. Amid all that you hav seen and heard in Tartary and Thibet you must hav found much to condemn; but you are to remember that many errors and superstitions that you hav observed hav been introduced by ignorant Lamas, but are rejected by intelligent Buddhists." He admitted between us and himself only two points where there was disagreement—the origin of the world and the transmigrations of souls. "Let us examin them both together," said he to them again, "with care and sincerity; if yours is the best we will accept it; how could we refuse you? If, on the other hand, ours is best, I doubt not that you will be alike reasonable, and follow that."

Concerning Buddha's Atheism the following passage quoted from Max Muller's essay on "Buddhist Nihilism" is instructiv. Max Muller says:

> As to Atheism, it cannot be denied that, if we call the old gods of the Veda—Indra, and Agni, and Yama—gods, Buddha was an Atheist. He does not believe in the divinity of these deities. What is noteworthy is that he does not by any means deny their bare existence, just as little as St. Augustine and other fathers of the church endeavored to sublimize or entirely explain away the existence of the Olympian deities. The founder of Buddhism treats the old gods as superhuman beings, and promises the believers that they shall after death be reborn into the world of the gods, and shall enjoy divine bliss with the gods. Similarly he threatens the wicked that after death they shall meet with their punishment in the subterranean abodes and hells, where Asuras, Sarpas, Nagas, and other evil spirits dwell, beings whose existence was more firmly rooted in the popular belief and language than that even the founder of a new religion could hav dared to reason them away. But, although Buddha assigned to these mediatized gods and devils, palaces, gardens, and a court—not second to their former ones—yet he deprived them of all their sovereign rights. Although, according to Buddha, the worlds of the gods last for millions of years, they must perish, at the end of every Kalpa, with the gods and with the spirits who in the circle of births hav raised themselvs to the world of the gods. Indeed, the reorganization of the spirit world goes further still. Already, before Buddha, the Brahmans had surmounted the low standpoint of mythological polytheism, and supplanted it by the idea of the Brahma as the absolute divine or super-divine power. What, then, does Buddha decree? To this Brahma also he assigns a place in his universe. Over and above the world of the gods with its six paradises, he heaps up sixteen Brahma worlds, not to be attained through virtue and piety only, but through inner contemplation, through knowledge and enlightenment. The dwellers in these worlds are already purely spiritualized beings without body, without weight, without desire, far above men and gods. Indeed the Buddhist architect rises to a still more towering hight, heaping upon the Brahma world four still higher worlds, which he calls the world of the formless. All these worlds are open to man, and the beings ascend and descend in the circle of time, according to the works they hav performed, according to the truths they hav recognized. But in all these worlds the law of change obtains; in none is there exemption from birth, age, and death. The world of the gods will perish like that of men, even the world of the formless will not last forever, but the Buddha, the enlightened and truly free, stands higher, and will not be affected or disturbed by the collapse of the universe: Si fractus illabatur orbis impavidum ferient ruinæ.

Now, however, we meet with a vein of irony which one would hardly hav expected in Buddha. Gods and devils he had located; to all mythological and philosophical acquisitions of the past he had done justice as far as possible. Even fabulous beings such as Nâgas, Gandharvas, and Garudas, had escaped the process of dissolution which was to reach them later only at the hands of comparativ mythology. There is only one idea, the idea of a personal creator, in regard to which Buddha is relentless. It is not only denied, but even its origin, like that of an ancient myth, is carefully explained by him in its minutest details.

Buddha thought it not necessary to play the part of a religious Don Quixote. He did not fight the wind-mills of mythological deities whose existence he knew to be doomed. But as soon as confronted with a serious problem he made no attempt at evading it but met it squarely and gave to his disciples his unequivocal solution.

Now it is strange that in these two points which constitute the main difference between Buddhism and Christianity, viz., the Christian belief in a personal God and World-Creator and the doctrin of the existence of an individual soul-entity, modern science, represented exclusivly by scientists educated in Christian schools and with a Christian tradition of two millenniums, will certainly side with Buddhism. There is scarcely anyone among our scientists who would be willing to indorse a creation out of nothing, and among our prominent psychologists few only will be found who adhere to the dualistic soul-conception which assumes the existence of a psychic agent behind the facts of soul-life. Nevertheless, our popular conception of a Creator-God and an ego-soul are so deeply rooted in the minds of our people that, as a rule, they still consider these two ideas the indispensable foundations of all religion.

Having studied of late the Buddhistic canon, I hav collected its most beautiful and characteristic passages and compiled from them a little volume called "The Gospel of Buddha," which is to appear soon. As the contents of the book are taken from Buddhistic sources, they are unquestionably genuin. The most important passages are literally copied from the translations of the original texts. The main work of the compiler has been the reduction of lengthy passages into brief condensations, the transcription of unintelligible parts into language that is understood by Western readers, and the omission of extravagancies which may please Oriental readers, but are not to the taste of the more sober Western mind. The quotation from Buddha's farewell address to his disciples, which is literally taken from the Maha-pari-nibbana Sutta, will giv a good idea of the spirit of Buddhism.

Ananda requested Buddha to speak once more to the disciples before his final passing away should take place, and Buddha said:

"What, then, Ananda, does the order expect of me? I hav preached the truth without making any distinction between exoteric and esoteric doctrin; for in respect of the truth, Ananda, the Tathagata has no such thing as the closed fist of a teacher who keeps some things back.

"Surely, Ananda, should there be anyone who harbors the thought, 'It is I who will lead the brotherhood,' or 'The order is dependent upon me,' he should lay down instructions in any matter concerning the order. Now the Tathagata, Ananda, thinks not that it is he who should lead the brotherhood, or that the order is dependent on him.

"Why, then, should the Tathagata leave instructions in any matter concerning the order?

"I am now grown old, O Ananda, and full of years, my journey is drawing to its close, I hav reached the sum of my days, I am turning eighty years of age.

"Just as a worn-out cart can only with much difficulty be made to move along, so the body of the Tathagata can only be kept going with much additional care.

"It is only Ananda, when the Tathagata, ceasing to attend to any outward thing, becomes plunged in that devout meditation of heart which is concerned with no bodily object, it is only then that the body of the Tathagata is at ease.

"Therefore, O Ananda, be ye lamps unto yourselvs. Rely on yourselvs, and do not rely on external help.

"Hold fast to the truth as a lamp. Seek salvation alone in the truth. Look not for assistance to any one besides yourselvs.

"And how, Ananda, can a brother be a lamp unto himself, rely on himself only and not on any external help, holding fast to the truth as his lamp and seeking salvation in the truth alone, looking not for assistance to any one besides himself?

"Herein, O Ananda, let a brother, as he dwells in the body, so regard the body that he, being strenuous, thoughtful, and mindful, may, whilst in the world, overcome the grief which arises from the body's cravings.

*An address delivered at the National Congress of Freethinkers, Chicago, Saturday evening, Nov. 27, 1894.

"While subject to sensations let him continue so to regard the sensations that he, being strenuous, thoughtful, and mindful, may, whilst in the world, overcome the grief which arises from the sensations.

"And so, also, when he thinks, or reasons, or feels, let him so regard his thoughts that, being strenuous, thoughtful, and mindful, he may, whilst in the world, overcome the grief which arises from the craving due to ideas, or to reasoning, or to feeling.

"Those who, either now or after I am dead, shall be a lamp unto themselvs, relying upon themselvs only and not relying upon any external help, but holding fast to the truth as their lamp, and seeking their salvation in the truth alone, shall not look for assistance to any one besides themselvs, it is they, Ananda, among my disciples, who shall reach the very topmost hight! But they must be anxious to learn."

This farewell speech contains the most important injunction which Buddha imposed upon his disciples, and its spirit is characterized by the words "Hold fast to the truth as to a lamp." For Buddhism, let me repeat once more, had no creed in the sense in which Christians or Mohammedans are required to believe their confessions of faith. Buddha rejects blind faith. He does not want his disciples to rely upon any Credo, and warns them not to accept any truth upon authority, not even upon his own, upon Buddha's authority. There is another remarkable passage in the sacred writings of Buddhism, which, according to Oldenberg, reads as follows:

If ye now know thus, and see thus, O disciples, will ye then say: We respect the Master, and out of reverence for the Master do we thus speak? That we shall not, O sire. . . . What ye speak, O disciples, is it not even that which ye hav yourselvs known, yourselvs seen, yourselvs realized? It is, sire.

Would that all religions adopted this principle of Buddha's! Would that it became the corner-stone of the Christian, the Jewish, the Mohammedan faith! The result would be that, perhaps slowly, but surely, the old traditional superstitions would be abandoned. Religion would be rationalized and become as it ought to be, only another name for the search after truth and the trust in truth.

PAUL CARUS.

A Pious Plagiarist Scored.

Professor Drummond's "Ascent of Man" has created quite a flutter of excitement among those people who are scarcely able to resist the evidences for evolution but who find it beyond their power to giv up their faith in Jesus and God. Mrs. Lynn Linton has a sharp and timely criticism of the pretentious volume in the Fortnightly Review for September. Here is a striking passage from her article:

Christianity no more invented the family than it invented virtue. Indeed, what is original anywhere? The story of Antinous is that of sacrifice, all the same as are the stories of Abraham and Isaac, of Jephthah's daughter, of the old Greek demigods and Roman heroes, who gave themselvs for humanity and their country—that is, for the good of others. Nay, Christ himself had his forerunner in Krishna, and his doctrins were f restalled by Confucius and Gautama, as in a sense by Plato and Socrates. We take exception to the unscientific and more than sickly tone of Professor Drummond's eulogium on the love which he asserts rules creation from the protoplastic base to the summit of human society at the end of the nineteenth century—the Professor himself standing on the apex like the angel on the top of Sant' Angelo. Without even a side glance to the truths of human life—to the war going on between capital and labor; between the Havs and the Hav-nots; between classes in England, races and religion in Ireland, anarchy and organization everywhere; between political opponents, and in society generally; between the nations which stand like dogs straining in the leash, held back only by economic considerations from hurling themselvs across the frontier in that deadly war so sure to come, nations armed to the teeth and 'spoiling' for the fight—we are treated to these mystical pæans on Love in the abstract as the one predominant factor of modern, that is, evoluted life, and the idea of justice is nowhere.

Professor Drummond's critic charges him with having "coolly" taken as his own "passages wherein Mr. Herbert Spencer has laid down principles and adduced facts to support them," and she adds that he has marred what he has thus borrowed from Spencer with "unworkable sentimentalities, to catch the taste of the uncritical and unscientifically educated public." She continues:

That he has succeeded in his aim is proved by the enormous success of his book—mere hash of other men's labor as it is—a plagiarism from first to last. It is a thing of this kind which makes one despair of one's generation. The greedy haste to swallow any form of quackery while neglecting truer and better-grounded expositions—the seeming inability to grasp first principles or to go to the fountain-head for knowledge—the curious pleasure taken in mysticism and sentimentality, and the no less curious aversion for the calm distinctness of science—the comfort of phrases analogous to the blessed word Mesopotamia—all point to a state of mental confusion which argues ill for the future, and which certainly proves the present to be unsatisfactory. There is nothing which average people dislike more than precision of thought, the logical genesis of opinion, the root-work of a creed; nothing that delights them so much as picturesqueness of statement irrespectiv of its truth—as sentimentality irreducible by logic or reason to anything resembling common sense. And, as the exponent of that form of pseudo-science which puts new wine into old bottles, and expects to make a good thing of the storage, Professor Drummond fulfils all these conditions and supplies all these ingredients in profusion. Hence his popularity. He brings his subject, which only the educated can rightly understand, down to the level of the ignorant. He strips science of her divinity and sends her out as a cottage maid, or, rather, as a young priest, of whom no one need be afraid. But he lets slip truth in this endeavor to extract milk for babes out of the meat for men; and his rendering of synthetic philosophy is both inadequate and shallow. Whatever is true, is borrowed; whatever is false, strained, and inconclusiv, is his own. His sin is the sin of plagiarism, with the additional offense of distortion in the lifting.

The Reasons Supplied.

In making appropriations of money for Christian missions the state makes itself the patron of religion, and thereby violates the sacred rights of conscience. The government of the United States has done this for many years. It has granted large sums of money to both Catholics and Protestants to be used in the religious training of American Indians. I am profoundly astonished at the Congressmen who hav voted for such appropriations, and I am still more astonished at the people for not protesting against this unjust and unconstitutional use of their money. A large share of the money used for this purpose was taken from the pockets of Jews and other non-believers in the Christian religion. In thus compelling them to support Christianity they are robbed of the liberty of conscience. Every person who can read ought to know that this is a violation of the Constitution of the United States. He ought to know that every Congressman who votes for these appropriations violates his oath of office. But the wrong continues. The consensus of opinion in every state in the Union is that the federal government has no right to make any such use of the people's money. But, knowing this, the representativs of the people, for reasons which they keep within the solitude of their own breasts, continue these unlawful appropriations.—Rev. Dr. Hawthorne.

[The reasons which the politicians "keep within the solitude of their own breasts," but which are well known to all observing people, are that the politicians dare not do otherwise than as they think the church wants them to do, and the church wants to receive every special privilege that the politician has it in his power to bestow. When Mr. Hawthorne can make the controling forces in the church honest enough to refuse these appropriations, Sunday laws, et al., he will find that the politicians will not try to force them on the church.—ED. T. S.]

Christianity and Slavery.

Christian teaching was neither the sole nor the chief cause of the abolition of slavery. Slavery was first condemned as a violation of natural right by certain Greek philosophers long before the Christian era; and legislation of a kind favorable to emancipation was initiated by Roman jurists imbued with the spirit of Stoicism long before the conversion of the empire to Christianity. The economical disadvantages of forced labor and the closing of the slave-markets by a series of political and military events quite unconnected with religion did the rest; and it is notorious that the human chattels of the religious houses were the last to be manumitted. With the discovery of America and opening up of Africa came a revival of the hateful institution under forms worse than any known to classical antiquity; and in this revival some very pious Christians bore a prominent part, while none that I know of raised a protest against it. At last a protest came, but it was uttered by the Rationalistic philosophers of the eighteenth century, and was first put into the form of law by the anti-Christian convention of France. So with the whole emancipating movement of modern times. In all its phases it has been originated and supported by Rationalists, and, until lately, has counted many devout religious believers among its opponents. I am well aware that quite recently the public opinion of the religious world has undergone a great change in this respect—a change well illustrated by the very book I am reviewing—but it is a change for which their religion is no more to be thanked than for their acceptance of the Darwinian theory, both being due to the serpentine rather than to the dovelike qualities of pietism.—A. W. Benn, in the Academy.

No passion so effectually robs the mind of all its powers of acting and reasoning, as fear.—Edmund Burke.

Freethought Progress.

During the period of two months three thousand copies of "Force and Matter," translated by our friend Ten Bokkel, hav been sold in Holland.

The Belgian Freethinkers hav now a song-book for children. ∴ The Freethought Federation of Belgium held a special congress on September 2d, at Brussels. The congress was well attended and in every respect a decided success.

The Ramon Chies memorial fund is slowly creeping up. It has now reached the six thousand pesetas mark. A peseta is equal to a franc, or about 19 cents. ∴ A grand anti-clerical demonstration is to be held at Barcelona, Spain. The invitation contains among its signatures the names of thirty-four professors of different Spanish universities.

Since the death of Dr. Ed. Schwella, Dr. Panthel has assumed the leadership of the Vienna Free Religious Society, and the editorship of Der Lichtfreund. ∴ The Austrian minister of agriculture stated in a lengthy speech in the congress of that country that the only solution of all social trouble lies in a return to faith in God. Representativ Pernerstorfer took his excellency down amidst the applause of the Liberals.

During the last two months six new societies hav joined the French Freethought Federation. ∴ A poor member of the Roman Catholic church committed suicide at Caudebec-lès-Elbeuf, France. The priest would not officiate. The Freethinkers of the village took the matter in hand, and the poor suicide had a first-class funeral. ∴ The annual French Freethought congress was held November 1st, at Paris. The congress discussed the following subjects: The necessity of adopting an anti-clerical program by the electoral committee, and making the same known among the masses; organization of secular and social festivals among Freethinkers; cremation, etc.

A new fully revised edition of "Force and Matter" has been published in Germany. The revision was by Professor Buchner himself. ∴ During the fiscal year 1893-94 sixty-four lectures were delivered to the Free Religious Society in Berlin. The Sunday-school was attended by five hundred and twenty children, and the membership of the society consisted last March of 2 775 adults. ∴ Professor George H. Schodde, writing to the Independent from Germany, does not seem to take a very hopeful view of the theological outlook there. He says that "the new and most powerful factor in German theological thought is the school of the late Professor Ritschl," and he describes the tenets of this school as being subversiv of such fundamental Christian dogmas as "the pre-existence and the eternal sonship and divinity and virgin birth of Christ, his work of atonement, the trinity, the inspiration of the scriptures, and other essentials." And yet these men claim to be Christians! "The antitheses now put forth between the conservativ and the advanced claus are more fundamental than ever, involving as they do the very heart principles of evangelical Christianity and theology." One of the latest victories of this class is the capture of the dogmatical chair of Jena, held for decades by Lipsius. Its influence has extended to France and found "warm adherence among the French Protestants. Its three leading organs—a bi-monthly, a bi-weekly, and a weekly—are all skilfully edited and are aggressiv in tenor and tone." Evangelical Christianity cannot extend the hand of fellowship to the protagonists of this kind of theology. "It would be ecclesiastical and theological suicide to do so. A reconstruction of evangelical theology along these lines can be possible only at the sacrifice of its heart's blood," says Professor Schodde. And yet evangelicism seems to be reduced to a choice between this suicide and surrender to undisguised Freethought.

Dr. Briggs says of the Higher Criticism and its opponents: "The investigation must go on all the same. It matters little how many oppose it. It may delay the end; it cannot prevent it. It may make the investigation a holy war, and the establishment of its result a catastrophe to the faith and life of its opponents. But the normal development of the investigation is the calm, steady, invincible march of science." ∴ The city council of Winnipeg will make churches which bring professional entertainments to the city pay a license fee of twenty-five dollars. If shows in secular halls and on the streets must pay a license, why should not those which seek the shelter of church walls? ∴ Unity says: "By forces quite irrepressible, the University of Chicago must eventually become a seat of learning in the interests of morals and religion on a basis far removed from the prescribed elements of any denomination or orthodox limitation." ∴ One hundred years ago the man who criticised the sermon was likely to be fined in this land of the free. One hundred years ago the whipping-post and pillory were still standing in New York and Boston (and now Commodore Gerry wants to get them back). ∴ At Amenia, N. Y., a preacher has lately been installed in the Presbyterian church after he had declared his disbelief in the Calvinistic doctrin of preterition. The Presbytery of the North river accepted him in spite of his heresy. Ministers must be growing scarce, for, as the Sun remarks, "preterition is a fundamental postulate of Calvin's theological system, which is the groundwork of Presbyterianism." But if this minister's "heart" is growing tender his intellect is losing its capacity for logical thinking, for if there is an infinit God and if any man or woman goes to hell that man or woman was foredoomed to hell by that infinit God. ∴ The board of review of assessments of Milwaukee refused to comply with the request of Bishop Katzer to take off the tax assessed on his residence. Had it been held by the church it would hav been exempt. The board will also investigate the exemption of the residence of Presiding Elder Creighton of the Methodist church. ∴ We hav received Freniad ("Forward"), a weekly Scandanavian paper published at Sioux Falls, S. D., and we find it a twin brother in sentiment to Rodhuggeren. ∴ The excommunicated Canadian paper, the Canada Revue, has changed its name to Le Reveil, but its principles remain the same.

News and Notes.

I am glad that the annual congress has turned out to be such a cheering success. It was pleasant to meet so many comrades and to work so harmoniously together. It is needless for me to giv any further account of this great gathering, for ample reports hav been published in the papers. We hav laid out a good basis for progress. There will be a consolidation of all our forces, and we shall be ready to meet any emergency in the defense of human rights.

After the labors of the Congress, it was a delightful change to meet the Liberals of Bangor, Mich., in the first campaign for Freethought in that place. Arrangements for six lectures in the Opera House were made by F. N. Overton, and a wave of excitement was in the community. There are four churches in Bangor with an average attendance of three hundred in a population of two thousand in the township. For fifty years—ever since the settlement of the country—there has been no opposition to speak of to the ancient faith. It has pursued the even tenor of its way, and Christians hav dozed comfortably in their church pews and the ministers preached hell-fire without making any particular impression or creating extra warmth in the hearts of their listeners. But now something new was appearing. The Freethinker was in the land, and the other side of the question was to be heard. This was indeed a novel enterprise, and what would come of it was the absorbing question. The Infidel was something so entirely unexpected that the faithful did not know exactly what kind of a picture might enlighten their perturbed imagination. Whether the Infidel had horns or hoofs was a matter to be decided only by actual observation.

However, Freethought had been growing in the community for many, many years. In the backwoods it had flourished with the stroke of the ax and the furrow of the plow. The pioneers had not battled with nature without seeing the real truth of things and that science was better than theology. And so the Freethinker found a cordial welcome in this prosperous and advancing community. The Opera House was filled on the first night. Two or three clergymen were present, and a large sprinkling of Christian believers, although the majority of the audience were evidently in favor of Freethought and found that it was in agreement with their own common sense and humanity. It was what they had thought all along, only it had never before been clearly expressed. The weather was not so favorable as I wished. It rained one or two evenings, and the traveling was bad, and as many of my Liberal friends lived in the country it made it difficult for them to attend. On pleasant evenings the house was full. On the stormy evenings it was nearly full, and the interest continued unabated. I am sure that if the last evening had been clear, even the standing room of the Opera House would hav been occupied. As it was I hav every reason to feel encouraged at the outlook, and to thank the Liberals of Bangor for their stanch devotion and presence, rain or shine, at the meetings. The work at Bangor shows what can be done in a thousand communities in this country, if a few fearless and persistent Freethinkers will push things and bring out the real progressiv thought in the minds of the people. The majority of the people are out of the trammels of the church, only they do not know it—they hav not heard Freethought lectures or read Freethought papers.

I challenged the clergymen of the place to meet me in open debate, but none answered. I suppose they will reserve their guns until the Freethought lecturer is a thousand miles away; but I am willing to leave my facts and arguments with the common sense of the people and do not fear the triumph of the enemy. The Freethinkers of Bangor are fully able to defend themselvs. They occupy leading positions in the community and are respected by all, and their convictions are backed by character.

I found, indeed, a very congenial atmosphere in Bangor—plenty of intelligence and progressiv spirit—and the whole time of my stay was stimulating and enjoyable.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Overton, and it was a delightful sojourn for the Secular Pilgrim. Among the companions of this Freethought fireside were Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Benscotter, who, although they believe in the spiritual life beyond the horizon of this world, are still intensely interested in all that concerns the welfare and progress of humanity to-day. In the sunset of age they hav not lost the golden freshness of life's morning. The children of the household, Glenn and Essie Overton, were constant in their attendance at the lectures, and hav too much Freethought ever to be gathered into the orthodox fold. I can not enumerate all the generous supporters whom I found in Bangor and vicinity. Mr. C. A. Southard, Irving Southard, H. M. Overton and all his family for three generations, Mr. and Mrs. Dallas Wood, Polk Wood, F. J. Overton, J. L. Willis, etc.; these names represent families and associations of Freethinkers that will be influential and durable in this place. The flag is now flung to the breeze and it will not be taken down. I shall count it a great pleasure to meet these friends again in some future campaign. A successful and brilliant opening has certainly been made and I do not expect to find more enthusiastic or splendid allies than in Bangor.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. A. Johnson, of South Haven. My old friend Lewis, of Goldthwaite, Tex., will recognize these friends when I introduce them in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mrs. Johnson is the daughter of the Texan pioneer.

It is snowing when I leave Bangor Tuesday morning. The great election day is on and the political landslide all over the country, but as I can not vote I let things take their way. I travel so much that, though I feel at home in every state, I cannot cast a ballot in any. I presume the country is safe just the same. Friend Reichwald did more than vote, however. He was judge of election and was at his post continuously from five o'clock Tuesday morning until four o'clock Wednesday morning. This is like serving one's country on the field of battle, and requires both pluck and patriotism.

My next point from Bangor is the Liberal Club, New York, where I am Friday evening, November 9th. I am glad to meet old comrades again on this historic field of intellectual combat. It has now a lady president, Mrs. Beckwith, who presides with grace and dignity and knows when to use the gavel. A more extended notice of my lecture, I hope, will be given by the "Man With the Badge-pin." A fine audience was present, and the Liberal Club still flourishes as one of the lights of the world and the platform scintillates with every variety of thought.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

After Grover.

The Dallas Freethinkers, says a dispatch, dated Nov. 4th, to the Galveston News, did business tonight at the old stand on Ervay street. About sixty people were present, and they proceeded to wrestle with the president of the United States, by adopting the following, which will be circulated for signatures, and when signed will be forwarded to President Cleveland:

TO GROVER CLEVELAND, President of the United States —Dear Sir: Having read your proclamation, we make bold to ask you the following questions:

1. Is there a constitutionally recognized church in the United States?
2. If so, are you the head of this church?
3. Does the office of president confer with it the position of the head of any church?
4. As the head of the church hav you the right to speak in your official capacity as president?
5. As president, hav you any authority to issue church orders?
6. In so doing are you not mixing religious matters with affairs of state?
7. Do you remember a part of the Constitution which says Congress small make no laws respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof?
8. If you do not get your authority from Congress, whence does it come?
9. Are you not openly insulting every American citizen when you assume, as president, the authority of a pope?
10. If the order be but a form, as may be urged, is it not bad form to exceed the constitutional rights conferred on the president by acting as you hav done in the matter of issuing religious orders?
11. What authority hav you to stamp or brand a religious bull with the great seal of the United States?
12. Hav you any constitutional authority to command or even suggest that people observe any religious feast or festival?

As believers in a secular government and religious worship and the right to worship according to the dictates of conscience, or not at all, we condemn your action and appeal to the people to put a stop to this mode of religious meddling.

Mr. Putnam will also arrange to lecture in New Mexico, Colorado, and Kansas on his return from Arizona. Those wishing lectures in any of these states will communicate with S. P. Putnam, 234 South Water street, Chicago.

Observations.

What is the matter with the A. P. A.? Is it all right or is it not? The answer will depend upon the reader's race, political color, and previous condition of religious servitude. Protestants generally do not make any audible objections to the association, while Catholics just despise it. Again, the adherent of the Republican party bears the order no ill-will, but Democrats regard it as a mortal enemy. Once more, its membership is almost exclusivly unceltic, and the Irish are extraneous to it. Thus it is a question whether the A. P. A. was organized by Protestants to down the Catholics, by Republicans to beat the Democrats, or by Yankees to freeze out the Hibernians. However the question is answered, the fact cannot be disguised that, politically, the Catholics are downed, the Democrats are beaten, and the temperature surrounding the Irish office-seeker is extremely cold.

If the members of the A. P. A. are to be believed, the purpose of the order is to divorce the Catholic church from the American state. They say that the Catholic church is a political machine whose operators aim at absolute control of the consciences and liberties of us all; which is true. The Catholic church approaches as near to the infamous as anything I know of except those branches of the Protestant church which most closely resemble it. It commits and defends, I believe, all crimes except the capital one of murder, and its record is not clear of that offense. It terrifies the ignorant with its hoc-est-corpus, and bullies the enlightened by the power of its wealth and political influence. It imprisons women in its nunneries; it steals from the public treasury to support its schools and reformatories, which are training-grounds for the church and the penitentiary. Its religious teaching is fraud touched with superstition, and its histories are mostly lies that no reasonable person can believe. Its charity is speculation in misfortune, and its philanthropy is business enterprise conducted on a basis of cringing and sycophantic hypocrisy. As a swindle, it has no respectable competitors among the green goods men, bunco steerers, and lottery agents. They are outclassed. Its only rival is its offspring, the Protestant machine.

Considering these serious objections to the Catholic church as a shaper of the destinies of America, it is quite natural that the A. P. A. should spring up. The wonder is that citizens who believe in a non-Catholic state hav not previously combined. In spite of all that has been said against the American Protectiv Association, I hold that this combination is proper and necessary, so long as such union of church and state exists as permits our legislature to raise money for the expenses of the state, and appropriate the same to pay the expenses of running the pope's religious institutions. It follows that keeping Catholics out of office is the legitimate work of an organization of this kind, because the more Catholics we elect to positions of trust, the more we shall be robbed in the manner here deprecated. The question of religious liberty has been raised by the orators of the party threatened by the boycott of Catholics; but that religious liberty which permits a Catholic to hold office is not violated, I think, if in the exercise of it I vote against him. The portion of the Constitution which provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust" places no restrictions on the voter and therefore has nothing to do with the case. It means that an officer-elect shall not hav his religious belief inquired into when he takes the oath of office. It does not mean that a Freethinker is to ignore the fact that a Roman Catholic candidate is pledged by his alliance with the church to violate that other article of the Constitution which says "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion." The article touching the matter of religious qualifications is notoriously disregarded in the appointment of chaplains, whose only qualification is a religious one; and the other article is shoved aside to make room for laws prejudicial to the Demands of Liberalism. A vote for a Catholic is a vote against those demands, and the American citizen is a mule if he does not use all honest means to elect a secularist instead—not on account of the Catholic's belief, but because he conceives it his duty to rob the taxpayer for the benefit of the church.

The A. P. A.-ist is objectionable not because he opposes the Catholic church, but because, having removed the Romish incubus he would substitute the Protestant succubus that equally plays the devil with secular institutions. He loses sight of the great truth that the two churches are mother and daughter, of the same blood and both tough. The old lady has her appointments with one political party, the girl with the other; and neither will hesitate to throw off on her partner when he loses his job. The Democratic party just now has the Catholic church and Tammany on its hands. The Republican party has the Protestant church and the A. P. A. If their contests in the future prove to be Kilkenny cat symposiums, the Pops will be tickled to death.

The brilliant enterprise of the Light of Truth, a Spiritualist paper, in securing the late Dr. A. B. Dobson as a heavenly correspondent has been materially dimmed by its contemporary, the Spirit of Truth, a little sheet published away off in Arkansaw, which now claims Luther Colby as its editor. When Mr. Colby, editor of the Banner of Light, went to his reward on October 7th, his friends expected that he would lose no time in communicating with the office where he spent so great a part of his earthly life. But it appears that Mr. Colby has fooled them, for instead of making himself known in Boston as aforesaid, he went West, where, according to the Spirit of Truth, he has organized the "Colby Band of Spirit Editors," with mundane headquarters at the office of that journal in Hot Springs, Ark. In his communication there are several items of interest. Apologizing for not returning to the Banner household, he says that the friends there did not need "coddling," while he regarded it as his first duty to search out those who had been averse to him in earth life and assure them of his forgivness. Among such antagonists was Dr. Cook, editor of the Spirit of Truth. Another was John C. Bundy, but on meeting in the spirit world, they (Mr. Colby and the Bundy spook) embraced each other, "whilst the very heavens vibrated and rang with the anthems of praise and shouts of angelic joy that arose from the united voices of the unnumbered, vast concourse of redeemed beatific souls as we both, then and there forgave each other, and became everlasting spiritual friends in an inseparable oneness of spiritual love." While in Boston Mr. Colby did not write that kind of slush; spirits, however, never write anything else. I cannot imagin Luther Colby saying that he feels "like a newly hulled chestnut that has just shed its burr," because I doubt that he ever was a chestnut, which, I take it, an individual must necessarily be in order to know how it feels to be shucked; yet the alleged communication puts those words in his mouth. Chestnuts!

It is to be observed that the Banner of Light, Mr. Colby's old paper, publishes no communication from its departed editor. It is just possible that the respect which Mr. Colby's surviving friends hav for his memory forbids that exhibition of mendacity. Perhaps they regard spirit messages as Dr. Dobson did his own medicins—quite profitable as an article of commerce, but not to be taken by the compounder. There may be this further analogy, that as the doctor's medicins all came out of the same bottle, so the messages produced by a medium all hav their origin in the same brain.

I heard the other day, from one who had been a member of Dr. Dobson's family, quite an enlightening bit of information. The doctor had the reputation of being an independent slate writer; and so he was. His method was to lay a piece of paper on a slate and to write thereon quite independently of spirits or any other influences. Such messages as the Spirit of Truth medium givs to the world with Luther Colby's name attached hav the same self-reliant character.

The New York Sun attributes the Democratic reverses to President Cleveland's indifference and Populism in the party, but Mr. T. Platt, manager of the Republican machine in this state, declares it was Providence that did it. Mr. Dana should take a balloon and "go higher up."

Last June a parcel of male and female doctors who kill or cure illegally were arrested in this city by agents of a sort of vice society and charged with malpractice. Not a single one of them was ever tried, and the last witness before the Lexow committee, Dr. Newton Whitehead, told the reason why. The case turns out to be that the physicians were "pinched" as a blackmailing proposition, and that upon the payment by them of money to be divided between the agents, the lawyers, and the courts, the prosecution was dropped. The leader in this felony was one Joseph Britton, who will be remembered as having done a fugleman's work in the arrest of D M. Bennett. He was then in the employ of Anthony Comstock, who taught him first to prosecute vice and then to squeeze it. It is not comforting to hear that among the lawyers who took money from the criminals to "fix" the court was Hugh O. Pentecost. If Britton's society and Comstock's society and Parkhurst's society were not of the same brood, it might be hoped that in the course of the Lexow committee's investigations the rascals would hav the bright light of publicity thrown upon them. It is written, however, in the book of probabilities, that when Mr. Goff takes the elevator to go higher up he will not linger at the floor where these buzzards roost.

Mr. L. G. Reed, whose writings brace a man up like a drink of ginger-and-water in the hay-field, has just published a booklet of poems and essays—or jingles and prose pieces, as he calls them. I read Mr. Reed's articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER long before I learned that he was kin to the Reeds who used to go to school at the North End district in Surry, N. H., when I, aged 10, studied aliquot parts and least common multiples at "middle-town" next to Sam Poole's blacksmith shop. The Reeds were a good sort of people, who went soberly about their business. I often saw the old folks jogging by in their reliable pleasure wagon, as well as the younger ones with their smarter rigs, and I recollect that everybody spoke well of them. I remember this because, being myself a hard formation, and learning my lessons not by study but by the immediate assistance of the devil, respectable citizens attracted my attention and I wondered how it felt to be good. From the appearance of some known to be not only good but pious, I got a notion that it hurt. There is not much Liberalism in New Hampshire. Thought is petrified about as permanently as the granit hills. People there are divided, according to the local idea, into Christians, Catholics, and Spiritualists. The Christians are the Protestants; the Catholics are adherents of the "Irish religion," and "Spiritualists" include all unbelievers, whether Materialists or otherwise. There is so little thought on the subject of religion that, though the inhabitant may hav his opinion of the folks who go to the other meeting-house, he would be surprised if you should ask him to explain the difference between his creed and theirs. The old lady who borrowed THE TRUTH SEEKER and read it piously every Sunday for a year previous to her death, under the impression that it was a religious journal, and then died in the hope of a glorious resurrection, was fairly representativ of the rest of the population.

To return to Mr. Reed's book, it is the kind that should be circulated in that state. Its unorthodoxy is so frequently emphasized throughout its pages that even the common mind as it is in New Hampshire would detect its drift, and the same common mind, being shrewd if not enlightened, would see there was truth in the darned thing after all. I can tell without going there just how it would be clandestinly passed from one to another until a copy had been read by everybody in a given neighborhood except the children and the unmarried. There is nothing in it to shock the mind of a child or to agitate the bosom of a vestal, but New England parents, though broader than they are long in their speech, are peculiarly narrow as to their literature. Mr. Reed's jingles especially would prove a center shot at the New Hampshire understanding, which is naturally receptiv toward rhyme. While his prose might awaken reflection and doubt, his poetry would create a sensation. As an example, select his verses on the Bible story of the flood. They would read it because it is quaint and humorous. And the last stanza would stay with them like the sting of a bumblebee. It is pointed, and good poetry:

> The bended knees and lifted hands
> Implore the gods in vain;
> Not all the priests of all the lands
> E'er brought or stayed the rain.

Some reader may recognize in these remarks a description of people he knows outside of New Hampshire. If so, Mr. Reed's book will be useful there also. It is calculated to quicken all those who are in the stage of arrested development.

Faith, hope, and charity are not greater than duty, humility, and self-sacrifice. (1) By working the Duty racquet, conscientious persons may often be induced to assist the undeserving, who are as a rule the persons most profited by the exercise of that virtue; for which reason they are the most persistent in pointing out its demands. (2) In the practice of Humility we assure the author of our being that his works are imbecil, which must be somewhat humiliating to him. It is well that the most high should occasionally be called down. (3) Self-sacrifice means that we must deny ourselvs small favors and temporary pleasures in order that we may enjoy those which are great and enduring. It follows, then, that he who most sincerely desires to exercise the virtue here discussed will content himself with the lesser benefits, and, by a supreme act of self-sacrifice, forego the everlasting reward.

James Payn, in his "Gleams of Memory," says that he never found orthodoxy in any man of letters, even if he was nominally connected with an evangelical sect. He adds: "Their doubts are more than historic doubts. Their difficulty is to believe that omnipotence and benevolence can permit the outrageous crimes and cruelties that go on every day in the world." ∴∴ Dr. G. Vance Smith writes to the Nineteenth Century in answer to the assertions of Gladstone regarding the numbers of professing Christians. Gladstone had said that 450,000,000 people agree in witnessing to the "central truths" of the incarnation and the trinity. Dr. Smith pointedly comments: "When all is said and done what is the testimony thus appealed to worth? What proportion of these numberless millions can be said to 'witness' to the alleged truths with any rational conviction of their own, or after any intelligent inquiry worthy of acknowledgment? What of the masses of English Christians, including the multitudes of fine people who frequent churches and chapels merely because it is the fashion to do so? Their testimony surely is only a nominal thing destitute of weight or value. Numbers are no test of truth. Otherwise, what should we hav to say of those other hundreds of millions, Buddhists and Mohammedans, who are as passionately devoted to their religion as are Christians, and, indeed, far more so?"

Several Christians in Virginia hav just been sent to jail because their religion did not quite agree with that of their more numerous orthodox neighbors.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Oct. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot resist the impulse to send a few words to THE TRUTH SEEKER, expressing my gratification in reading the article in the last number, "My Religion," by a brother, C. W. Williams, of Springfield, Mo. Beautiful and grand it is; but I am unable to accept the use he makes of the word religion. I wish he had left that out; religion has always been a curse, the word is hateful. If Bro. Williams will look at it a minute, he will agree with S. L. BABBITT, M.D.

JERSEY CITY, N. J., Oct. 22, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: I received "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," in perfect order, and was much surprised to see such a masterpiece of human ingenuity. Surely Mr. S. P. Putnam is a literary wonder; his great production is a complete library in itself and no Freethinker can afford to be without it. The only thing I am sorry for is, I do not find poor old J. Hacker's photo; yet I am more than satisfied, and my prayer is, may it liv many, many long years after the author is (not an angel) dust. Yours for humanity without gods, saints, and Christs, WILLIAM THORPE.

Filled with Wonder and Awe.

ELMIRA, N. Y., Oct. 24, 1894.

MR. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" was duly received. Briefly I must say it is a great accession to Freethought literature, and monumental of the grand and glorious intellectual achievements that hav rolled down the ages for four centuries, fitting the human race for still greater accomplishments. Stricken with wonder and awe when contemplating the vast field of its exploration, I ask myself, How can any one man possibly accumulate so very much material in so short a time? This exhaustiv work is all that and even more than I expected. It is a most profound production and reflects great credit upon its author. It is a monument unto thyself more lasting than shafts of shining marble.

I am proud to hav my name inscribed upon its pages of inspiration. I hav placed it alongside the great works of the world's greatest sages, a position it so richly deserves.

The pictures of those champions of liberty and progress who hav been and are to-day the real saviors of mankind, so far as I am acquainted with them, are good.

The book is an emanation from a sage mind, the product of nineteenth century heroism. L. DEWITT GRISWOLD.

MR. EDITOR: Books received all right; was surprised to receive two, and not knowing what to do with it, and believing you made some mistake, I hav taken the liberty to sell the other one, and hereby inclose you check for same. I must say a word in commendation of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and that is it is a much better book than I ever expected, and the greatest compliment that I can pay Mr. Putnam is to say that it is written in such plain and simple language that not only the educated but the uneducated can read and understand it, and it is a work that everyone should read, as it is just what the publishers and author claimed for it all the time the book was in the press, and that is that it is a "History of Freethought" from the beginning, and, in my estimation, ranks next to Buckle's "History of Civilization in England."

I must tell you of a rather amusing thing that happened in this village a short time ago. We hav been having a series of revival meetings in the Methodist Episcopal church, starting in last Sunday night. Rev. Mr. Merideth was the speaker for the evening, and he said that he hoped that all the people would be faithful and pray for rain, and if they only prayed in faith, believing, their prayers would be answered. Now, of course, you know that we hav had a very bad storm in the past week all on account of the prayers of the faithful in this little village. But when we take into consideration the fact that the wind was northeast and it looked like rain every moment, it is indeed wonderful how God did answer their prayers. But this is not all Reverend Merideth said (and here comes the funny part of it); he said that he hoped it would rain good and hard, and then he would know the faithful by their attendance. So, on Tuesday night (I think it was), it rained very hard and was correspondingly dark, and about thirty of the faithful showed up, but the Reverend Merideth, "Oh, where was he?" At home, taking it easy, and not thinking of the few faithful who did come to the church that night. But I hav not the least doubt that he offered up a prayer that those who did go to church would take their hip boots and mackintoshes so that they would be able to get home safe, and not be drowned in the God-sent flood which pervaded the streets of Northport. I am yours for mental and physical liberty,

Mr. Beegle's Misapprehension.

CLAY CENTER, KAN., Oct. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: This morning I received a marked sample copy of your issue of the 20th inst., in which you quote freely from my articles in the Clay Center (Kan.) Dispatch, and it may be that what you hav quoted may not be calculated to prejudice your Freethinking readers against me, but if your declining to quote one thing more from my last article does not cause what you did quote to thus prejudice them it will be well. You say: "We hav no desire to see Mr. Wise punished," etc. Did not I say also, at almost the close of my last article, "It is my opinion, and this also is my hope, that the federal court will rule out the case of Vennum vs. Wise"? Now this shows plainly that so far as the matter of punishing Mr. Wise was concerned, I was of the same mind with yourself. Why then did you not quote my words in which in substance I expressed the hope that he would be allowed to go free? Yours, etc., S. D. BEEGLE.

[It certainly was not our intention to garble Mr. Beegle's letters in the Dispatch, and we do not think the part he has now quoted had a direct bearing on the two points we wished to make, the first of which was that he had not helped the case for the Bible by making prominent the fact that the "word of God" could so easily be made decent or indecent by fallible man, and the second of which was that the Bible should not be given privileges in the mails which are denied to reformatory works not claimed to be inspired, and this merely because the Bible contains words no more obscene than those which abound in law books and which are heard in the pleadings of attorneys. We think that our intelligent readers inferred that Mr. Beegle did not wish to see Mr. Wise imprisoned, for we certainly conveyed the impression that the minister thought the Bible was non-prosecutable, and if it was then it would follow that he would not deem it just that Mr. Wise should be punished for mailing an extract from it. But be this as it may, Mr. Beegle now has the benefit of his own statement, and we feel impelled to ask him a question: Suppose that Mr. Wise had sent through the mails to Mr. Vennum an excerpt from some book other than the Bible, the tone of the excerpt being the same as that of the one he did send and the objectionable words the same, would he say, as he now says, that he would hope that the case would be ruled out of court? In other words, does Mr. Beegle really stand for fair play for all beliefs and all schools of religion and sociology, or is he pleading for special privileges for the Bible? We sincerely hope that it is for the former.—ED. T. S.]

That Pierson Debate Fiasco.

PIERSON, IA., Oct. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of the 4th to hand with letter of D. R. Dungan as stated. I return Dungan's letter herewith, and inclose one I received a few days since from him. These are the letters:

THAT DEBATE WHICH DID NOT OCCUR.

During the spring term of this (Cotner) university, I was requested by the secretary of a committee appointed by the Methodist Episcopal and Disciple churches of Pierson, Ia., to meet a Mr. Charlesworth, a Freethinker, there in debate. I accepted, and the debate was fixed for June 18th or 19th. Shortly before the time they wrote me that Charlesworth had been withdrawn and that W. F. Jamieson would take his place. I replied that it was all right, and I would be on time. On Saturday before the debate should begin, I received notice that the debate was off; that the Freethinkers had denied making any challenge, and that the Methodist Episcopal church would hav no more to do with it on that account. The Disciples were not able to pay the expenses, and therefore I was asked not to come.

D. R. DUNGAN.

BETHANY, NEB., Oct. 12, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 11th received. I did not receive any notice that Mr. Jamieson was there, but supposed that he would not be, as I was informed that the whole matter had been declared off, as the Methodist Episcopal church refused to hav anything more to do with it inasmuch as the Freethinkers denied having given any challenge, and that the Christian church was not able to stand the expenses.

Would I hav come if so notified? No. I had expected to go, up to Friday before I was to hav started on the Monday following, and had my trunk packed for that purpose. It was the letter that prevented my going which told me that the Methodist Episcopal church would hav no more to do with the debate. I will not go and defend the cause where there are those whose duty it is to do it or hav it done, unless employed by them. And the contract was at an end when I received the letter. I was very sorry that the matter failed.

It took a little while to hav another set of appointments. But I was at home but a short time, for the board wished me to work in the interest of the institution and I did so. I was willing to debate with Mr. Jamieson, and hoped to do so, but I should not hav gone there for that work except by invitation and for remuneration.

Very truly yours, D. R. DUNGAN.

This matter has been so thoroughly ventillated here that I doubt the profit of further comment. But if you think best to giv another chapter, the following facts are too notorious to be denied even by our Christian apologists:

That J. P. Waldron, the Disciple minister, was the entire committee, having been authorized by his church to do what he thought best; that I hav still in my possession the contract for that debate witten by Dungan and signed by Jamieson; that the back down was wholly and notoriously on the part of the Christian clergy; that all the facts which they proffer as excuses were as well known before offering to debate as after; that the Freethinkers accused them to their faces, and at the time, of making these excuses solely to cover their retreat; that so far from the Methodist Episcopal church flying the track, the Methodist minister immediately published to a crowded house at a Sunday-school convention that the Freethinkers had backed out and were not men of their word; that afterwards he acknowledged to the Freethinkers that it was a mistake, claiming he had been misinformed by Mr. Waldron; that either church was abundantly able to raise the money, and that the Freethinkers offered to make up to them any deficit they were unable to raise, if they would only go on with the debate.

In one of Dungan's letters he says the Freethinkers denied having received any challenge; in the other that they denied making any challenge. Neither statement is true. The local Freethinkers challenged the Christians; so did Mr. Jamieson. The Freethinkers only denied that the debate was arranged under a challenge left by Mr. Charlesworth, he to return and debate, so that no other lecturer could debate. Charlesworth left no such explicit challenge. Mr. Jamieson (failing to receive our telegram) came according to agreement and stayed the entire week the debate was to hav taken place. He and a committee of Freethinkers called on the Disciple minister and labored with him to induce him to stand to his part of the contract. He did promis to notify Mr. Dungan and do what he could to save the debate (which Dungan says he did not do).

Of course the whole affair was arranged by the Christian clergy to deceive church members into the belief that the clergy are able to defend their false doctrins. They never intended to risk the effort.

S. F. BENSON.

Letter from Pulpit-Sick Pennsylvania.

WILLIAMSPORT, PA., Oct. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I was pleased to see Ingersoll's slap in the face to the New York World liar concerning ex-Governor Curtin's refusal to sit upon the stage at one of his lectures, etc. While Curtin was a Christian, he was not so narrow-minded as some other governors of the great Keystone state. "In-God-We-Trust" Pollock (all others cash) was one of them, while James Beaver can fill a pulpit in cases of emergency, and Robert Pattison can talk unctuously about the Sunday desecration at the World's Fair and at the same time hold stock in one of the best paying Sunday newspapers in this state. I was going to say that was hypocrisy, but I suppose it is a matter of business. I suppose both God and the devil hav been consulted in the matter.

If this article is to contain any news matter I might say that the people of this beautiful Susquehanna valley are making arrangements through state and national legislation to beat God at some of his "blessings." For the past few years it has been a trick of God's to dose the people hereabouts with some water left over from Noah's flood, I presume. In 1889 he succeeded in drowning several thousand residents of this state, and he has my personal thanks for the destruction of a number of his own "hen houses." In the spring of this year he tried the same old trick over again, but the people were onto him. I believe he was after us Infidels this last swoop, and I think he had your humble servant on the string. He did not find me in Pennsylvania. I suppose Peter had failed to keep a record of my whereabouts and when they discovered me in Colorado God sent a big flood in that state only a few days later than the Pennsylvania flood, but I was onto the trick of 1889, so I gave him the slip in Colorado and kept in the dry and away from his wrath.

This beautiful city of Williamsport is infested with a gang of nose-in-other-people's-business Christians who are going to enforce Sabbath observance. The daily papers here are making fun of them. The movement is sanctioned by the Young Men's Christian Association, an organization which it has been proven furnishes ninety per cent of the bank wreckers of this state. The old Blue laws of 1794 are to be enforced by a branch of the State Sabbath Observance Association, and already cigar stores and photograph galleries hav been closed. These moral bloodsuckers would hav the outside world believe that Williamsport is a perfect hell, as is shown in the following silly twaddle in a resolution:

Our city is in open rebellion against divine laws. Our people are being corrupted with vile and debasing literature; also in other ways. The blessed Sabbath is being openly and shamefully violated and trampled upon by individuals and corporations. In view of these facts the time has come for our Christian and moral men to call a halt regarding this state of things and change Williamsport into a model city. We therefore call upon all lovers of the right and of law and order to be present, etc., to devise ways and means to change the present condition of things in our city.

It is not more than reasonable to suppose that by "vile and debasing literature" is meant the Sunday newspapers, which are nothing vile as compared to that ancient ghost story, the Bible. The Sunday Grit of this city, one of the most popular Sunday newspapers in this state, takes the Sabbath observance business to heart and in an editorial of a recent issue calls the hobos down in the following emphatic language:

It is indirectly intimated that the purpose and object of this movement is the strict enforcement of the old Blue Laws of our state, and if this is confirmed we can assure the society that it will meet with the vigorous opposition of our people. These obnoxious laws, enacted a century ago to meet conditions or exigencies that hav long ago ceased to exist, hav no relation to the necessities of to-day. The laws of 1794 are inquisitorial and as applied at this time are merely instruments of persecution which can be called into activity by a single person or a few people for the annoyance of the many. Other cities hav been inflicted with spasmodic efforts to apply the laws, and a general, indignant uprising of the people has been the usual result. In the language of a learned judge of this state, "a general enforcement of these obnoxious enactments is the best way to insure their repeal," and we fully indorse the wisdom of his declaration. Law and order advocates will damage their cause seriously by a resort to any such tactics, and instead of being an influence for good they will become objects of public derision. Williamport will not submit to a reëstablishment of old-time Puritanical Sabbaths. Nor will any community of sane people, and if such a project is contemplated, as is generally understood, those in charge should take into consideration the fact that they will meet with an opposition that will promptly bring them to a realization of the fact that the days of intolerant oppression are passed.

It is not necessary for me to say that the leaders of this Sabbath observance movement are not the most useful and enterprising citizens of this community.

While a resident of Philadelphia I lived opposit a saloon and I often observed that street beggars watched men going in and out and invariably "struck" that class of people for money and they were very seldom refused. I hav also lived opposit churches, but I never saw a poor man waiting outside to "hit" any of God's people for money. People that patronize saloons do not preach liberality, but practice it; church people preach liberality, and do not practice it. If the reader does not believe this and he livs in a large city, just see if he cannot observe the same things which I hav.

There are preachers in this city whose ill-gotten gains amount to several thousand dollars a year. A subscription was raised here for a soldiers' monument and of the many contributors to the fund I saw the name of but one preacher, and his mite was $1. Some of the hotel men gave as much as $25, and their income is not greater than that of many preachers of this city. I am not writing this in defense of the saloon. I am no drunkard, but take a drink when I want it and pay for the same. I hav never refused a drink but once and that was church "bug juice."

I almost forgot to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that we had United States Circuit Court here a few weeks ago and here is one of the cases as reported by the daily papers of the city:

Herman Pfannenschmidt, of Altoona, indicted for sending obscene postal cards through the mails, was put on trial shortly after 4 o'clock. He did not want counsel of flesh and bone, but said God was his counsel. The indictment was read and Pfannenschmidt pleaded not guilty. Postmaster McDonald testified that he recognized the defendant's handwriting on the cards in question. Pfannenschmidt sat quietly by until the government had ended its case. He then read a paper to Judge Buffington which contained Biblical quotations. Next he went to the jury and read a prayer. The court objected, but Pfannenschmidt kept on until he ended the prayer. He wanted his witnesses to testify, and unwrapping a copy of Puck, Judge, a Bible, revolver, wood cut, and some old papers, he was about to put them in the witness box, when the court objected. The jury without leaving the box rendered a verdict of guilty, and recommended that the prisoner be sent to an insane asylum. At this Pfannenschmidt began to cry, and wanted some person to take the revolver and kill him, as there was no justice in this world. It required three men to hustle him out of the room.

This crank with such a tiresome name proved to be a bad one, and here is what the daily papers said of him when he was brought before the court for sentence:

Herman Pfannenschmidt was brought before the court for sentence. He was not sent to Danville insane asylum, as was expected, but was sent to the Blair county jail for three months. Pfannenschmidt again created a scene and called the court a liar, and severely lectured Judge Buffington for not allowing him to hav his witnesses testify. Three or four men snatched Pfannenschmidt and ran him out of the court room.

Since my last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER another good old Infidel has been sent to hell (wherever that is) by God's folks in the person of that great and good poet, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. After awhile hell will be so crowded with respectable people that it will be a torture to go to heaven—unless a fellow goes there on an annual editorial pass which is good for a return trip, which, by the way, probably explains the reason why there are so few editors in heaven.

With apologies to the human race, I will make my exit. J. WARD DIEHL.

God or No God?

PIERSON, IA., Oct. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: That I may tempt the friends of progress to eat of the tree of knowledge, and be driven from the paradise of illusion, I desire to sacrifice a few of Miss Chapman's asseverations to serve as background against which to flash the jewels of modern thought.

The contrast will be more effectiv if I claim all the "spiritual insight" of the most devout believer, and show by a few examples that I, too, can write history from "intuition," though I confess that in my sunny childhood I might hav suffered cruel chastisment for indulging in such "direct revelation from within." I quote from Miss Chapman, the clauses not inclosed in quotation marks being mine:

1. "Since light comes from the sun, therefore intelligence comes from God," and as silks come from China, therefore sausages come from the Cannibal islands.

2. "The best evidence of a matured mind is the development of intuition, or direct revelation from within." Some people are born marvelously matured, and some mature for a consideration.

3. "In the early days of Zoroastrian faith, fire was clearly seen to be only a symbol of Miss Chapman's deity," and the sacred cat of Egypt was discovered to be his exact image.

Let us frankly admit the foregoing statements to be intuition, revelation, or fabrication, according to the bias of the reader. In short, they are the evidence of sheer credulity and the substance of things that do not exist. Now to the proof:

1. Science now discards the idea that light and heat come from the sun. She regards them as engendered within the earth's atmosphere by its resistance to mutually interchanging forces. "Where now is thy God?"

2. The article, "Perversions of Scripture," placed immediately after Miss Chapman's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 8th effectually exploded her theory of monotheism back of myths and legends. Even the monotheism of the Hebrews is nothing but the varnish of translators. Now let Miss Chapman throw away her intuition and read the series of Hibbert Lectures by Count Goblet D'Alviella on "The Origin and Growth of the Idea of God" (1891).

3. Her Zoroastrian "symbol" met its Waterloo in the splendid sermon of M. W. Chunn, published simultaneously in the Boston Investigator, showing that Zoroastrianism was simply crude nature worship, having originally no reference to God or fire.

4. The mysterious "presence" back of myths and legends is thus dragged to light by the Rev. G. W. Cox, of Oxford: "The great stream of mythology has at last been traced to its fountain head. · · · These legends represent a stage in human language when the idioms of conscious life were applied to all external objects. · · · Every phrase became a picture, · · · and not a few of these phrases hav come down to us in their earliest form. These phrases are the myths that became legends of heroes and gods so soon as their meanings were forgotten. · · · The most intricate myths hav earlier forms where the physical meanings are no longer a doubt."

And Miss Chapman's intuition has mistaken this secular vagabond (the poverty of primitiv speech) for an omnipotent God.

5. Her intuition has also confused Zoroastrianism with magism, the so-called "fire worship" of the ancient Scythians. They worshiped no gods, and permitted no symbols, images, nor temples, but worshiped the physical elements themselvs—viz., fire, water, earth, air, sun, moon, the naked sword," etc. (see Rawlinson's "Third Monarchy"). Thus does her omnipotent deity shrivel to nothing in so-called "fire worship."

The phrase, "Brother Benson and other professed Atheists," may be either a guess or an inspiration, but it does not express a fact, for I hav never professed either Atheism or Theism.

Let us understand each other. I do not say there is no divine wisdom. The universe may be full of it. But since no human being has yet discovered even the shadow of its appearing, it is, to us, as if it were not. And since all men are fallible, none can be guided by "unerring wisdom."

Now, what I do say is, that it is immoral to state as fact that which is not known to be fact. It is a fraud, the "wisdom" of which is not "justified by the result."

Let us now turn to modern thought. Briefly its principles are:

Man has arisen from a lowly origin, and is still rising. He could not hav fallen from paradise.

All human knowledge has been wrought out, primarily, by slow and painful experience; not handed down ready-made from heaven. 'Tis not God, but experience, that reveals to the burnt child the nature of fire. And this costly foundation underlies all actual knowledge. 'Tis the golden ladder, whose steps lead up to heaven.

Man is not religious by nature. Man's primary nature is that of the lower animals; none of the lower animals is worshipful.

Primeval man had no religion. The religions of the world are all acquired practices, and only a fraction of the race hav acquired them.

There is no universal craving. It is an orthodox fiction. The craving for strong drink is much more general, and even it is far in the minority.

Belief in God and eternal life are not necessarily refining influences. Rawlinson, the historian, though a friend to Christianity, admits that Monotheism has always been more intolerant than polytheism.

And Dr. Austin Flint, in a recent number of the Youth's Companion, ably maintains that great longevity can be secured only by such paramount consideration of self as to be wholly incompatible with a life of self-sacrificing usefulness. Hence to desire extreme longevity argues supreme selfishness.

Rev. J. W. Chadwick admits that belief in immortality is regarded as ignoble by a great many people, and that an appalling amount of evil must be charged up to its account.

Remember these beliefs invented the cruelest thing this world has ever conceived—the Inquisition. They conjured up the unspeakable horror of a never-ending, purposeless hell. And how dare they cast the first stone at Atheism? May it not be that these beliefs combined constitute the greatest "peril to the whole cause of humanity" that our race will ever confront?

Thus far, as science has penetrated the unknown, she has overthrown preëxisting opinions, and compelled new terms to express the new discoveries.

The divine mystery may be no exception. So if science shall find out God, and know him face to face, we shall probably call him by some other name.

Till then, the ignorant will contend about his quality, and the crafty will conjure by his name, for in the absence of knowledge, guessing, intuition, and revelation will hold high carnival.

Concerning the Single Tax, we are told by Eli Perkins that the Chinese hav enjoyed its blessings for six thousand years, and still the "wild beast struggle for survival" goes on. And some do say that same struggle is the power unto salvation, without the spur of which our race would become too shiftless to exist.

I am surprised that Miss Chapman still clings to the orthodox fable of a golden age in the eternal past, where want, cruelty, and selfishness were unknown, and whence man has wandered far over to "diabolical perversity" and dark despair, relieved only by the cheerful remembrance that the same unerring wisdom which has guided the race from the gladness of heaven to the blackness of despair, still directs all earthly affairs, and, in the nick of time, will yet snatch a few of the best of us from the impending cataclysm of red ruin. And with consistent infatuation she asks, "If this is not progress, will Brother Benson tell us the meaning of progress?"

Over against this ghastly tragedy, science has set her glad new story of evolution. Nay, more, she has unveiled the very pathway over which man's weary feet hav traveled all the long journey from the most brutish conditions up to our present fairly intellectual estate, wherein the average modern home actually transcends the ancient idea of heaven.

And from this long index of expanding glory she bids us plume the flight of future expectations, till men shall walk as angels, and the tireless hands of men and women shall robe this earth in brighter felicity than mortal eyes hav ever seen or human hearts conceived. And this is the progress of modern thought.

Now Miss Chapman believes in the service of humanity and the possibility of an earthly heaven. If she should make them her supreme trust, and instead of giving all the praise to God and all the depravity to man—instead of gazing into the sky for wisdom and mighty salvation—she should put her whole confidence in human endeavor, and her whole solicitude into the rising generation, would humanity be the loser, and Miss Chapman be dehumanized? It seems to me that one more angel would be drawn from the cold distant sky, transfigured and saved in a heaven among men.

Every species in animated nature is made up of ephemeral individuals. 'Tis the species only that goes on forever. If the human species be not an exception, we must be content to achieve the humble purpose of human ephemera; to rejoice in the glory of our little day, and, falling as the leaves of autumn, by the way, deliver our race from birth to birth in one glad springtime of eternal youth, onward to a sublimer to-morrow.

Thus hope and life itself are swallowed up in posterity; and the soul that shall thus unfold will build upon an eternal foundation, and leave an everlasting inheritance to the glad new race that shall rise out of his ashes.

For the places we occupy and the opportunities we monopolize are the apples of immortality, forever ripening for the coming children of the race. There is no "dreary muddle" here, but an intense purpose and a clear-cut way of life.

We are builders in a golden stairway leading up to many mansions of earthly excellence, and in due time we must set the gates ajar and "go hence," that brighter lives may rise upon the steps we laid.

In this philosophy there would seem to be little room for personal immortality, but he that shall lose his life in the bosom of his race shall put on such immortality as shall shine above the stars while the race endures.

And this is the faith of science, the last best gift of the spirit of life. Only a child to-day; but when she shall come in bridal splendor, to enter upon her estate, she will gather her jewels from the uttermost ends of the earth, every gem of human excellence—for they are all the property of the race—and she will adorn humanity as the brightness of the morning, adding many a luster born into the world with her.

We find her sublime charity a safe refuge for the soul, where no enemy dares mock us nor make us afraid. A very Gibraltar of strength, from which the billows of human creeds retire broken and scattered. S. F. BENSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Working and Shirking.

A grasshopper met a bumble bee
In a field of sweet red clover;
"Oh, why this flurry and haste?" cried he,
"I've brought my fiddle along with me,
Let's dance till the summer's over!"

"I'm gathering stores for the winter time,"
The bee cried over his shoulder;
"I like your fiddling, it is sublime,
But living here in this changeable clime,
I must think of the days that are colder."

The grasshopper laughed in a mocking way,
As gaily he flourished his fiddle;
A troop of butterflies, pretty and gay,
Danced in a ring the livlong day,
While the grasshopper stood in the middle.

The bumble bee was fond of a dance,
And the day was hot for working;
But he never gave them a second glance,
And hastened away (if near them by chance),
For he knew the danger of shirking.

He gathered his stores through the sunny hours,
And felt that his pleasures were coming;
He knew that soon there would be no flowers;
He knew that in winter the cold sky lowers;
And he kept up a cheerful humming!

The cold winds came and the days grew dark,
And frozen were flower and berry;
The fiddler and dancers lay stiff and stark,
In lonely graves with never a mark;
But the wise little bee made merry.

The Twins.

Two little twin brothers I know
Who neither will cry, fight, nor worry,
And we all like the little dears so,
That whenever they're absent we're sorry.

The one is a queer blondie elf,
The other brunette and called Thomas,
And if walking I go by myself
The blonde makes a terrible rumpus.

The darlings I wish you could see,
I'm certain that Thomas and Bunny
Would keep you in best company—
Our doggies so cute and so funny.

Cressbrook.

Those who hav read "The Story Hour" will remember the sketch entitled "Cressbrook Cottage." That was no fancy sketch but a reality. When it was written there was in the owner's mind a foreshadowing of still other graces that might some day come to light at Cressbrook, as greenhouses, a horse and carriage, a Jersey cow, and some other additions.

In the passing years these visions hav been fully realized. Effort and industry hav produced all except the Jersey cow, and that might be also, if the proprietor of Cressbrook cared to introduce her upon the premises.

There are now seven large greenhouses upon the place, all filled with blooming plants—roses, pinks, lilies, ferns, palms, and many rare exotics—and the owner of them all has become the leading florist of Fall River, Mass., and vicinity. It is a pleasure to walk through the lovely grounds, adorned and beautified by fountain and statuary.

Mr. Warburton, assisted by his son, Mr. C. Warburton, has toiled hard late and early to make this place what it is to-day. When a spinner in a cotton-mill, fair dreams of what might be, floated through his mind of all that now the eye beholds; but it seemed almost impossible that the dreams would materialize, but yet they all came by persistent trying.

Now, there is an object-lesson here, or this would not hav been written. The sketch illustrates that work will win. Mr. Warburton set an ideal and resolved to reach it. It was done only by earnest effort and many days and years of wearisome toil.

Abstemious habits, the non-use of tobacco and alcohol, were aids in the course pursued, and placed him on the high road to health and fortune.

In the interval that has elapsed between the sketch in "The Story Hour" and this time there are some notes of sadness that hav floated over Cressbrook. Jerry, the skylark that

Like a poet hidden
In the light of thought,
Singing hymns unbidden,
Till the world is wrought
To sympathy with hopes and fears it heedeth not, soared aloft, one day, sang his sweetest song, folded his wings and died. Polly, too, the intelligent African parrot, sickened, gasped, and spoke no more. And Mrs. Warburton, the loving helpmate and true friend, whose eventful life was full of interest, after a brief illness, fell into the sweet slumber that knows no care or trouble. But life has always its compensations. Other songsters trill sweet songs in the little white cottage, and two little grandsons, Jimmy and Chatty, run in and out in love with life and making sunshine everywhere they go.

The comfort and competence that hav been achieved at Cressbrook may be won by others. Because a person is a spinner or weaver in a mill, a mechanic, a journeyman carpenter or stone-cutter, is no reason that he should always remain so. At the Lick Observatory in California, upon the work-bench used by James Lick, is a silver plate bearing the following inscription: "This work-bench was brought from South America to San Francisco in 1847 by James Lick. The foundation of his large fortune and the source of his power to confer great and lasting benefits upon his fellow-citizens and upon mankind was honest and faithful labor."

Honest and faithful labor! It is the key that unlocks the door of many mysteries. It puts education in the mind and fortune in the possession of those who would achieve it. "Skill to do comes by doing;" and a keen, comprehensiv brain watches for and seizes the opportunities that lead to advancement. Labor is the great conqueror. Scorn it not, for by it hav been accomplished all things of value and interest to the race. S. H. W.

"Right Living."

Our good friend Pauline Van Hoeter, of Grass Valley, Cal., thus writes of our new book, "Right Living": "It is a treasure, for the old as well as the young. It is a book one can read again and again and yet again with pleasure and profit each time." Similar good words come to us from many sources, and while we are grateful for such commendation, we are thereby inspired to renewed effort and, we trust, still higher and better work. Our purpose in life is to scatter seeds of goodness, hoping that thus there may be some uplift in right ways of living.—ED. C. C.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Will you please insert the inclosed obituary in the Corner? We sent it to our county paper, but they failed to print it, possibly because it set forth natural principles rather than superstitious belief.

MR. and MRS. F. A. ABBOTT.

OBITUARY.

In memory of Baby Abbott, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. John W. Abbott.

"Baby is dead!" More pitiful words were never framed by human lips. But life is a bubble that comes and goes like waves upon the seashore, and like the waves it asks not our consent. We are governed by the inexorable laws of Nature and she is no respecter of persons. The tender bud, the flowering stem, the sere and barren bough are all alike to her; her messenger is death, to whom all must bow although a thousand heartstrings bar the way; but she is kind. Before our birth in sweet unconsciousness she guards our life; in death she folds us in a dreamless sleep, and with the pall comes rest. But for our dead we hav no fears, and no tears for him shall pave the way to nature's rest. 'Tis for ourselvs we mourn. We miss the dimpled hand, the velvet cheek, the sweet warm breath of one we loved; 'tis this we lose and our part is the hardest now. But in the weary years to come, had he lived, when thorns perchance should pierce his feet on the hot dusty road of life and we would be powerless to smooth the way, how sad our hearts would then hav been! He has missed it all and it is all his gain; and though our selfish love would call him back 'tis better as it is.

Little brother, thou hast left us,
And our hearts are lonely now,
But though shadows fold about us
Care shall never mar thy brow.

Scarcely had the sun arisen
On the morning of thy life
Ere death came to take our baby
From this world of ceaseless strife.

Purest ray of golden sunshine,
Ours to hold for one brief hour;
Love could no longer keep thee,
Death was stronger than our power.

We hav laid thee in the garden,
Where shall bloom the summer flowers;
While we mourn for thy departure,
'Tis thy gain, the loss is ours.

MOTHER.

[We sympathize with our friends for the loss of their baby boy. It is hard to part with the young, hard to say a last farewell to any of our loved ones, but all is in the ordering of Nature, and that which comes to the infant comes to us all soon or late. We hav to bear the inevitable with patience and philosophical calmness. With our dead all is well.—ED. C. C.]

SCRANTON, PA., Oct. 23, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am sick, and hav to stay home from school, I thought I would while my time away trying to write a letter to you and the little members of the Children's Corner. My throat and neck are sore and I do not feel very good. I am nine years old. There was a man in this place who preached, and he stayed here about six weeks. He got the people pretty nearly wild. Mamma and I attended one of his meetings just for fun. I came near laughing out loud in church. He said that when your children hav learned how to play a game of cards, and go to dancing-school, it is time they should be taken away from you by the beautiful savior. I wonder if Jesus's mother would hav liked to hav him taken away from her. If she did, she must be different from most people. He said that there were three kinds of beauty: Some you can buy in drug-stores, and some is in your looks, but he said the best beauty was in your heart. Then he repeated this verse, "Favor is deceitful, beauty is vain, but whosoever feareth God shall be saved." Well, now, if God is so almighty good, why should we fear him? If some man was so very good to me, I don't think I would be afraid of him, would you? All the girls up this way believe so strongly in the churches that you cannot speak a word to them about Freethought, for they will take it as an insult. I would like to correspond with some of the members of the Corner, for I know that I could let a word out to them without having them take it as an insult. My address is 524 Lackawana av., Scranton, Pa.

Your little friend,
MARY L. MERRITT.

[We hope Mary will soon be able to be in school again. We hav no fear for her, and we are sure she can hold her own in any controversy regarding such dreadful preaching as she relates. Dancing is a healthful and agreeable exercise, and card-playing an innocent and amusing pastime. When indulged in to excess, or in any immoral way, they are evil, as are some other things that are perverted.

One who could steal children from their parents is the worst kind of thief.

Let us think the preacher misrepresented matters, through ignorance or otherwise. Our children are our jewels. We cannot spare one.—ED. C. C.]

Books by SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),
Editor of the London Agnostic Journal.

GOD AND HIS BOOK.
When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think.' It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.
The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.
A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.
A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christion Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.
Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.
This books reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.
The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.
By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. Paper, 10c.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.
Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. Paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.
A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same or more interest than Helen Gardener's story 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" Paper, 25 cents.

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE. Collected and edited by Moncure Daniel Conway. Volume II. 1779–1792. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price per volume, $2.50.

This volume contains: Peace and the Newfoundland Fisheries; The American Philosophical Society; Emancipation of Slaves; Public Good; Letter to the Abbé Raynal; Dissertations on Government, the Affairs of the Bank, and Paper Money; The Society for Political Inquiries; Prospects on the Rubicon; Specification of Thomas Paine; Letter to Jefferson in Paris; Answer to Four Questions on the Legislativ and Executiv Powers; Address and Declaration; The Rights of Man; the Rights of Man, Part Second.

Mr. Conway has written an Introduction to the "Rights of Man," and from it we glean many items of interest to the admirer of the great humanitarian writer and worker. When Paine left America for France in April, 1787, he was, says Mr. Conway, "perhaps as happy a man as any in the world. His most intimate friend, Jefferson, was Minister at Paris, and his friend Lafayette was the idol of France. His fame had preceded him, and he at once became, in Paris, the center of the same circle of savants and philosophers that had surrounded Franklin. His main reason for proceeding at once to Paris was that he might submit to the Academy of Sciences his invention of an iron bridge, and with its favorable verdict he came to England, in September." Leaving with a publisher his "Prospects on the Rubicon," he visited his mother at Thetford, and then made arrangements to patent his bridge and to construct the large model of it afterwards exhibited on Paddington Green, London. Leading statesmen like Fox and Landsdowne welcomed him to England. Edmund Burke was especially cordial in his attentions, having him as a guest at Beaconsfield and driving about the country with him. Paine had at that time no revolutionary intentions as regarded either France or England. He was grateful to Louis XVI. for the aid he had rendered the colonies, and toward George III. he cherished no unkind feelings. He had become convinced by his residence in Paris that a political reformation was on the way there, and he thought that it would reorganize the state after the American model except that the crown would be preserved, and he did not object to the compromise, provided that the throne be not hereditary. However, events were accelerated faster than he had judged probable, and he was recalled by Lafayette, Condorcet, and others to advise as to the constitution. "Such," remarks Mr. Conway, "was the situation immediately preceding the political and literary duel between Paine and Burke, which in the event turned out a tremendous war between royalism and republicanism in Europe. Paine was, both in France and in England, the inspirer of moderate counsels. . . . Until Burke's arraigment of France in his parliamentary speech (Feb. 9, 1790), Paine had no doubt whatever that he would sympathize with the movement in France, and wrote to him from that country as if conveying glad tidings. Burke's 'Reflections on the Revolution in France' appeared November 1, 1790, and Paine at once set himself to answer it. He was then staying at the Angel Inn, Islington." The pamphlet, though sold at three shillings, had a vast circulation, and Paine gave the proceeds to the Constitutional societies which his teachings had called into existence.

Then there appeared Burke's "Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs," in which he quoted at some length from the "Rights of Man," but "replied to it only with exclamation points," saying that the only answer it merited was "criminal justice." Next came Part Second of the "Rights of Man." Mr. Conway thinks there is no doubt that Burke instigated the prosecution of this last publication. When the time of trial came (Dec. 18, 1793), Paine was in his seat in the Convention. Paine stood for liberty of discussion; Burke would criminally prosecute sentiments as mild as those in the First Part of the "Rights of Man." Paine labored to make the change in France a peaceful one, while Burke "fomented the league of monarchs against France which maddened its people, and brought on the Reign of Terror." The reader of this volume will follow with much interest Mr. Conway's comparison of the work of these two men.

Paine saw that the individual might be oppressed by the majority as well as by the king and by privileged classes, and hence he sought to safeguard him with a declaration of rights which could not be traversed by any government, and he would "reduce government to an association limited in its operations to the defense of those rights which the individual is unable, alone, to maintain." We reap the harvest whose seeds he sowed. Were it not for the Constitution the theocrats would long since hav destroyed the last vestige of religious liberty in this country. Similarly, a dual system of legislation operates as a check upon the schemes of the ambitious sectarists and other enemies of liberty. The people are so often carried off their feet by violent emotional storms that it is well that we can wait for the "sober second thought" which is pretty sure to come, if we hav not plunged over the precipice under the influence of the first panic impulse.

Mr. Conway givs in this edition both the French and English prefaces to the "Rights of Man."

The publishers hav done their part as regards typography, paper, presswork, and binding, and the volume, like its predecessor, is in every way worthy of the "Author-Hero."

As showing what a change has come over the literary public as regards the estimation in which it now holds the once almost universally execrated Thomas Paine, we subjoin a review of this volume, which we find in the New York Times:

"The appearance of the second volume of Mr. Conway's edition of Paine's writings recalls the pleasure and interest awakened by the appearance of the first, an event now distant from us by many months. The work he has undertaken for Paine was a work which should hav been undertaken long ago, but, having waited for Mr. Conway to perform it, the public is fortunate in having it done so well. Here are shown ample knowledge, intelligent care, true devotion, and loyal industry. When Mr. Conway issued his biography of Paine, he performed a service to the memory of Paine that was great with the greatness of patient industry and love of justice, rewarded with the applause of readers. Paine's memory no longer, at the hands of any intelligent man, will suffer from that load of obloquy which unthinking zealots so long burdened it with. Paine was a devoted and powerful friend of mankind, and his services can no longer with reason be obscured or disparaged.

"The present volume contains material of first importance, embracing as it does the 'Letter to the Abbé Raynal,' and the famous reply to Burke, entitled 'The Rights of Man.' For the latter work Mr. Conway has written an introduction that contains more than one interesting statement. He even identifies the place where Paine was living in London when Burke astonished him by publishing his 'Reflections on the Revolution in France.' Until shortly before that work appeared, Paine had had no doubt that Burke would sympathize with the upheaval in France, and, in that belief, had written to him from Paris as if he were sending details that would giv him joy. But so soon as the 'Reflections' appeared, Paine, in a London hotel, began to write his reply to that work. This hotel has been twice rebuilt since that time, and nothing of the original remains, save a small image, which appears to hav been intended as a representation of Liberty. Paine's pamphlet was issued at the same price as Burke's—3*s.*—and leaped at once into an immense circulation. Paine's receipts from it were given to societies which had sprung up in response to his teachings.

"Mr. Conway reminds us that Paine's work was 'the earliest complete statement of republican principles,' and by Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson it was declared to contain the fundamental principles of the American republic. Paine did not reproduce the principles of Rousseau and Locke. The principles he set forth 'were evolved out of his early Quakerism,' and hence they ran back not to Rousseau and Locke, but to George Fox. Fatal to all privilege and rank was the Quaker belief that 'every human soul was the child of God and capable of direct inspiration from the father of all, without mediation or priestly intervention or sacramental instrumentality.' This was applied by Paine to the individual's rights in the state.

"This pamphlet is interesting reading even to-day. There are to be seen alertness of mind, brightness of statement, warmth of interest in the human race, and fearlessness toward Burke and the English monarchy that rouse one's enthusiasm to good hights. Paine is never the ill-mannered antagonist. He preserves his urbanity, but he is relentless in his logic and in his adherence to the faith that lay under his waistcoat. The reader will find it worth his while to peruse a few passages from this work, as reprinted below:

"A greater absurdity cannot present itself to the understanding of man than what Mr. Burke offers to his readers. He tells them, and he tells the world to come, that a certain body of men who existed a hundred years ago made a law, and that there does not exist in the nation, nor ever will, nor ever can, a power to alter it. Under how many subtleties and absurdities has the divine right to govern been imposed on the credulity of mankind!"

"The Parliament of 1688 might as well hav passed an act to hav authorized themselvs to liv forever as to make their authority liv forever."

"I know a place in America called Point-no-Point, because, as you proceed along the shore, gay and flowery as Mr. Burke's language, it continual y recedes and presents itself at a distance before you; but when you hav got as far as you can go, there is no point at all. Just thus it is with Mr. Burke's 365 pages."

"I can c nsider Mr. Burke's book in scarcely any other light than a dramatic performance; and he must, I think, hav considered it in the same light himself by the poetical liberties he has taken of omitting some facts, distorting others, and making the whole machinery bend to produce a stage effect."

"The French constitution says that the number of representativs for any place shall be in a ratio to the number of taxable inhabitants or electors. What article will Mr Burke place against this? The county of York, which contains nearly a million of souls, sends two county members; and so does the county of Rutland, which contains not a hundredth part of that number. The old town of Sarum, which contains not three houses, sends two members, and the town of Manchester, which contains upward of sixty thousand souls, is not admitted to send any. Is there any principle in these things?"

"Paine's hottest shot was reserved for that part of his work which he calls the 'miscellaneous chapter.' Here he did rake the principle of monarchy fore and aft. 'As to who is king in England or elsewhere,' he said, 'or whether the people choose a Cherokee chief or a Hessian hussar for a king, it is not a matter that I trouble myself about—be that to themselvs; but with respect to the doctrin, so far as it relates to the right of men and nations, it is as abominable as anything ever uttered in the most enslaved country under heaven.' Through this chapter runs the fiery indignation of Paine that admirably recalls to us a good deal that was most potent in the American Revolution. It is pervaded by italics, and not only small capitals, but full capitals diversify its pages. One of Paine's most impassioned paragraphs is the following:

"'Whether it be from a sense of shame, or from a consciousness of some radical defect in a government necessary to be kept out of sight, or from any other cause, I undertake not to determin, but so it is that a monarchial reasoner never traces government to its source or from its source. It is one of the Shibboleths by which he may be known. A thousand years hence those who shall liv in America or France will look back with contemplativ pride on the origin of their government and say, 'This was the work of our glorious ancestors!' But what can a monarchial talker say? What has he to exult in? Alas, he has nothing. A certain something forbids him to look back to a beginning, lest some robber, or some Robin Hood should rise from the long obscurity of time and say, 'I am the origin.' Hard as Mr. Burke labored at the Regency bill and hereditary succession two years ago and much as he dived for precedents, he still had not boldness enough to bring up William of Normandy and say, 'There is the head of the list! There is the fountain of honor! The son of a prostitute and the plunderer of the English nation.'"

A LIBERAL STORY.

Gems of Thought.

LITTE minds are tamed and subdued by misfortune, but great minds rise above them.—Washington Irving.

IT has been observed that they who most loudly clamor for liberty do not most liberally grant it.—Sam Johnson.

DIOGENES being asked which beast's bite was the most dangerous replied: "If you mean the wild beasts it is the slanderer; if tame beasts, the flatterer."

GOD is a guess. If the existence of God is admitted, how are we to prove that he inspired the writers of the books of the Bible?—Robert G. Ingersoll.

MISERY has necessarily to be borne by a constitution out of harmony with its conditions; and a constitution inherited from primitiv men is out of harmony with the conditions imposed on existing men. Hence it is impossible to establish forthwith a satisfactory social state.—Herbert Spencer.

So SHALL they build me altars in their zeal,
Where knaves shall minister and fools shall kneel;
Where faith may mutter o'er her mystic spell
Written in blood, and bigotry may swell
The sail he spreads for heaven with blasts from hell. —Moore.

WE boast our emancipation from many superstitions; but if we hav broken any idols, it is through a transfer of the idolatry. What hav I gained that I no longer immolate a bull to Jove, or to Neptune, or a mouse to Hecate; that I do not tremble before the Eumenides or the Catholic purgatory or the Calvinistic judgment day—if I quake at opinion, the public opinion, as we call it?—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

I WOULD preach to every man rebellion. Hold preciously to yourself the final decision. Reverence authority that you elect and refuse authority which others attempt to impose upon you. Do not love the atmosphere of courts and churches, of formal culture and polite and urbane emasculation. Do not play sheep to another's shepherd. Violate no other soul, and hold your own soul defiant to the foot of the robber.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE hell which a thoroughly bad man dreads can only be a hell of physical suffering; and, if he abstains from crime through fear of fire, he is not a good man, but a bad man in chains. If, again, he is a bad man, he will hav a bad God, and his religion will be a sanction for cruelty and immorality. And his God must be, in any case, an unjust God, who creates him as a sinner, and then inflicts monstrous punishments upon him for sinning. A conception which necessarily makes the ruler of the universe an embodiment of injustice cannot be favorable to morality when its meaning is fully realized.—Leslie Stephen.

WE see clearly that it is good for every man among us that he and every other man should be as tall, as strong, as well-knit, as supple, as wholesome, as effectiv, as free from vice and defect as possible. We see clearly that it is his first duty to make his own muscles, his own organs, his own bodily functions, as perfect as he can make them, and to transmit them in like perfection, unspoilt, to his descendants. We see clearly that it is good for every woman among us that she and every other woman should be as physically developed and as finely equipped for her place as mother as it is possible to make herself. We see that it is good for every woman that there should be such men, and for every man that there should be such women. We see it is good for every child that it should be born of such a father and such a mother.—Grant Allen.

THE Christian man, however clad, still presumes too much. While the natural man does all the good, the Christian man takes all the credit. He declares, indeed, that the civilization of Europe is his work. Briefly and frankly, civilization is mainly a matter of race, and is for the most part the product of Teutonic peoples—peoples who were the last to embrace Christianity, and the first to disarm, disable, and discard it. In like manner it was because of race, and not of religion, that the great Christian cities—Jerusalem, Alexandria, Constantinople — were wrenched from Christian hands. If progress were due to supernatural forces, it should surely hav been most rapid when those forces were most powerful; it should be most rapid now in those people whose belief is the most intense, and whose religious observances are the most scrupulous. Europe should now be sitting at the feet of Ireland and Spain.—Furneaux Jordan.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States. and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures. being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed — probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. - - - - - -	$1.00

Something

QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

Two runaway convicts took refuge in a church which was having an experience meeting. They listened to the stories told by several of the regenerated, until one of the fellows exclaimed, in a whisper, to the other, "Come, Jim, let's get out o' this! THE war in the East is improving as a source of news. The naval battle off the Yalu river made, on the whole, very fair reading. Of course, where heathens are thumping one another, there is not quite the same thrill about the proceedings as where enlightened Christians fall to, but the fact that the ships on both sides were Christian ships of modern pattern, helped matters very much, and made it seem more like authentic warfare.—Life.

IT was little Ernest's bedtime. He knelt beside his mother and lisped, as thousands of little tongues would do, that evening, "Now I lay me down to sleep." Ernest not only prayed at night, but asked a blessing on each meal. He finished the prayer in great haste, as though some other thought was crowding it out of the little mind, and said, looking earnestly into the eyes above him, "Say, mamma, is this the same feller I ask the blessing of?"—Voice.

JOHN BULL is a reasonable man; he is a reflecting and moral character; and he fights to promote trade, to maintain peace and order on the face of the earth, and for the good of mankind in general. If John Bull conquers a nation, it is to improve its position in this world and secure its welfare in the next. If he goes after fresh fields and pastures new, he takes the Bible with him; then, by and by, the nativs hav got the Bible, and he has got the land. He has not the slightest doubt the whole world was meant for him. And not only this one—John Bull considers the kingdom of heaven is incontestably a British possession.—Max O'Rell.

MANY stories—how true I do not know—were told by Mr. A—— and his wonderful would-be converts. Here is one. An old widow, Bryan, called on him, and on being shown into his library and asked by him what her business was, she said, "Well, now, your reverence, it's what—I'd like to turn Protestant." Mr. A.: "Why do you wish to change your religion?" Widow B.: "Well, now, I'm told your reverence givs a blanket and a leg of mutton to anyone that turns." Mr. A.: "Do you mean to say that you would sell your soul for a blanket?" Widow B.: "No, your reverence, not without the leg of mutton."—W. R. La Fanu.

BACK in Marion county, Ind., there is a little town on the Johnson county line of about three hundred people. A stranger came into the town one Sunday, and walking out from the hotel saw a little white church and a crowd going in. He noticed that it was a Lutheran church. He went on and in the next block saw a little brown church, and was surprised to see that it was also a Lutheran church. He went back to the hotel and told the proprietor that it struck him as strange that in a little town like this, hardly able to sustain one church, there could be two churches just alike. "What do you mean?" asked the landlord. The stranger told him what he had seen. "Oh," replied the landlord, "you are mistaken. Those two churches are somewhat alike, but not just alike. Over in the white church they believe that the serpent tempted Eve, and Eve tempted Adam, and Adam fell; but over in the brown church they think that Adam was a bad egg from the start."—One of Lafe Pence's Stories.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. BY the collapse of the Montreal Street Railway Company's building several men were killed and wounded.

PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON, the essayist and art critic, died in London on Nov. 6. He was born Sept. 10, 1834.

THERE is a cabinet crisis in Chili, while in Argentina a new cabinet has been formed, which is not expected to last very long.

ON Oct. 15 a volcano on the island of Ambrym, in the New Hebrides group, destroyed all the nativ villages on one side of the island.

REAR ADMIRAL BANCROFT GHERADI, of the United States Navy, went on the retired list on Nov. 10, having reached the age of sixty-two.

THERE was a transit of Mercury on Nov. 11, the planet touching the sun's disk at 11 A.M. in this latitude, and its passage was observed for five hours.

THE volcano of Colima in Mexico is in activ eruption, and fifteen deaths hav been reported in the same country as the result of the recent earthquake.

THREE thousand Armenians, including women and children, are reported massacred near Moosh, Turkish Armenia, by the Kurds. Turkish officers deny the story.

THE genial caricaturist "Chip" (Frank P. W. Bellew) died last week. He was the son of a popular artist, Frank Bellew, famous a generation ago. He was only thirty-two years old.

THE Supreme Court of New Jersey has decided that the wagon license law under which Asbury Park and other boroughs collected fees from the owners of delivery wagons is unconstitutional.

A COLLISION between a passenger and a freight train on the Baltimore and Ohio road occurred at Rosen Steel Siding in Pennsylvania, on Nov. 7, whereby six persons were killed and two wounded.

GUILLAUME LOUIS FIGUIER, the celebrated French scientist and author, died in Paris on Nov. 10. He wrote more than eighty volumes besides his memoirs and magazine contributions. He was born in 1819.

EX-GOVERNOR WILLIAM E. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, has been appointed a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners by the president. The office carries no salary, traveling expenses only being allowed.

THE Committee of Seventy, which did so much toward the overthrow of Tammany, will probably continue in existence indefinitly, or at least until the new city officers hav reorganized the various departments.

IT is reported from Washington that in order to repair the gold reserve and to provide for its maintenance at $100,000,000, five per cent bonds will be issued on a three per cent basis. Some dailies, however, deny the report.

THE Hovas government of Madagascar seems disposed to resist the aggressions of the French. Since the death of the Czar the latter are apparently inclined to move a little more slowly, not being so sure of the support of Russia as they were.

FOR some time a fight has been on between the white and colored screwmen at New Orleans. The former hav thrown the tools of the latter out of the ships, and hav also killed some of them. On November 12th an incendiary fire destroyed cotton to the value of $500,000.

FIRE broke out on ten of thirteen ships loading with cotton at Savannah, on Nov. 6 and 7. The fires were undoubtedly incendiary, and it is suspected that the employment of non-union labor by the shipping companies had something to do with the attempted destruction.

ARGENTINA is rapidly coming to the front as the rival of the United States in the breadstuffs, meat, tallow, hides, and wool markets of the world. The area adapted to wheat is about equal to that of this country, and at present it costs the agriculturists only about half as much to get their products to the shipping ports as it does our farmers.

ONE of the Japanese armies is rapidly approaching Moudken, the capital of Manchooria, while another has surrounded Port Arthur on the land side and captured several outlying forts. Chinchin and Talien-wan hav been taken by the Japanese. It is reported that the United States government has offered to intervene between the belligerents.

MAJOR-GEN. O. O. HOWARD, having reached the age limit, was last week put on the retired list of the United States Army, and Brig.-Gen. Alexander McDowell McCook, the oldest of the ten "fighting McCook" brothers, was promoted to the major generalship over the heads of Ruger, Merritt, and Brook. He will retire for age the 22d of next April and then the others will have a chance. Col. James W. Forsyth takes McCook's place as brigadier.

THE election on the 6th inst. resulted in the overwhelming triumph of the Republicans. The landslide was equal to that for the Democrats in 1890. The Democratic majority in the House of Representativs has been overcome and the Republicans hav instead a majority of about 150. In the Senate the Populists will hold the balance of power, although some may vote with the Republicans to organize the Senate. Illinois, Wisconsin, New York, New Jersey, Missouri, and Delaware hav gone into the Republican camp. Even Tennessee and California are in doubt. Tammany was overthrown in this city, the combined opposition winning by from forty to fifty thousand, and Hill had barely 3,000 plurality in the town, and was beaten in the state by 157,000. Wheeler, independent Democrat, received about 26,000. The new constitution was adopted, and the rapid transit scheme favored in this city as well as the inquiry proposition regarding consolidation. In the whole country the Populists probably doubled their vote, although their representation in the next House will be less than that in the present, unless some of their nominees are seated on contest. They lost four Congressmen, the state officers, and the legislature in Kansas, and everything but one Congressman (Bell) in Colorado. They saved Kem (probably) in Nebraska, and elected Holcomb governor. In Minnesota they lost one, but gained one in Alabama, and four, by fusion, in North Carolina, while Newlands, Silver, was reelected in Nevada. They will hav one Senator by fusion in North Carolina as will the Republicans, and Tillman, of South Carolina, belongs with them on financial issues. In Texas they came very near securing two or three representativs, and hav greatly reduced the Democratic majority. There the Republicans get one Congressman, for the first time since reconstruction days. The Democratic defeat all over the country is largely due to the Democratic stay-at-homes, who amounted to 25 per cent of the usual Democratic vote in Arkansas and Massachusetts, for instance. In Maine Republican majorities were doubled, while their vote was increased only one per cent. Springer, Bland, Wilson, Hatch, Bynum, Holman, Simpson, Cummings, Tracy, Johnson, O'Neill, Fithian, Pence, Outhwaite, and many other leaders are left at home. Maguire, the Single Taxer, was the only Democrat saved in California. Adolph Sutro, nominated by the Populists and indorsed by the American Protectiv Association, was elected mayor of San Francisco on the Southern Pacific monopoly issue.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

A THANKSGIVING REMINDER.

The hypocrit sits at his sumptuous board,
And thanks the Lord for the feast before him,
With never a thought for the hungry horde
Who curse the hour their mothers bore them.

Thus Selfishness sits and stuffs at ease,
Drinks of his wines and liquors rare,
Seeking himself and his church to please
While many are dying in dumb despair.

Giv thanks to the Lord as you cut and carve
(He is watching the sparrows lest they fall);
There is food in abundance; yet thousands starve,
For the gourmand and hypocrit gets it all.

Can the Christian Be Happy?

The Christian Endeavorers recently held a national convention in Cleveland. An exchange quotes from another paper the remarks which follow, attributed to a motorman in that city:

"I never enjoyed anything better than that convention—and I didn't go to a single session, either. Every night, on my last run, I had a carload of those happy young folks, and to see their faces and hear them sing, was enough to giv a fellow an idea of religion such as he had never heard before. I had never known that Christians were so happy."

And real Christians of good character are never so happy. This poor motorman was able to observe but he could not reason. The creed of every orthodox church teaches that the vast majority of the human family is doomed to an eternity of excruciating agony in hell. Only the few will be saved. To thoughtful, conscientious men and women who really believe this there can never come true happiness. Their days and nights must be filled with horror. Only the shallow-minded or the vicious and cruel can believe in orthodox Christianity and be even partially happy. Those young people of the Christian Endeavor Society are Christians by inheritance, convention, and contagion only; if they believed in that religion as the Christians of other ages believed in it they would lock the chains of another Inquisition on the world. The person who actually believes that an eternity of pain or of joy depends upon what one believes in this world will stop at no crime which promises to save the "soul" of the doubter or the souls of those who might otherwise be lost through his heresy. With comparativly few exceptions, the Christian Endeavorers would not persecute in the name of Christian theology; the spirit of the age is against it, and they do not hav enough faith to strongly champion that which is unpopular, but they are ready to persecute in the name of "Christian morality," for that is the way in which the dogma of exclusiv salvation manifests itself in this century, a century which lies between the past epoch of faith and war and the coming epoch of science and solidarity. They think they believe, but they only accept, yet the old poison of intolerance is in their blood. In the ancient times Christians persecuted that the souls of men might be saved from a dreamed-of hell; at the present time Christians and some others, all of them having lost faith in hell, persecute to save the bodies of men from various real and imaginary hells on earth.

A Great Newspaper's Mistakes.

The Chicago Inter-Ocean appears to hav been considerably disturbed by the late lecture of Colonel Ingersoll in that city. Here is a specimen paragraph from an editorial in that paper:

"To many it may seem strange that the Press Club of Chicago, which by those who do not know better is believed to represent the most matured and best thought of the profession of journalism, frequently invites Colone Ingersoll to lecture upon a subject and in a manner that is insulting to the intelligence and aggravating [Mr. Nixon must mean irritating instead of aggravating] to the feelings of those who—and they form an immense majority of civilization—believe in the existence of God, in a written revelation of his character and purpose, and in the spiritual and temporal dependence of man upon him. This action of the Press Club is not representativ of the newspaper people."

Because the Inter-Ocean does not agree with Colonel Ingersoll does not seem to be a valid reason for the unkind fling at the Press Club. Its arguments would hav been just as strong with that omitted and then we should hav been less likely to suspect that its other remarks were inspired by bad temper or jealousy. But one clause in that sentence, taken in connection with an assertion which follows, calls for some comment. It is indirectly asserted that the most matured and best thought of the profession of journalism in Chicago is not favorable to the employment of Colonel Ingersoll to lecture before the Press Club, which may or may not be true, but when the additional statement is made that the immense majority of civilization "believe in the existence of God, in a written revelation of his character and purpose, and in the spiritual and temporal dependence of man upon him," we perceive that there is an attempt made to identify "the most matured and best thought" of the Press Club with the thought of the "immense majority of civilization" which accepts the creed named by the Inter-Ocean. Can it be possible that the Chicago paper believes that that "immense majority" of the nations which are called Christian and which accepts the Christian and Theistic dogmas enumerated is really possessed of the best and most matured thought of the civilized world? Where is the faith in those tenets the stronger—in the centers of literary and scientific culture or in the less advanced states and in the sections of all the states where ignorance is still the portion of the masses of the people? Is there more, or less, Freethought in Germany than in Spain and Portugal? In England and France than in Mexico and the Central and South American countries? In Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles than in the Vendean provinces? In London than in the country districts of England and Ireland? In the Northern than in the Southern states? Among the whites rather than among the blacks? All these questions are answered in the asking and they completely dispose of the Inter-Ocean's preposterous claim.

We hav little doubt that the action of the Chicago Press Club is representativ of "the newspaper people" of that town. We are well assured that the great majority of them like to hav the opportunity to hear Colonel Ingersoll speak and thank the Club for its enterprise in securing his services. It is quite probable that many of them are more or less orthodox in their views, but that will not always prevent their enjoying his satire and arguments. Of course, also, there are those among them who are the victims of the counting-room, and who are therefore compelled to say one thing when they think another. This is unfortunate for them and their readers, and we cannot help regretting that Colonel Ingersoll has not yet succeeded in so completely crippling the church that it can no longer prevent the expression of the real sentiments of the most timid citizen. But he has done much to make intellectual honesty possible for all without risk of starvation. It is well that the Chicago Press Club is disposed to help him in this good work, and we hope that it will keep right on in the same course, unmindful of the lamentations of a few belated journalists. But once more the Inter-Ocean:

"It is sufficient to say that Mr. Ingersoll does not rank among skeptics with Voltaire, or with Renan, or with Huxley, or even with Hume. Religiously, or irreligiously, he is the philosopher of the jejune. And to-day it is, as in other days it has been, the fashion of the jejune to affect what goes in cant as liberalism, but which is the extreme of intolerance, inasmuch as it seeks and delights to offend the sensibilities of Christendom."

It is the especial delight of Christian champions to assert that the present day advocates of Freethought are not to be compared, in ability and influence, with the noted Freethinkers who in past ages gave battle to the hosts of Christianity. This is supposed to effectually answer their arguments and dispose of their facts. Generally at other times there is nothing mean enough to say about those old Infidel heroes. The Christian protagonist, lay or clerical, is an odd specimen of humanity.

"Jejune" is an epithet that does not seem to hav any particular applicability to the young, earnest, vigorous, and conquering scientific Freethought of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. To call the Liberalism which demands equal rights for every citizen of the republic, no matter what his belief on the subject of religion, "the extreme of intolerance" is as ridiculous as it is unfair and untrue. To say that any Freethinker delights to "offend the sensibilities of Christians" is to plead the baby act. Until Christians repudiate the absurd and atrocious dogmas of their religion they must expect them to be argued against and satirized. Is the Freethinker to conceal his thoughts lest the expression of them should offend the sensibilities of Christians? Has the religionist ever been mindful of the sensibilities of the Freethinker to the extent of ceasing to preach the gospel of the Nazarene? Has he not sent missionaries into every corner of the world to argue against, misrepresent, ridicule, and lampoon the religious beliefs of the natives? More than this: Has not the Christian waged war against heathen nations, and against nations of Christians who differed from his own in regard to certain tenets of Christianity? Has he not tortured millions of his fellows because they had doubts regarding the truth of all the dogmas of the Christian religion, or regarding some of those dogmas, or were suspected of having such doubts, or were related to other unfortunates who had doubts, or were accused of having communication with the "father of lies"? Did he think about "sensibilities" then? Why, he tried then, as his successors do now, to make it appear that the agonized victim of the Inquisition was the aggressor, that he had disturbed the "peace of the children of God," that he had "offended their sensibilities." The Inter-Ocean would like to hav us believe that Colonel Ingersoll is an invader of the rights of his fellow citizens, when every unprejudiced person knows that he is fighting the battles of Freethought simply to liberate the minds of men from the thraldom of intolerant superstitions, and to giv to each citizen of the republic the rights and opportunities enjoyed by all other citizens. Let the Inter-Ocean plant itself on the platform of secularization, and labor for the total separation of church and state, and then it will hav a right to set itself up as a critic of intolerance, for its own skirts will be clear of that stain; but so long as it sanctions the injustice that givs to the members of churches privileges paid for by non-church members it has no call to complain of the attacks made upon that system of injustice, on the score that those attacks "offend the sensibilities" of those who are responsible for the existence and continuance of the injustice.

The Inter-Ocean says that Bacon, Voltaire, Napoleon, and Kant hav in "brilliant aphorisms" confirmed the edict of David, king of Israel, that "the fool hath said in his heart, there is no God," and it givs it as its opinion that "no member of the Press Club can stand on any side of this quadrilateral of immortal intelligences, nor can Mr. Ingersoll himself." It so happens that Colonel Ingersoll has not said "there is no God"; he has contented himself with rendering the verdict of "not proven," a verdict which has been concurred in by many very eminent Christians. The latter hav said that it never could be logically or scientifically demonstrated that there is a god, but that there must be one, or human life is a failure. As to the names of the great men which are hurled at the heads of the Atheist and Agnostic, it is sufficient to say that there is no belief, however absurd, which has not been accepted by men eminent in various departments of human thought and activity. A brilliant array of names could be marshaled to giv respectability to the superstition of demoniacal possession, but it is doubtful if even this "proof" would be sufficient to convince the editor of the Inter-Ocean of the reality of witchcraft. Beyond this, it may well be said that it is very probable that if the men named had lived in this age of scientific development, they would not so readily hav concurred in the dictum of the author of the Psalms.

"There are subjects upon which Mr. Ingersoll lectures without offense to the deepest and—whether he believes it or not—the holiest sentiments of mankind. · · · But the gentlemen who direct the affairs of the Press Club do not ask Mr. Ingersoll to lecture upon unobjectionable topics. They seem to take delight in parading themselvs as fautors of attack upon sentiments and opinions that are cherished as sacred by at least eight-tenths of all the citizens of Chicago and of more than eight-tenths of all that is brainy, all that is constructiv, and all that is decent."

Where do we find "holiness" in the fancy that God chose a certain tribe to be his favorit people? That the first man and woman of this tribe disobeyed the commands of this God, and in so doing entailed a heritage of sin, suffering, and death on the whole human family and all other inhabitants of the earth as well? That this god was possessed of all wisdom and power, and hence knew before he created these people just what they would do? That this same God had provided from the "beginning"—knowing that such an atonement would be necessary—for the cruel death of his only son as a propitiation for the transgression of the man and woman who were made just as God, the father of this foreordained sacrifice, had wished them to be made, having made them himself? That a previous attempt of God to raise up a generation of righteous people having come to naught through the wickedness of those who were saved in the ark, God had his son killed as he had predestined that he should be killed, knowing that the ark scheme would be a flat failure? That the predefermined murder of the son of God was also a failure, as his father had known that it would be eternities before the first human being was made, only a very few of the children of Adam accepting the offered opportunity to be saved from the deathless fires of hell, their rejection of the terms of forgivness being due to their inability to believe the story told them about the creation, the fall, the atonement, and the terrible fate awaiting them if they did not believe, God having made their minds just as he wanted them to be—for he looked down on his creation, and declared that it was good—while uncounted billions of them hav never heard of the gospel of salvation? These are some of the idiotic and fiendish dogmas which the Inter-Ocean dignifies with the name of the "holiest sentiments of mankind"! And it avers that more than eight-tenths of "all that is brainy, all that is constructiv, and all that is decent" in the population of Chicago cherishes as sacred this terrible creed of barbarism? Does not Mr. Nixon know that in Chicago, as elsewhere, the intensity of faith in the Christian "plan of salvation" is, as a rule, in an inverse ratio to the nativ intelligence and the education of men and women? If he does not know it, he is lamentably unobservant.

John Mahara writes to THE TRUTH SEEKER that A. B. Frost should hav been credited with a contribution of $1 to the Secular Union Congress fund. The credit was omitted by mistake.

Those two new issues of the Truth Seeker Library, "The Better World," by Dr. Southwick, and "Religion and the Bible," by F. D. Cummings, are receiving favorable notices, and bid fair to be quite popular among readers of that class of literature. The first named contains 375 pages and the other 314. The price of each is 50 cents in paper and $1 in cloth. The reading season is here and now is the time to lay in a good supply of Liberal literature.

"It has pleased our Lord to recall to him our much-beloved sovereign." So say the Russian official phrase-mongers. From which it is to be inferred that the czar at one time lived with the Lord, who, presumably, grew tired of his company and sent him down to Russia to raise cain for a while. Now the old fellow, who was always very changeable, if the Bible is to be believed, wants to hav him with him for an indefinit period. Why does he not "recall" the rest of the Romanoffs?

Some of the Russian bishops are having their miters made of aluminum, greatly to the scandal of their more conservativ brethren. According to the Tribune, they look upon the practice as sacrilegious. "Think of St. Paul with an aluminum miter," they piously ejaculate. Will the orthodox church banish these new heretics to Siberia to keep company with the Stundists and other Protestants and Freethinkers? How light a thing may tip down the scale on one end of which is poised eternal salvation!

The superserviceable "Christian people" of Wichita Falls, Texas, held a mass meeting to protest against the Sunday excursion of a hose company to that town. The bigots objected to the baseball playing, bicycle racing, and other harmless sports which were to compose the amusements of the day. They hypocritically said that it was to the interest of the "laboring men" to discourage such desecration of the "Sabbath." Why? Undoubtedly because it would keep many of them out of the church. Cannot the "laboring men" see through this sham?

It seems almost like a bit of ancient history to read of the passage, in the upper house of the Hungarian Diet, of the bill granting freedom of worship to all religious beliefs. It recalls the action of successiv states of Europe after 1848 which granted civil and religious emancipation. Hungary, among the earliest to proclaim civil and religious liberty, has been among the last to sanction such a law, its recent history being largely a series of reactions. The present bill was adopted by a majority of three only. The Liberal movement may be deferred, but cannot be depressed; that is the law of history.

Christians are never tired of asserting that their religion is an evangel of peace to the world, while facts continually giv flat denial to the boast. A letter from Japan, received by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions in this city, says that "the country is full of the spirit of war and the Christians are especially eager for the fray to prove that they are patriots." It is probably well for Japan that, in this instance, there is so much difference between Christian precept and Christian practice, although a Quaker example is a good one for the world in the long run, if it does not mark the submission to injustice which it may easily do.

What would the church do if it were not for the women? The dailies tell us that in the village of Highland, up the Hudson, one woman bakes cakes and pies which she sells about the town, and another has taken up the occupation of boot-black. "There are few earnest church women in Highland who are not engaged in menial work of some kind in behalf of the churches." If that earnestness and zeal could only be utilized in useful work, what a blessing they would be to the world! But why does the reporter characterize honest and fruitful labor as "menial?" Is it so that he can magnify the church services of the women by speaking of their "unusual method of bearing the cross"?

As a movement is on foot to close the barber shops of Boston by law on Sunday the Freethought Letter Writing corps will reach the people of that city with common sense arguments by sending letters this week to the editor of the Daily Globe. If those workmen are all agreed to close on that day they do not need any law to enable them to do so, while if they are not agreed it is utterly foreign to the spirit of free institutions for the majority to compel the minority to suspend work at their behest. Coöperation, and alternation of work and rest periods, will permit all to get one day of leisure each week, or more, for that matter. Down with the law-enforced Sunday!

Why did not God make his revelation in a polyglot form so that people everywhere could get it right at once instead of having to wait hundreds or thousands of years for the mistakes of the earlier translators to be corrected? Here is Professor M. L. Bloom writing to the World that the Solomaic injunction "Spare the rod and spoil the child" should be translated so that "rod" would be rendered "disciplin." This is the dictum, he says, of the "most erudite Biblicists." Think of the kind of a God we hav who would allow such a mistranslation as that to cause millions of tender little children to be abused in the most shameful way! What is a revelation worth that does not reveal?

We shall issue a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL this season and we now request our readers to send us the names of all Freethought and Secular societies and Sunday-schools, with the names of the president and secretary, and also place and time of meeting. Please send names and permanent address of lecturers and occasional speakers. The latter are particularly desired, as we often hav inquiries for some one to deliver a funeral address and sometimes are unable to comply with the request, as our regular lecturers are too far away from the place where the speaker is wanted. Let us hear from all men and women who are qualified for and will do this very necessary work. The ANNUAL will cost 25 cents. Table of contents will be announced later. Send in your orders to insure early filling.

Anent the late political overturning in this city, the New York Press exclaims that the "purity of New York homes has been preserved; the purity of New York womanhood has been vindicated." Without the slightest desire to impugn the intentions of the reformers, it must be said that such talk is the veriest gammon. The defeat of the long-dominant political power in this city will not destroy the social evil; it will not appreciably affect it. Prostitution has always been associated with the social condition we call civilization and while it would be foolish to say that it always will be, it is equally foolish to declare that the change of municipal rulers will produce a revolution in that regard in New York. Probably police blackmail will be checked for a time, but it is doubtful if, on the whole, justice will be any less blind than before. So long as clergymen and other empirical quacks hav a controling influence in municipal affairs we cannot reasonably look for scientific and humane treatment of the unfortunate. Anti-naturalism will poison and pervert the most promising of reform movements.

Referring to the late Constitutional Convention of this state the Christian Advocate says:

"The following points hav been gained:

"1. A constitutional recognition of the principle involved in the prohibition of sectarian appropriations.

"2. This principle is applied without qualification to the free public school system by the adoption of a sweeping amendment so thoroughly prohibitiv as to be thoroughly protectiv."

This is a mistake; the letter is applied to the common school system, but the principle is not so applied. By not forbidding all religious instruction in the public schools the way is left open for the reading of the Bible, the saying of prayers, and the singing of non-denominational Christian hymns. This is what was intended by the Protestants who secured the adoption of the amendment. So sectarian appropriations are still in order, being given in the form of taxes paid by non-Christians for the teaching of Christian and Theistic dogmas, which are sectarian dogmas, in the common schools. Dr. Buckley knows that this is the truth, but he does not touch the issue thus made.

Our enemy is the political church. The choice is not ours; the issue is forced upon us. Freethinkers individually should work for such reforms in social and industrial fields as they can and at the same time not relax their vigilance against the theocratic schemers who are determined to make this republic a vassal of the church. The deadliest foe of liberty and justice is a religion enthroned in the state. What we hav to meet and defeat is told in these words which we quote from the Christian Reformer of November 3d:

"We must see that the great issues are moral, and not merely economic. We must come to the conviction that Christ is upon the throne as Lord of the Sabbath and King of kings, and that our relation as a nation to his law of the Sabbath, and to his authority in every department of national action, is the one all-important question for us to consider and settle aright."

Which being interpreted means that the church will, if she can—and she has already succeeded in a large measure—force her views of Sunday observance upon the people of the United States. To accomplish that is, however, only a small part of her program, as we hav often shown in these columns. The friends of religious freedom must get together and work as they hav never done before; the battle is on and for us it is victory or surrender. Which shall it be?

The heart, brain, and stomach of the Sabbatarian crusade is the priesthood. If it cannot monopolize one-seventh of the citizen's time it will ruin every enterprise that it can and make life miserable for all who do not think and act as this arrogant power desires them to do. Rev. J. B. Cranfill, who was the Prohibition candidate for vice-president a few years ago, writes as follows to the Waco (Texas) News and Day-Globe:

"The action of the cotton palace directory in opening the doors on Sunday will bring pain to many hearts, and will, if not rescinded, make it necessary for many who hav helped the enterprise to withdraw their co-operation and become activ opponents of the whole affair. I do not hesitate to say for myself, and I believe I voice the sentiments of hundreds of our best people, that I shall vigorously oppose the cotton palace project in toto if it thus sets at defiance the word of God and the earnest Christian sentiment of the community. As a business move our cotton palace directory will find that this disregard of the Christian sentiment of Waco and Texas and the world will cost more than it comes to. If the matter remains as it is, I shall feel it my duty as a citizen, as a Christian, and as editor of the most widely circulated religious paper in the Southern states to make this and every other enterprise a failure that flies in the face of Christianity and good morals."

How is that for impudence? The spirit manifested by Mr. Cranfill is the spirit that the priest has manifested in all lands and all ages. Sure as the priests are that they are the only custodians of the secrets of the Almighty, equally sure are they that the salvation of the world is their mission, that they hav the right to command, and that he who will not obey is a rebel against God and a traitor to the state. What business is it of the Reverend Cranfill's whether the Cotton Palace is or is not open on Sunday? If he does not wish to attend on that day he can go on some other; no one would think of attempting to compel him to attend on Sunday or any other day. But he is not so respectful of the rights of his neighbors. He is possessed of the conceit that he is a better judge of their needs and desires than they are themselvs. He is so foolish as to think that he has a commission to bully them into staying at home on the day that they want to go to the Cotton Palace, while he would be in a white heat of rage if they told him that he should not preach on a certain day or should attend a place of amusement on that day. But they hav precisely the same right to issue such commands to him that he has to issue his Sunday-keeping commands to them. So long as a considerable proportion of the people of any country are afraid of the ghosts in whose names such men as Cranfill presume to speak, so long will the priests insult, browbeat, and rob the people. Only the Freethinker is really free from the superstitious dread of the priest; all others hav a sneaking notion or a sure conviction that he can call "spirits from the vasty deep" and that those spirits can in some way work them more or less serious injury, here and hereafter.

That rambunctious young man, the emperor of Germany, has an ambition to be talked about, it would seem, for he says something every few days that gets his name into the papers. But he is not the only German who does this; even his enemies of the Bismarckian press outdo him sometimes in their reactionary utterances. Here, to illustrate, is an excerpt from Zukunft:

"It is a battle of life and death, in which mild treatment of the empire's enemies is the hight of folly. The best means of securing the victory for the existing system is to disqualify the Social Democrats to exercise any political rights. It would be simple justice to wipe them out in this manner, because they do not possess the qualifications prescribed under the spirit of the Constitution. Persons leagued to destroy the empire and its institutions should not be recognized as imperial subjects. They ought not to vote or be voted for. They should not be permitted to exercise any political rights whatever."

This mad talk has, naturally, excited much comment, and the radicals and Socialists are quite satirical in their observations. All such folly, as they clearly realize, is so much grist to their mill. "Whom the gods," etc., and we hav in this country quite a large number who are just as wild and foolish as the anti-Socialist Germans, and they are doing equally effectiv work for their would-be victims. It is too late in the day to talk of the disfranchisment and deportation of parties and sects. That method will not win with fair minded people. Zukunft makes a good mirror for all proscriptivs.

Bishop Keane is reported to hav said, speaking of the rumored attempt at reconciliation between the Italian government and the Pope, that perhaps the latter would be satisfied "with the guarantee of his independence and the concession to him of a right of veto in all legislativ issues which affected faith and morals." This suggests two thoughts, the first of which is that the Pope is very modest in his demands, if the concessions named are all that he would insist upon, for it will be readily conceded that the supervision of the faith and morals of a nation like Italy is a very small contract for the Vicegerent of God on earth to undertake. The second thought is that much of the trouble that torments the nations of the Old World comes from their persistence in legislating on matters of faith and morals. If they could be induced to attend to the matters only with which the state can rightfully deal the outlook would be much brighter for them, and their people would hav an easier and a decidedly more peaceful life. But they got in a very bad way centuries ago, and they find it terribly difficult to get out of it. Even an "Infidel nation" like France continues to pay enormous sums to the church. This should be a warning to the United States. We started right, so far as our Constitution was concerned, but we hav allowed many abuses to creep in, and it is growing worse all the time; if the demands of the National Reformers are acceded to we shall soon be in as awkward a predicament as are the nations of Europe, and we shall find no consolation in the reflection that we hav wasted the most noble heritage of liberty that any nation ever possessed. "Keep the church and the state forever separate."

Mayor Schieren of Brooklyn is a Christian first and a servant of the whole people afterwards. The Germans of the city wanted to hav a big parade on October 21st, on the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of the new German Hospital, and they applied to the mayor for the necessary permit. He is reported by the Staats Zeitung to hav replied: "Neither Germans, Irish, nor Bohemians should ask for special privileges. I am not the mayor of the Germans alone." Very true, but neither should he be the mayor of the Sabbatarians alone, which he manifestly is, so far as the Sunday issue is concerned. He denies equality of rights to the Germans, not to preserve the equal rights of the Sabbatarians, but to guarantee to them a monopoly of one day of the week. He denies equal rights to the Germans and grants special privileges to the Sabbatarians, and that is the way in which he demonstrates that he is a mayor of all the people of the city! Why he does this he unwittingly tells us in the next sentence after that we hav just quoted: "I believe in churches and I am a churchman." Exactly, and consequently he knows of no better way to promote church interests than the time-honored one of denying to the rest of the people the opportunity to peacefully seek happiness in their own ways. Since he has delivered himself of these good orthodox sentiments the Sunday Observance Association of Brooklyn has asked him to suppress Sunday ball playing within the city limits, Judge Gaynor having decided that the sport is not in contravention of decent law and common sense. If there is anything that your true "churchman" hates, it is innocent recreation on Sunday, while he is as silent as the grave concerning the cruelties of fashionable pigeon shooting. The only apparent reason for his opposition to bull fighting is the fact that it is a kind of cruelty not popular in this country. He is frantic about pugilistic encounters, in which no one is hurt but the willing participants, but when it comes to the wanton slaughter and maiming of pigeons, which undoubtedly are not willing participants in the matches, he is as dumb as the majority of his predecessors were when slavery was popular in the United States.

It will take a long time to eradicate from the minds of the lower strata of Christian populations the degraded notion of woman's position that a thousand years of priestly rule and a multitude of Bible precepts hav made a part of the intellectual patrimony of the peoples who fell under the sway of that superstition. In Justice Voorhis's court in this city there was recently brought up for trial a burly fellow named Latson charged with beating his wife. For some time she has been supporting him, and on election day she gave him six dollars. He came home in the evening and asked for more money. When she refused to giv it he struck her. When the justice asked him about it he answered: "Yes, I did swipe her one, but it was because she tongue-lashed me. I did not hit her any harder than this, though," and with that he struck her in the face. She gave a cry of pain and nearly fell. Justice Voorhis shouted: "What! You dare strike her before me?" After this Mrs. Latson did not want her husband prosecuted, and the justice told him that if he would promis never to strike her again he would let him go. "Oh," said the fellow, "I can't promis that. She is my wife, and if I want to I'll hit her now and again. It don't do a woman any harm." Inasmuch as the husband is the head of the family as Christ is the head of the church, and Christ, acting as God, chastises man for his good, there does not seem to be any flaw in Latson's logic. He certainly has the same right to correct his wife for her good and his own glory that Christ has to correct men and women for their good and his own glory. The Christians who will not permit women to participate in the government of the church of which they are members are simply logical in the application of the good Bible doctrin that woman brought sin and death into the world and they certainly can not severely censure Latson for his savage application of that doctrin. Woman was to be subject to her husband because she ate that apple, and so why should not her husband whip her when she fails to obey him? She has no rights. The Bible makes the family a despotism, not a republic. In a word, it was established according to the Latson specifications.

An Important Publication.

TO THE FREETHINKERS OF AMERICA: The Eighteenth Annual Congress has given much promise for the future. It was well attended. The sessions were harmonious. Our forces are now consolidated. We have had a wide variety of opinion presented as to the best way to work; and so far as possible the suggestions made will be adopted and carried out. It is not within our present means, however, to inaugurate successfully all the new plans which earnest friends have indicated. We must make good use of what is already at hand. As pioneers we must labor slowly and patiently in the great pathway of reform.

The national organizations are now practically united. During the coming year arrangements will be made to meet the wishes expressed by the Congress for one national association. In spirit this is already accomplished; but in form and in accordance with the constitutions of both societies it will require a year for complete assimilation. We do not need an elaborate organization. We need a simple business organization which can be made quickly available for work in any part of the field at any time. The enemies of freedom have so many forces at command that we must be constantly on the alert to meet their manifold attacks. Every Freethinker should be on the watch in his own community, and if anything occurs in violation of the Demands of Liberalism he should immediately inform the officers of the national association, so that they can be ready to resist if need be. The object of the national association is to bring all the Freethinkers of the country into a common body, so that they can defend themselves together and present a united front to any usurpation of whatever character.

This last Congress has been better advertised than any other Congress. More ample reports have been published in the papers, and information has been more widely scattered in regard to the objects of Freethought. Undoubtedly for the first time thousands have learned that there is organized Freethought in this country.

We must continue to agitate and to interest the people more and more, and thus increase the corps of Freethought workers. We must recruit our forces out of the many millions who are really in sympathy with us but do not know that we are at work. We must maintain the Freethought press and platform by every means in our power. We must distribute Freethought literature.

In order the more effectually to utilize the influence of the Congress, a Report of the Proceedings will be immediately published in pamphlet form. It will contain one hundred large pages of solid reading matter. It will include the speeches and reports of the presidents and secretaries, and also a list of all the donors to the funds for the past year; addresses of S. P. Putnam, Hon. C. B. Waite, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, J. E. Remsburg, Rev. A. T. Jones, and Franklin Steiner. The Report will also contain the resolutions of the Congress, letters from Lucy N. Colman, Susan H. Wixon, Robert C. Adams, Katie Kehm Smith, and others—all that has a bearing upon the Demands of Liberalism and upon the practical work of Freethought. It will be one of the most interesting and valuable pamphlets ever published. It will be full of information and facts, besides stating the principles and purposes of the Liberal party. The cost of this publication will be at least $200. What money is now in the treasury will be used for this purpose, but we shall need more to complete the work. A copy will be sent free to every donor to the fund, and we hope that after they have read it they will take hold and help circulate it more widely, and thus broaden the action of the Congress. We must educate the people, and this is the way to do it. The price of one copy will be twenty-five cents, but to all those contributing to our treasury eight copies will be sent for one dollar, eighteen copies for two dollars, or fifty copies for five dollars. We desire to circulate five thousand copies if we can get the funds, and we ask our friends to join in this enterprise and aid in spreading the truth. We must keep on the move, and if we can't do one thing do another, so that an advance is always made.

The president and the secretary will take the field and labor on the platform in conjunction with the press. It would be a good thing if we could have some officer at a central position, as the Christian organizations do who have their salaried officers at every prominent point. We cannot, however, afford to pay regular salaries. We must earn our way by hard work in order to use our funds for propaganda purposes. We hope our friends will realize that we are not rich; that we cannot, during the year, be present at every important place; that we must cover a wide field and put in our work wherever we can. We shall not be idle, and our supporters may be assured that we shall use every dollar to the best possible advantage.

Let us first of all push the circulation of the pamphlet of the Congress. Every Liberal, I am sure, will see the advantage of this and will aid us to whatever extent he can. Contributions can be sent to E. C. Reichwald, 234 South Water street, Chicago; or, if more convenient, they can be sent directly to THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Sparks from the Lecture Field.

Upon the urgent request of a few stanch Liberals, I made a special trip of three hundred and four miles and return, in order to giv a course of lectures in Grafton, W. Va. These lectures were the culmination of a series of efforts extending over a period of three years, and at last the labors of our friends hav received their due reward. Grafton has successfully placed itself in the line of Liberal work. Nothing of the kind has ever been in the town before, but the way has been paved for more work of the same kind; the ground has been broken, and Liberal lecturers will find a hearty welcome should they pass that way.

How frequently in the course of our work do we meet people—too many, alas!—who are possessed of decidedly Liberal tendencies, and yet stand in constant fear lest their particular opinions should be made public! Men in office, men in business, and even the laboring classes are extremely averse to making known their views upon such matters. They stand in constant fear of a monstrously cruel ostracism to which the liberal-minded hav been subjected in all ages by the religious portion of the community. Through such means, the masses hav been induced to stifle their true thoughts and to pretend to be that which they were not. The greatest gain to humanity is to become free men and women, enjoying the full exercise of their reasoning faculties, and a happy day that will be for the race when this is fully recognized.

This fact is well exemplified in the case of George Chambers, of Grafton. Since his youth he has been fearless in the expression of his Infidel views, never hesitating to let the people know what his opinions are, and yet he has been elected and re-elected for five successiv terms as mayor, a position which he holds to this day. The churches hav combined against him, but without success. At all times the impartiality in the discharge of his duty has revealed his true worth, and the people hav sent him back again despite the work of the clergy. Had he been a hypoc it and attempted to deny his Infidelity, the result might hav been far different.

The lectures were brought about by a combination of Liberals, among whom were Dr. C. H. Ice of Farmington, Dr. Strickler, and Mayor Chambers. They were given in the large Opera House, the mayor presiding the first night, and Dr. Ice each night following. Our first audience was rather slim, probably owing to a want of proper advertising, but each succeeding night it was greatly augmented, and the last was all that could be desired. Many Freethinkers came in from the adjoining country and thus helped to swell the enthusiasm.

I was somewhat surprised to find a large amount of Truth Seeker literature in the town. THE TRUTH SEEKER itself, also the Investigator, is freely read and transferred from one to another, thus doing splendid missionary work. This will probably account for the spirit of Liberal thought that seems to permeate the district.

Besides those mentioned there were Mr. and Mrs. Shaw, an aged pair who were present at each lecture, as also were Mr. and Mrs. Lambrecht, Mr. and Mrs. Grant, and several others—too many to mention here. The lectures were a decided success all around. At first the women seemed a little shy about entering the hall, but when one had ventured in, the rest soon followed. All that we needed was for some one to break the ice. Our friends were well pleased with results.

The success that still follows in the wake of the Ohio Liberal Society is a continual source of gratification to all who are connected with it. Large crowds attend the meetings every Sunday night, and standing room is frequently at a premium. The severe drubbing the clergy has received has taught them to let the society severely alone, although their railings only tended to advertise us the more. Bright music and a lively discussion, which invariably follow the lecture, make our meetings more attractiv. Our Liberal papers and a large quantity of literature are kept for sale at each meeting. Thus the good work goes on and hope still urges us to keep moving forward.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Praise of Which To Be Proud.

Yesterday there came into my hands a copy of S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Why it was so long in coming was a query which I could not answer. I am glad to say it was not the fault of the express company, but simply a blunder of the person who, in my absence, received it.

Well, it is certainly worth waiting a long time for, and, long as the time seemed while we waited for its appearance, the problem is much greater how such a work could hav been produced in twelve months than where my one copy was buried for the weeks it was out of sight.

The book is beautifully bound and the print is excellent. The pictures are so lifelike that one can almost seem to be really with the living person rather than only looking upon the shadow. And oh, the delight with which we read the pleasant words of our personal friends! Mr. Putnam has the most perfect power of language; no one surpasses him in its use save, possibly, Ingersoll; and he says the best of all whom he names, forgetting no one who has labored specially for Freethought.

The reports of the conventions holden way back—the Harvard Bible convention, the meetings of the "Society of Free Inquiry"—the imprisonment of men for unbelief in this country and England, he has left nothing out; the woman question—nothing more fine was ever written on that subject; and then the philosophies of the men who were all trying to emancipate the mind from superstitious theories; it seems to me that to read the book thoroughly will be almost a "Liberal education." I wish every Freethinking family could possess a copy and that all the public libraries will feel that it belongs to them also.

Well, I am glad to know that the congress was a success. I hav given up all expectation of ever attending any gathering of that kind again. I am so deaf that to try to hear is distressing, and the friends with whom I hav so long labored are mostly under the sod. The younger ones do not need me, and so I must be content to read of them. One of the old and worthy workers for freedom whom I had known for many years passed away recently—Henry Bonnell, of Junius. He was one of the supporters of the "Waterloo Meeting" that did good service many years. So time removes us all at last; and now that we hav lost all fear of a world to come, death is quite a pleasant "looking forward to."

Rain Machines, Prayers, and Tom-toms.

The recent drouth in South Dakota, Iowa, and Wisconsin (summer of 1894) afforded an opportunity for putting the prayer and other tests into operation for producing rain. After drenching Kansas, the Rock Island rainmakers went to Iowa and bombarded the skies with vile chemicals. The weather bureau predicted light showers for two days, and for two days it was hot and clear. Then the bureau predicted clear weather, when down poured the rain by the half-inch at a time for nearly two days and redeemed the crops. It took the machines, however, forty-eight hours to start it.

In Dakota a general prayer for rain was put up in the churches Sunday afternoon. "A spirit of deep solemnity characterized the gatherings." Tuesday evening dark clouds lowered, the church bells rang and a sprinkle followed. Thursday a heavy rain fell, extending into the night, and the crops were saved. At Aberdeen, however, the prayer was not done until Tuesday afternoon when the mayor from the top of the city hall saw with a powerful glass the dark clouds gathering at Huron, eighty miles away. Business was suspended and the grain palace crowded with prayer experts. Thursday morning it rained at Aberdeen and again Thursday afternoon. In this case prayer at Huron caused a sprinkle in forty-eight hours, at Aberdeen the beginning of a heavy rain in thirty-six hours. The weather bureau predicted fair weather for Tuesday; showers, Thursday.

In Wisconsin the Winnebago Indian chiefs ordered a rain dance to break the drouth. The sky way clear, the weather very hot. Three tom-tom drummers were set to work. They beat their drums with great vigor for three hours, when the rain came down in sheets. It passed over Wisconsin and was followed by a storm next day putting an end to the drouth. The bureau had predicted fair weather.

Hence, if these tests are to be regarded as fair for all concerned, prayer is about twenty-five per cent more effectiv than the rain machines, and the rain-dance and tom-toms from twelve to sixteen times more effectiv than the other two.

Congress last year appropriated several thousand dollars for rain-making experiments which proved failures. The two more effectiv experiments—prayer and rain-dance—cost little or nothing. Prayers can be put up anywhere and at any time, while the rain-dancers can probably be had by any dry community on payment of their traveling expenses. In these tests the tom-toms hav vindicated their unquestioned superiority. With them there could be no local option. No county in the state could long go "dry."

Some skeptics may say that the tests prove too much. The very fact that all three of the agencies brought rain in the same region at about the same time proves that none of them had anything to do with it, but it was brought on by perfectly natural causes, which would hav produced it had prayers, machine, and drums been kept in the background. It is doubtful, however, if this will prevent the clergymen, or the rain machinists, or the Winnebago chief from each claiming to be the sole and only trustworthy proprietor of the genuin rain generator.—Detroit Evening News.

That Mosaic Myth.

Before sitting down permit me to glance at the subject in a somewhat more serious spirit—for, be it remembered, even the follies of Christianity hav a serious as well as an amusing side. Is there the slightest shadow of evidence that the Mosaic story is true? Is there the slightest reasonable proof that six thousand years ago God made Adam and Eve, and that those persons, by eating forbidden fruit, brought misery and death into the world? Science has but one answer: The story is as false and as baseless as it is possible for a story to be. It is just as true that Adam and Eve never existed as it is that the moon is not made of green cheese. No anthropologist to-day with a reputation to lose believes the absurd myth. Science has proved beyond dispute that man existed thousands of years before the alleged creation of Adam and Eve. Says Professor Draper: "So far as investigations hav gone they indisputably refer the existence of man to a date remote from us by many hundreds of thousands of years. We are carried back immeasurably beyond the six thousand years of Patristic chronology. It is difficult to assign a shorter date for the last glaciation of Europe than a quarter of million of years, and human existence antedates that." Again, Professor Huxley says: "Thousands of people are taught this Adamitic monogenesis as if it were an established truth, and believe it. I do not, and I am not acquainted with a man of science or duly instructed person who does." But I almost insult you in elaborately proving what every instructed person knows—that the myth is utterly unsupported by evidence of any kind. What I want to impress upon you is the fact that thousands of men who profess to guide the morals of the people, are morally pledged to advocate as the very truth of God what they must know to be utter falsehoods. Not only is money and time wasted in teaching falsehood which might be employed in teaching truth; but the love of truth, the foundation of moral character, is undermined by a system of moral and intellectual Jesuitry which is a disgrace to our common humanity. In the past Christianity was a mistake; to day it is a lie. In the name of reason, in the name of truth, in the name of humanity, I ask you to do what you can to destroy this wicked sham, expose this unholy lie, and to restore and preserve and foster that love of truth, that fidelity to conviction, which is one of the noblest inspirations that ever fired the hearts of men, and without which no nation can be truly free or great.—Wallace Nelson, in Melbourne Liberal.

Separation of Sects is Sectarianism.

In the preparatory school connected with the Teachers' College, the management has not solved the question that was raised by some parents of Jewish pupils. They were attracted by the statement that the school would be non-sectarian, yet Christian hymns and prayers were insisted upon. That the management recognizes the Jewish religion as entitled to the same respect as other creeds, ought to be conceded by people who are acquainted with the intelligent citizens in charge; yet with the inconsistency with which so many avowedly intelligent people ignore Judaism as a sect, this school seems to regard hymns and prayers as non sectarian because they suit nearly every shade of Christianity. The solution reached is that Jewish pupils are excused from the opening exercises, and are to be kept busy in preparatory work of some kind. Hence, with this separation of sects insisted upon the school becomes sectarian.—Jewish Messenger.

Churchly Purpose and Performance.

The New York Press, in its investigations of the tenement house problem in this city, has discovered that there are no tenements in which "the neglect of misery stands out in clearer relief" than in those owned by Trinity Church Corporation, and from which it manages to draw a ten per cent revenue. .·.·. Jacob A. Rüs, writing in the Century Magazine for November on the "Making of Thieves in New York," givs us to understand that the leading manufactories engaged in this industry are state-supported Catholic and Protestant "reformatories," asylums, and protectories, which answer the purpose of training-schools for the penitentiary. Children guilty of no other offense than homelessness, destitution, or enforced truancy are committed by the courts to these institutions, to be classified according to size with boy burglars, pickpockets, and thieves. By this process the good are corrupted and shipped to the penitentiary in due time. .·.·. Emilie Espye, aged 2, of Homestead, Pa., was told that the bogie man would catch her, and so when she was left alone in the dark she went into convulsions and died from fright. .·.·. At the dedication of St. Joseph's church at De Pere, Wis., the preacher, head of a seminary, declared that Joseph, the "foster father" of Jesus, was of first rank in heaven, "for even Mary and Jesus pay homage to Joseph, what they could pay to no one else. Therefore his influence with the fountain of grace must be powerful; a mere wish of Joseph equaling to Jesus as a command." God seems to giv cuckolds in heaven more honor than do his Christian children on earth. Still this case is not without mundane parallel, as earthly potentates hav at times been known, under similar circumstances, to giv the injured husband a place at court and to invest him with a "pull" which he might not otherwise hav acquired. .·.·. The Sunday School Chronicle, referring to the treatment Paul received at Jerusalem and his rescue by Roman soldiers from the fanatical mob, says: "To-day in the holiest (Christian) church in Jerusalem the Turkish troops perform exactly the same duties as those old Romans. Mohammedan soldiers guard the entrance; their presence is necessary to preserve the peace, and more than once, like Lysius and his men, they hav had to fight their way through a raging mob to save some unhappy victim of (Christian) fanaticism from murder beside the very tomb of Jesus Christ." How tolerant and civilizing Christianity is, when after two thousand years of its benign influence its votaries hav exchanged places with the heathen it was sent to reform! .·.·. Speaking of holy places in and out of Jerusalem, a correspondent of the New York Sun says: "The Calvary site dispute can be traced to the time of the Crusades, when some of the maps located the Stephen gate, Calvary, and other noted places where the Damascus gate is now, on the north side of the city. Since the Mohammedan occupation these localities and many others hav been located in new and more convenient places, so the pilgrims can visit them with little trouble." The correspondent adds that if the Turk is ever ousted from the Holy land "the sacred localities will be rearranged to suit the new conditions." If the tomb of Christ is as shifty as the other sacred spots—and there is the same uncertainty about it that attaches to them—then a pilgrimage there is "an empty pageant at an empty grave," and the fanatical devotees are fighting over a last year's bird's-nest. .·.·. Gypsies, it is said, never pass a church without muttering a curse, and they will not be buried in a church. This state of mind is one of the fruits of their persecution in the Middle Ages. At that time the gypsies were the poets, singers, and players who amused the provincial population. Their allusions to the church and clergy, being truthful, were not often complimentary, and the persecutions which followed were among the most despicable outrages placed to the discredit of the dominant religion. Read the history of the Goliards in Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." .·.·. An order for two hundred barrels of triple-proof brandy was filled a while ago at Fresno, Cal., for the Russian church. Of course it was for sacramental purposes, wine being too weak a potation to be palmed off on a Russian or an Aleutian islander as the blood of any savior worth having. .·.·. The clergy are getting more and more exacting, and now make no bones of demanding the resignation of public officials who do not do as they want them to in their private affairs. This interference they make not as male or female citizens, but as Christian ministers, that is, as members of the third sex. .·.·. The A. P. A. of New Hampshire has indorsed the candidacy of Henry W. Blair for the United States Senatorship. Blair's hobby is the union of church and state to be effected by teaching the Christian superstition in public schools. .·.·. There is a sermon factory in Chicago where sermons are written on all kinds of subjects and furnished to ministers at reasonable rates. The same sermon does for several preachers—sometimes for as many as seventy-five. It is related that through the operation of this system persons passing from one parish to another between the hours of morning and evening service hav been twice edified by one discourse in a single day. The sermons are adapted for different denominations. .·.·. In the burial grounds of Puritan communities in New England persons who were not church members were interred by themselvs in the part of the cemetery known as "the damned corner" Sometimes there were tombs used as general receptacles for those of different faith or of no faith, and these bore no inscriptions. There are two such in the Copp's Hill cemetery, in Boston, and it is apprehended that the same will cause some confusion in the mind of the angel Gabriel when, on the resurrection morn, he comes to awaken those who hav fallen asleep under the proper auspices. .·.·. J. Rodes Buchanan says that Cazotte predicted the French Revolution and the particular fates of several of the actors therein, but the London Freethinker points out that Alger, in his "Glimpses of the French Revolution," has shown that this story was a confessed invention of La Harpe, who wrote the "prophecy" a long time after the events predicted had become history. It appears that Lord Lytton, the novelist, was taken in by the same impostor. In his story of "Zanoni" he attributes prophetic powers to Cazotte, and at the same time accuses the unbelieving revolutionists of being credulous and superstitious. .·.·. A desperate effort is making in Chicago to reinstate the Bible in the public schools of that city. The Sunday worshipers are also straining every nerve to bind the people of the Western metropolis in the chains of more tyrannical Sunday laws. .·.·. Catholics and Protestants are trying to see which can most quickly demoralize the children of the country. Military instruction in their schools is now all the rage. The infection has spread to the public schools and to the institutions of higher learning. The national government sends instructors to colleges of all grades and kinds, and no one can tell when the craze will stop or can measure the evil consequences it is bound to produce. .·.·. Russell Whitcomb, once a prominent business man of Boston, has renounced the world and founded the Community of the Brothers of the Church Episcopal. .·.·. Republican papers of South Dakota worked the "Infidel racket" on Mr. Howe, Populist candidate for governor.

The Christian Religion.

ITS PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE EFFECTS UPON MANKIND, AND ITS RESPONSIBILITY THEREFOR.—WHAT ARE ITS TITLES TO FURTHER INDULGENCE?

To be acquainted with the merits of a religion we need only observe the condition of the people who profess it. If we see them obedient to good laws, honest, patriotic, temperate, and prosperous, we may reasonably presume that their religion is promotiv of those ends. If, on the contrary, after centuries of fair trial and full sway of a religion we find lawlessness, dishonesty, defection, poverty, debauchery, and vice flourishing under its reign, we may without hesitation pronounce that religion a failure.

The condition of the people leads us naturally to consider the situation of their rulers, the character of their teachers, and the truth and wisdom of what they are taught. Among the so-called civilized nations, the religion of Christ has dominated for fifteen hundred years. It has shaped laws and controled their administration, and directed the wealth of the people. It has been supreme in dictating morals and education. Its missionaries hav penetrated the remotest parts, and it claims to be the herald of civilization. It has erected its schools of learning and temples of worship by every path of the race. Combined with military powers it has in its time triumphed over all opposition and denial.

Claiming to be the only moral guide and medium of salvation, intrenched behind untold and untaxed wealth, with almost unlimited resources, equipped for every emergency, built into the constitutions of nations, cemented to all legislativ action, every important proceeding of the state directed by its prayers, a social and political organization so mighty and vast that its influence affects, more or less, the life of every individual, it cannot escape the awful responsibility of the unhappy condition affecting the people to-day. "The feather that adorns the royal bird supports his flight; strip him of his plumage and you fix him to the earth." This religious bird, which breeds upon the earth, is principally an inhabitant of heaven. Let us bring him to solid ground, strip him of his many-hued plumage, and observe his naked worth. We find that this religion, while distinctly human, has soared high and secluded itself from the gaze of man. It has built its eyrie in the pale azure of mystery and the supernatural, and from its lofty hight it sweeps the earth with its eye and directs the conduct of the world.

It begins with childhood, attaching itself to one set of ideas, and one set of persons; the heart is not permitted to open itself to new convictions, nor the mind to better its understanding. The child is fed with meats that are proper only for maturity, and its mind is trained and developed to accept principles whose truth it is wholly incapable of fairly determining. It is not suffered to determin, even if it could, and it grows up defenseless against argument, and dulled to all opposition or evidence.

A character of this sort is the soil fittest to produce that obstinate bigotry in politics and religion, which begins with a meretricious sacrifice of the understanding, and finally urges its subject to intolerance, persecution, and usurpation of thought and power. The child develops into a man who cannot be wholly honest with himself, because he neither appeals to his understanding, nor confides in the internal evidence of his conscience. He is the helpless slave of the impostor, who has shaped his brain to prejudice, cunning, and force. He is arrogant in dispute, and imposes silence when he cannot convince. He will not brook successful opposition, but enforces his contention by the sword. It is by thus shaping the mind of the child, that the Christian religion has succeded in intrenching itself behind the emotional nature of man, and in putting his reason to sleep. It has compressed the infant brain in order that it may not attain to its healthy, natural functions; it has bent and warped the mind of youth, so that the ultimate condition is one of bigoted attachment, and fanatical, unreasoning prejudice. Upon this ground it has placed Belief for its corner-stone. It believes, but never demonstrates. It relies wholly upon assertion, and is certain of things, and beings, and worlds of which it has no evidence. Its methods of debate are to attack its opponents with personal abuse, instead of answering arguments. It has maintained its supremacy of opinion by ostracism, persecution, imprisonment, and tortures. It works miracles, enshrines relics, absolves the sin it indulges, and employs numerous like devices to strengthen its influence and insure its emoluments. Its clothes are mystery and the supernatural. It is the foe of science, and appeals to the sword to prove that its belief is right and every other wrong. It arrogates to itself the province of peace-maker, but has been first in intrigue and war. It loudly proclaims good-will to man, and brotherly love, yet breeds within itself the most violent divisions and dissensions. It assumes to protect the life and property of a man, but not his freedom of thought and opinion. It will not suffer a change, and can be neither persuaded by agument, nor instructed by experience. Its laity are its serfs, and its clergy, instead of being the servants of the people, are but the domestics of their bishops. The bishops, elevated to a power which satisfies ambition, are the arch-plotters with the throne, in their design to stupefy the brain of men, that they may use their bodies as carpenters do axes, chisels, and planes. This religion worships a dead Jew, but persecutes the living. It fears the virtues of its foes when alive, and slanders them when dead. Of living devils it makes dead saints.

It adores motherhood, yet subjects woman to inferiority, and commands her to silence and obedience. It is the sworn enemy of intemperance, yet is not averse to accepting a goodly share of its revenues. It is intoxicated with heaven, and wastes its inheritance of intellect, which should be used for this world, in pursuit of the winged phantoms of the air. It becomes alarmed at facts and scientific development more than at the most dangerous and vicious principles. It involves itself in a labyrinth of nonsense by its labors to maintain miracles and falsehoods by argument and reason. It carries glad tidings to savage people, dispossesses them of their lands, and ultimately effects their extermination.

Built upon a rock, it has been shifting as the sands. Humble and meek, it has been constant to flattery. Affecting poverty, it has been mercenary; professing a love of enlightenment and self-respect it is ignorant and servil. It is penitent, yet diligent in giving offense. It is condescending in spirit, but arrogant in carriage. Its light is placed upon a bushel, but it is intensely interested that its past history shall be concealed and not remembered. It is the proclaimer of liberty, but the slave to power.

We look into the bleeding night of history and see, as the result of the ignorance which this religion engendered, war, famin, epidemics, licentiousness, tortures, and cruelties unspeakable. We look at the present and observe still the power of its blight. Nations claiming to be Christian are training vast armies, equipping them with the most murderous implements of warfare, to protect themselvs from other nations equally Christian in character. The condition of the state is abnormal, restless, and sullen. Wealth is centralized, the people are over-burdened, and poverty stalks naked through the land. The cities fester with vice, discontent glooms upon the faces of hungry men, while Anarchy leers and lurks in dark corners. The law-making powers, national, state, and municipal, are sinks of moral pollution. Elections are carried by purchased ballots, and patriotism goes searching with a lantern for honest men. Christianity rules supreme, and where her temples are most numerous and imposing, there we find the most political corruption, vice, disease, violence, sexual depravity, saloons, almshouses, police, and courts of justice. Christians bar fast their doors at night against the violence of men who hav been given a careful Christian training. The prisons are filled with church-reared criminals, and the scaffold's vast majority of victims are those who are saved by Christ at both extremities of life.

To what extent shall we hold a religion responsible which furnishes the worst examples of crime, that of capital punishment? Has it proven itself efficient to accomplish the social and moral results for which human nature has so far striven in vain? Should its past achievements recommend it to the further indulgence of mankind? Do its own hatreds and dissensions inspire us with confidence in its ability to promote peace and establish the brotherhood of man?

Christianity is an experiment, but should eternity alone be the limit of an experiment? After fifteen hundred years of trial, do the results justify a continuation of the test?

Christianity stands indicted before the bar of public opinion, which presents these complaints: You forced yourself upon the world by the sword. By your religious guise you quieted ignorance, which you flattered with promises of paternal care. Upon your altars were sacrificed life and fortune. Confiding in your professions, men clothed you with power and submitted to your decrees. Generation after generation has followed where you led. And yet you hav neither advanced our morals nor lessened our tendency to sin. Your morality consists in praying, and your religion in kneeling. Your promises are unfulfilled. States that hav trusted you now find you a source of internal dissension. They find that you are wholly incapable of solving moral and social problems, and that you are a millstone about their necks.

If your influence is healthy and good, why are those nations which you control the most ignorant and vicious, and those which hav succeeded in defying you, the most happy and enlightened? Freethought, science, and invention, the principles you most oppose, seem to operate to their good, and to make them superior and happier beings. We hav learned to think, and we doubt you. Your upturned feathers hav not their external gorgeous hue. The civilization which should insure peace to mankind has advanced its slow weary steps in spite of you. We now charge you with being a corrupter of governments, and demand an account of your stewardship.

If a wise man were to look about to choose his religion by the lives of those who founded, taught, and professed it, and the works wrought by it, surely Christianity would be the last religion he would choose. It has not even the pretense of evidence on the score of any moral effects it has produced in the world. It has architecture, but that is only for the grandeur of priest and king, at the expense of toil and deprivation of the poor. It has art, an endless waste of talent in picturing imaginary saints and devils, not men and things that were. The advance of the human mind will break away the last refuges of imposture lying concealed behind high walls and closed blinds. A religion which rests her dying struggle on the fanaticism of the vulgar, and the craft of the informed, the willingness to be deceived on the part of the many, and the power to punish those who would undeceive them, will not liv. Audacious ignorance cannot forever trample upon modest truth; craft as a general is inferior to learning. Reason is fast being exalted to its just supremacy, and the truth will vindicate itself. The sacerdotal empire, erected on the imbecility of human nature and the imperfect composition of man, will vanish with the mists of sun-kissed day.

The voice of fanaticism may ring out in her gorgeous temples, her secret conclaves, and her menacing parades, but persecuted reason and all-powerful love of liberty will remonstrate until—

> "Hoary-headed selfishness has felt
> Its death-blow, and is tottering to the grave;
> A brighter morn awaits the human day;
> War with its horrors, and religion's fierce hell
> Shall liv but in the memory of Time,
> Who, like a penitent libertin, shall start,
> Look back, and shudder at his younger years."

Observations.

A lot of naval architects, who recently held a convention for the purpose of discussing the question of warships, seemed to agree that many of Uncle Sam's vessels are behind the requirements of the age in some essential particulars. I guess there has never been a time when the experts were satisfied. Thucydides, who was either a spectator or a participant, observes concerning a naval engagement between the Athenians and the Corinthians that the preparations of the latter "still retained something of the awkward manner of antiquity." The trouble referred to occurred about 440 B.C.

Flattering requests for copies of some of the rhymes and prose pieces I hav written hav led me to contemplate the matter of publishing a Volume. They are at present pasted in a scrap book, which is the private possession of the deponent's major moiety, who thinks that the time spent in copying them might to better advantage be devoted to putting them in type. Such an expedient is among the chances of the future, and as Mr. S. P. Putnam has a similar scheme in mind, it is possible that we will collaborate and get out a book suitable for holiday gifts in 1895 and for birthday gifts thereafter. The Truth Seeker Company has half agreed to undertake the venture, disguising the contents of the work beneath an attractiv exterior.

Whenever I read one of Ingersoll's tributes I think of a remark made by George Bakeman, the undertaker of a Western town where I resided. One day Deacon Moran was in Bakeman's shop removing the lead from a lot of cartridges, so that a Decoration Day salute could be fired without danger to the adjacent ranchers. He had a cartridge in the vise, and was twisting at the slug with a pair of pinchers, when the thing exploded and came near shooting the proprietor. "Dammit all, Deak," said Bakeman, "mind what you are doing. If I'm killed, who the devil is going to bury me?" Admitting that those to whom the colonel has offered tributes were worthy of his eloquence, who will be left, when the time comes, to pronounce a fitting eulogy upon him?

Condolence in great hunks to Lulie Monroe Power, editor of the Ironclad Age!—she being called to account by Mr. H. Wettstein for permitting a common jour printer to capitalize the word God in one of Mr. Wettstein's contributions. Mr. Wettstein appeals to "high-class publications," whatever high-class may hav the distinction to be, as authority for the capitalizing of Nature, but I notice he appeals from them again in the matter of God, for in the majority of offices not only is God printed with an upper-case G, but also derivativ appellations and the personal pronouns standing for it. In Catholic publications the Pope is similarly exalted. The printers of the queen's speech follow the same rule with regard to her majesty. If, as Mr. Wettstein contends, a big G "exalts a myth into a deity," then that capital is a great offender. But I would inquire if a large N would not hav a mythological effect if used as the initial of Nature; for when you come down to driving brass tacks you can no more stick one of them into nature than into God. I reject a rule that would force a diffident person to say i, under pain of being suspected of seeking recognition as an object of religious worship; and I believe I am safe in assuring Mr. Wettstein that the significance of the capital G found at the fore end of God in THE TRUTH SEEKER is grammatical and not theological; also that when nature is printed with a small n no disrepect is intended toward the aggregate of phenomena.

The election returns as printed show that between the election of 1892 and that of 1894 the number of voters at Gravesend, Long Island, dropped from 6,000 to 2,000. This falling off is attributed to the imprisonment of John Y. McKane, who was the political boss of the Gravesend district. McKane was also the favorit Sunday-school teacher there, but no report is made of the condition of the little flock that formerly enjoyed his ministrations. McKane erred in lingering in the East until nabbed and put in jail, when the West has so large a field for him. I hav just received news of the political battle on Puget Sound, and judge that McKane would do well out there. A little town that advertised itself as the terminus of the Great Northern railroad, but which is the terminus of nothing but the Snohomish river, had a contract on hand to get the county seat, and needed voters. It therefore chartered a steamer, got a gang of "floaters" from Seattle, and voted them at as many precincts as it could. As a result, the town returned about fourteen hundred votes out of an actual total resident population of possibly twenty-five hundred. Among the managers of the campaign I note the name of a religious gentleman who once tackled Putnam in debate, and got raked fore and aft. McKane is an ideal running mate for him. If this ballot that executes the freeman's will as lightning does the will of God is not a survival of, the Hindoo juggernaut, then that disreputable old institution has resigned its trusteeship of human destiny without naming a successor.

We hav got it straight from Grover that the Ruler of the earth
Is so stuck upon us Yankees, and his interest is so vast,
That the people of our nation are especially watched over
And enjoy his fostering kindness from the moment of their birth.

You will recognize the diction; you hav heard it o'er and o'er;
The same was said in '93 and year before the last;
In fact, way back in '88 I mind the pious fiction,
Which was identical with this of eighteen ninety-four.

Now the chestnut as a seasoning for Thursday's roast or stew,
It is known, will form a dressing of a savor unsurpassed,
But yet it shouldn't follow by a parity of reasoning,
That we must swallow chestnuts in the proclamation too.

The fifty clergymen who condemned the Rev. W. H. Betts, of Johnstown, Pa., hav, I think, given themselvs away. "One night recently," says the dispatch, "Mr. Bates was seen in the rear of some buildings in company with Jennie Watkins, a notorious woman." On that account charges of immorality were made against Mr. Bates, and although he swore that he was merely seeking the salvation of the woman, his brethren shook their heads and suspended him from the ministry. The fifty clergymen appear to hav known themselvs too well to be deceived by the fifty-first. Opportunity for offense being proved, they had only to consider what they would hav done under similar circumstances in order to establish the guilt of the accused. But if they reject the professions of the Rev. Mr. Bates, what reason hav any of us to accept theirs?

PHILOSOPHICAL AND RELIGIOUS.

Faith enables us to hav more confidence in what we guess at than in what we know.

The rock in the way of woman suffrage is the adamantine truth that suffrage, male or female, is not a paralyzing success.

Beware, my sister, of the man who assures you that love has made him your slave. He is on the point of asking you to become his servant.

When you see a new bank started with a Sunday-school superintendent as cashier, look out for a run. The direction will be toward Canada.

When Christ said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," he was interrupted by Alkali Ike, who advised him to marry and let nature do the rest.

If the Bible speaks otherwise than highly of hell, we must remember that it is written by the promoters of the New Jerusalem, and that the boomers of the rival place are trying to get the courthouse removed to hades.

The clergy know what they are about when they maintain that, although God is all-powerful, his will may be and is daily thwarted by the creature man; and he who thinks otherwise is betting on the wrong candidate. Were it once admitted that the omnipotence of the deity is sufficient for the carrying out of his purposes, the services of the ministers as his agents might be deemed superfluous. Then there would be the devil to pay instead of the preachers, who are not so unwise as to saw off the branch of human idiocy by which they are supported.

The prophets of the old and the prophets of the new are all at sea when they enter the domain of behavior. (1) The servants of Christ hold that immortality is the foundation of morality; but upon this it ensues that immortality not being of this world, there is no earthly basis for morality. (2) The enlightened ones instruct us to do right because it is right to do right; in saying which they are as lucid as the philosophers who explained that cold was cold because it was cold. They might avoid tautology without sacrifice of clearness by contenting themselvs with saying we should do right because. November 28th—"The French Revolution in Romance." Dwight M. Lowrey.

News and Notes.

The Brooklyn Philosophical Association, with its fine hall and cultivated audiences and lively discussions, presents to the secular pilgrim a very pleasant picture of Eastern Freethought, which, if not quite so aggressiv as that of the West, is still a widely flowing stream of tendency to the new times. President Rowley, with his efficient staff, has given a noble and splendid position to Freethought in this "City of the Churches." I delivered a lecture before the association on Sunday afternoon, November 11th, on "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Freethought," which was well received. As the object of the lecture was rather to develop harmonies than discord, the points made were not combated very pugnaciously. However, President Rowley made a pretty severe and critical examination of the claims of phenomenal Spiritualism. He wanted to see a "naked spirit." Why does the spirit always appear clothed? Hav "old clothes" an immortality also? The inhabitants of the other world must always appear dressed. How much more vivid and interesting the manifestations would be if the spirit was only naked. The naked truth is what science is after; and it must be admitted that "materialization" would hav a more logical value if the millinery was omitted. How can we ever analyze a real spirit when it is thus covered up? Pure spirit is the thing, and until we get it, phenomenal Spiritualism must remain an object of faith. The argument of Rowley was not squarely met, and on this point it is evident that Spiritualism must await further developments. If we can't test a spirit as spirit, how is it possible ever to know? What we see are clothes; and we infer the spirit. Rowley also said that if you put your arm around a spirit it never passed through the arm, but always stopped right there. Now if a spirit can go through walls and roofs without impediment, why can't it go through a human arm? Why must it slide around, as if an obstacle were in the way? The chairman made several other good points, which added much to the interest of the lecture. After all the bristling discussion, it was evident that so far as the philosophy of this world is concerned we are pretty well agreed. We combine heart and soul against orthodoxy and the tyrannies and superstitions of the past.

The atmosphere of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association is so congenial, it is so animated with thought, it is so manifold and sparkling in its elements, that I gather intellectual strength from its meetings, and feel that I can hustle in the pioneer ranks more courageously than ever. May the light of this association never die out. Under its present management it certainly radiates a splendid influence, light and heat both, and the whole universe finds full play upon its broad platform. In the evening of the same day, with the same lecture, I find an equally delightful audience at Newark, N. J. Here President Bird stands at the front with the pertinacity of the old-time reformers, and the League flourishes under his wise and equable administration. Dr. Wright, Daniel T. Ames, and others made some very pertinent criticism on the lecture. Mr. Bird pointed out the pregnant fact admitted by a popular preacher of Newark that "science is anti-God." Said the preacher: "We are undoubtedly on the threshold of the most tremendous and final battle between religion and its opponents, a battle which is to decide, once for all, whether we are to believe in a creator or not. There never was a time when the antagonism to Christianity was so skillful and so successful as now. If the church ignores the magnificent arguments urged by men of science against Christianity the next generation will certainly be Agnostic, and its most brilliant men and women will be utterly without faith in Christ. Though many Christian men giv their attention to scientific things, modern science is essentially godless. A most significant fact is that out of the last forty-three presidents of the Royal Society, men chosen from the highest ranks of science, but seventeen were acknowledged Christians. We are not fighting a man of straw when we are fighting Agnosticism, but something which has taken an awful hold upon our intellectual youth. Ask your son when he comes from college what he thinks of the Bible, and you will be surprised at the answer."

This is a pretty good confession for a Christian preacher. He seems to understand the situation.

President Bird in a criticism of the above declaration, in the Newark News, further elucidated the position of the frank theologian, and corrected some of his scientific mistakes. In closing, Mr. Bird said: "This preacher has elicited my sincere admiration. Few of his cloth will admit of any conflict between religion and science, but by various ingenious devices and artifices endeavor to reconcile the irreconcilable."

Newark is one of the places I always like to visit. It is one of the first places in which I gave Freethought lectures, and through various fortunes for many years the League has preserved its vigor and has a bright look ahead.

On Sunday, November 18th, I lecture, afternoon and evening, at Philadelphia before the Friendship Liberal League, and here I meet a great audience. The League has removed to a larger hall, which holds about a thousand people, and in the evening it was filled. Much credit is due the president, secretary, and members of the League for the brilliant success of the Freethought association. It is continually increasing in power and influence and has weathered the hard times with great pluck and éclat. It is a most encouraging field of Liberal effort. Greeting many friends in this handsome new hall, my mind's eye sees many radiant visions of human progress.

In the afternoon I lectured on "Socialism, Anarchy, and Republicanism," and this wide and varied subject elicited a many-sided discussion, participated in by Messrs Whittick, Hannum, Kitson, Butler, and Frailey, who all had different opinions to express. I suppose we never shall agree as to the best political remedy for existing evils; but one thing is sure, we shall never find out until the matter has been most thoroughly discussed from every point of view and experiments made. There is no patent remedy, and we cannot settle the question by any mere assumptions nor by sentimentalism. Whatever is done must be done scientifically and with a recognition of human nature as it is.

In the evening I lectured on "The Bible." This brought out some lively Christians to the defense of their idolized book; but my facts and arguments were not overthrown. The reply was the old, old story of "Believe in Jesus, and you will be saved." It was an appeal to feeling and not to common sense.

I was pleased indeed with the reception at Philadelphia. The audience was magnetic and made one do his level best.

I had the pleasure of meeting Prof. Clarence De Rome, recently from England, a member of the British Secular Union, who now makes America his residence. He is devoted to the art of music.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. Wm. F. Porter. Mr. Porter was one of the first Liberal comrades I met in Philadelphia. He was of English birth—a talented and devoted Secularist. He died within the last year. He met his fate bravely. He had no fear. He was an honorable and noble man, and always stood by his colors. We will keep his memory green. Mrs. Porter is earnestly Liberal, and it was a great pleasure to meet her again. I am sure that her excellent boarding-house, with its finely furnished rooms, will be a pleasant place for Liberal friends who visit Philadelphia to locate; for there will be a cordial greeting and a Freethought atmosphere, with good things which one does not always find at a hotel. The number is 1427 Vine street.

I quite enjoyed my renewed acquaintance with J. O. Bentley. He certainly has had a remarkable experience. He has been a Freethinker from six years up. He has taken the Investigator over fifty years, and THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it began at Paris, Ill. He is now seventy-four years of age, and is in splendid health and is built for a century. He has taken part in and vividly remembers the old battles for liberty from 1840 onward, the glowing speeches of Ernestine L. Rose, Frances Wright, Harriet Martineau, Garrison, etc. He is an inventor and has made his fortune as manufacturer of decorativ art needle work, which art he himself originated. He has traveled extensivly throughout this country and Europe, and is a great student of those things which make for human happiness. It was a great pleasure to visit his beautiful establishment and to view the wonderful and gorgeous designs in embroidery, many of which sprang from his fertil brain. These hav a large sale, although it takes money to enjoy such exquisit and cunning marvels of human ingenuity. One would scarcely think that silk could be woven into such airy and fairy forms—birds, insects, flowers, etc.—which charm the eye like the beauty of nature itself. Freethought with my friend Bentley unfolds into a world of glorious color and form.

Letters of Friends.

The Great Almighty Dollar.

Oct. 28, 1894.

BROTHER PUTNAM: The greatest work of your life, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," reached me safely. I hav only glanced over it, but to say that I am well pleased with it would be putting it mildly. I am delighted with it and am sure it will be a great source of pleasure and intellectual profit to me through the winter evenings. You certainly deserve to rest after such an heroic effort to emancipate your fellow-man from superstitious thraldom.

May the "Great Almighty" (dollar) numerously bless you in all your undertakings in behalf of mental liberty, is the prayer of your friend, D. J. O'N.

There Has Been Progress.

WORCESTER, MASS., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" received. I hav looked it over and find it is well worth the time we hav waited for it. It is with great pleasure one can read and see what progress has been made during the centuries since superstitition had such a strong hold upon the people. Many thanks to Mr. Putnam for this grand book, which I think will be read by many who would be unwilling to hav their names among the list of its subscribers.

I was in a news-room a few months ago and I asked the proprietor if I could leave a few TRUTH SEEKERS on his counter for people to read. He said it would injure his business, but he would keep a few in a corner of the shelf and show them to anyone who might call for it or to those whom he knew to be liberally inclined. It would set people to thinking for themselvs, and that is just what we want.

HARRIET C. DODGE.

Wants Putnam to Write More.

APPONAUG, R. I., Nov. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is at hand, and a fine book it is, and it has turned out to be a great deal better than I anticipated, and I only wish that Comrade Putnam would giv us some more of the same sort, for a finer book for sound sense and logic was never in circulation than the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," to my knowledge. It comes right to the point with no beating about the bush. As I said when I sent on for it, I would be without it for no consideration whatever, if it cost twice the price that I paid for it. Anyone with common sense ought to hav it in his house, if for nothing more than a reference book to show him where he stands on the religious question. I do not believe in it myself now, but when I was between twelve and seventeen I did attend Sunday-school, and was taught the old Puritan sort of belief in hell-fire and brimstone; but when I left home to go to sea, which I followed for upwards of thirty years, I got my eye-teeth cut after seeing the rascality carried on under the cloak of religion in foreign countries and islands from the north to the south, the east to the west. That has given me enough of religion, for if you want to find fraud, rascality, and superstition you will find them within the pale of the church. This is my firm belief. JOHN R. SWEET.

Makes It Interesting for the Preachers.

CRAYON, O., Nov. 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find the amount necessary to carry on my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER to the new year. It seems to me that to do without this paper is to liv in constant need of a great necessity of life. I read several papers, but were I to dispense with all but one, I assure you THE TRUTH SEEKER would be retained.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought" has been received and perused. It meets my every expectation. It is a remarkable book. I would not exchange it for all the Bibles in Christendom. Having met and formed an acquaintance with its genial author, I shall keep it as a work of unmeasured worth as well as an invaluable souvenir.

I am in receipt of a number of letters from our Liberal lecturers asking that I arrange for lectures in my locality, but on account of the few working Freethinkers I cannot comply. Nothing would please me better than to hav a series of Freethought lectures here this winter, and treat this priest-ridden community to showers of sense and reason. However, this seems impossible. I shall do what I can myself, and during the coming protracted meetings I shall endeavor to make it interesting for the pulpit pounder, the saint and the sinner. Always working for our cause and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, respectfully, ELMER MILLER.

Wants the Author Well Paid.

STOCKTON, CAL., Oct. 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Am in receipt of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." My first impressions of it were amply verified on review of its contents and admirable illustrations.

The mechanical make-up of the book, in my judgment, is all-round perfection, highly creditable to all concerned, and cannot fail to be satisfactory to the subscribers. But I should like to be assured that after all the art, care, and liberal expense bestowed upon its preparation, together with the cost of mailing to its patrons, there was a reasonable sum left for the author.

It is a valuable addition to Freethought literature, and Mr. Putnam is no doubt proud of its authorship, as its patrons are of its author and his book. It deserves a large circulation and I hope that future editions will enable him to take some leisure, after his many years of ceaseless and untiring labors in the Liberal cause.

Bothered With Church Beggars.

CHEYENNE, WYO., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that THE TRUTH SEEKER is welcomed to the Opera House Block. It is a welcome guest and read by many, and those cartoons of Mr. Heston's are beyond comment. It is amusing to see some of the people look at them and then giv that far-away look and make the remark that such a paper should not be published, and I ask them about the Bible and they say, "Inspired." By whom? No answer. Reason has not reached them yet, but I think prospects are brighter than in the past in this Christian city. This is a very Christian city; we hav churches on every corner and church property about the same, but we see none of it on the tax list, which would be of great benefit to the taxpayers of this county. Still they are very activ in politics.

We hav many Freethinkers here, but they are afraid to say much for fear they will be boycotted. It is unpleasant to be robbed in this style, but then it is for the love of God and is all right.

We hav a sky-pilot in this city who has just built a church and is very anxious to pay for it, and he is now around urging the citizens of the city to pay for it, and he has gone so far as to apply the boycott to business men who do not donate liberally, but I suppose that his works are all for the benefit of God.

And here comes another: "Well, what is it this morning?"

"I am selling tickets for the social this evening for the benefit of the organ fund."

I did not take a ticket and I suppose if the opportunity presents itself the old remedy will be applied, but nevertheless I can't swallow Jonah and the ticket doesn't go. I think this city has more church beggars than any other of its size in the country. If they would look after the needy, I think that they would attain better results, as there are many in the county they could assist. Z.

An Explanation.

PORTLAND, OR., Nov. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As truth and justice are two of the fundamental principles of Freethought, and as THE TRUTH SEEKER always givs both sides of any question, I hav no doubt that you will giv me a little of your valuable space to correct a statement made by Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union, in her report of the last convention, which is worded so as to convey the impression that I ran the Oregon State Secular Union in debt. I refer to the following sentence: "The convention assumed the indebtedness incurred by Chas. Hagner and others, for improvements made on the Oregon Secular Park, amounting per bill rendered to $72.60." The injustice consists in mentioning my name alone as the party who contracted the bill and then saddled the same on the Oregon State Secular Union, when, in fact, Mrs. Smith and D. W. Smith were the prime movers in having the debt contracted to secure the donation of land for the Park as officers of the Union. Mr. and Mrs. David Wittenberg would not giv a deed to the Union unless some improvements were made on the place, and as the Union had no money on hand—in fact, was in debt—Mr. and Mrs. Smith as well as myself thought that by running an excursion from Portland to the Park w could clear enough money to pay for the necessary improvements, which consist of the clearing of two acres of land, a pavilion forty feet square, roofed over, a speaker's stand, and lunch and ice cream booths. W. W. Jesse, president of the Union, who by the way was not over-confident of the financial success of the undertaking, and Mrs. Smith procured the lumber and got people to haul it to the grounds, while I, at this end of the line, sent men to do the work, furnished provisions for the same, the nails and other things needed; to do this I advanced the money out of my own pocket, part of which I had to borrow. Owing to the strike and scarcity of money we did not realize our financial expectations, and when I brought my bill before the Convention, D. W. Smith disclaimed any connection with the work as an official of the Union, claiming that what he did, he did as an individual. I will further say that while the executiv committee of the Union did perhaps not hold a meeting and authorize these improvements to be made, I had four of the said committee with me all the time, and I notice they took good care to hav the lumber bill allowed by the Convention, which would hav been useless without the other work being done. In closing, I will say this: If the executiv committee did what they did as individuals, let us divide the bill in five parts and each pay his or her share. I will pay mine like a man. So far the executiv committee has not turned over one dollar to me on account of the bill allowed by the Convention, and has used all the money raised at Forest Grove for other purposes. Hoping you will oblige me by publishing this, I remain, respectfully yours,

CHAS. HAGNER,
Treas. First Secular Church of Portland.

Failed to See the Satire.

ANKENY, IA., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of two copies of your publication, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and can heartily indorse the name but not the spirit of it. Your treatment of Amos is slighting, unfair, and dishonest. (I say this in kindness, and will proceed to prove it.) Is it not unfair to quote an expression of displeasure from any author and not quote the reason for that displeasure, especially when the reason is given in the next sentence? Is it not dishonest to so slight a writer for the purpose of casting contempt either on him or his subject? I will illustrate: I hav a son sixteen years old. In July I send him into the field with a team and mower to cut hay. About 10 A.M. he appears before me with his hair perfumed, a violin in one hand and a slice of meat in the other and says, "Father, sit down and eat this meat while I play you a tune!" Would it be fair or honest for him—or anyone else—to complain of me for refusing to be thus entertained and say nothing of the neglected hay-field? I am aware that Christians are serving their God with about as much zeal and consistency as the boy would hav been cutting hay while preparing his hair, his viol, and his meat to flatter and hoodwink me. But in cutting loose from their hypocrisy need you also cut loose from consistency? When you publish a journal of Freethought worthy of the name I will subscribe for it—if I am able to pay the price—but don't send me any more such stuff as the samples now at hand. Yours for the uplifting of humanity, H. D. EASTLY.

[The "next sentence" does not giv the explanation of Jehovah's wrath, but the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth sub-divisions of the chapter quoted by Mr. Heston furnish the desired clue. In them we are informed that the Children of Israel had failed, during their alleged forty years' tramp through the wilderness, to proffer to their tutelar divinity the sacrifices and offerings to which he is supposed to hav thought himself entitled, and that they had also borne the images of some of the "false gods." This neglect enraged him, and he refused to play any more until they had sufficiently humbled themselvs. Now this "cause" of the god's displeasure had no relation to the point that Mr. Heston was making against the Bible and no injustice was done to any "author" or transcriber. Mr. Eastly seems to be lacking in imagination and the sense of humor. If he were not he would hav seen at a glance that the artist was making fun of the idea that an infinit God could be placated by a peace offering of fat meat, the sound of viols, or the stench of burning entrails of beasts. Just fancy the size of the nose that an infinit God must hav! And what enormous ears to take in the "melody" of those little Jew's harps and viols! Cannot Mr. Eastly understand that these old anthropomorphic conceptions of the God he worships are utterly childish and absurd, totally out of place in this age of science, and ridiculous even when considered as parts of the higher forms of monotheism? He should be able to recognize a jest before he again charges us with being "unfair and dishonest."—ED. T. S.]

From Cradle to Church.

ELSINORE, CAL., Oct. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Rev. J. H. Williams, of Los Angeles, made the following observations before the General Congregational Association, held in that city last week:

Jesus emphasized the truth that the little ones belonged to God, and were to be kept near to himself. The attitude of the church toward its young people should be one of cordial greeting and sympathy. They need a good deal of sunshine for their growth. The church home needs to be a warm, cosy place. There is in the child a deep-seated reverence for authority when properly used. The church has taken a long step toward the solution of the problems connected with the young in recognizing that they are a part of the church life. The truth should be recognized that the children are already in the church, and the problem is to keep them in it. The child says "my church." Let us cultivate this sense of ownership and possession. The Junior Christian Endeavor Society is proving an easy step to the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, and that an easy step to the church. Let us use this pathway from the cradle to the church door.

The apple may grow in the bottle which cannot be forced in when larger grown.

Rev. Mr. Williams in thus talking to an audience simply gave publicity to what has always been the secret policy of Christianity; but this good and wily reverend gentleman, together with all the other good and wily gentlemen of the cloth, must soon discover that even these easy stepping stones "from the cradle to the church" will not toll in the lambs of the nineteenth century. Children cannot be reared in the present civilization without receiving some of the benefits of its influence, one of which is the capacity to reason.

They will obtain worldly wisdom as well as "church sunshine"—or moonshine, as the worldly wisdom they obtain will translate it to them. They will read the history of the church as well as other history and wonder why the church has been dragging so far in the rear. They will ask for a better and revised edition of the genealogy of the blessed savior, and if they are not supplied with one which bears the mot de passe of respectability they will be very coy about entering the church, even should they arrive at the door.

The "deep-seated reverence for authority" will giv way to a deep-seated reverence for truth, and they will smile at the mythology of the parents whom they love and honor, the same as those parents smile when they remember the no more ridiculous mythologies of their own past consanguinity.

They will hesitate as to the advisability of teaching their own little ones the past, present, or future possibility of immaculate conception by holy ghosts, and they will marvel that Jesus allowed his mother's dishonor to be revealed to the unfeeling criticism of society, even if it were true. They will wonder why the author of their religion did not teach science instead of superstition, morality instead of discord, marriage instead of misogamy, peace instead of dissension, and they will wonder and ask why he did not by precept and example teach plain and unvarnished truth instead of mystification.

When these little Junior Christian Endeavor Society people inquire who Cain's wife was a slipper trial for heresy will not bring them back into the fold as it did when the good doctor was wearing his swaddling clothes, but it will convince them of a possible weakness in the foundation of Christianity and set them to work investigating, and when they hav done so they will be ashamed to say "my church," but will be anxious to deliver entire possession thereof to the truly good Rev. Dr. Williams, et al, who hav not followed the march of civilization so closely as to perceive its glory, a glory pre-eminently more brilliant and substantial than that upon which sits, surrounded by airily clothed angels, deacons, murderers, ministers, polygamous saints, and weak-minded women, the author and finisher of the good reverend doctor's bad faith.

F. H. HEALD.

Mr. Swan Talks to Mr. Taylor.

AKRON, O., Nov. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am once more compelled to come to the front in defense of my "fool ideas," and will endeavor to explain myself as plainly as possible, regardless of whom it hits, for I hav long since learned that even a Humboldt or Ingersoll does not know it all. Neither has that boasted monster called "science" as yet ascended the second step of the great ladder of development.

I am pleased to know that there is one Freethinker in Columbus, O., who dares to think for himself, regardless of priest or king, parent or guardian, but I would giv Mr. Taylor a few ideas for consideration.

He admits that he "has been hit in the eye quite as hard as Mr. Swan;" and then goes on to acknowledge the law of "psychic" power; and when he does so, he shows that he is not nearly as joined to his idols as he may think; and for all such there are hopes, yea, expectations, that they will eventually perch as victors on the mountain top of advanced thought.

He goes on to say, "Before this subject [Spiritualism] can be of much practical use it will hav to be put on a scientific basis, and the Spiritualist's mind does not, as a general rule, seem to be built for scientific thinking; it is organized for wondering, believing, and dreaming, rather than for reasoning, doubting, and investigating." Well, really, Mr. Taylor, I hope to soon see Spiritualism put on a scientific basis, although it will be no great proof of the existence of "spirits" for science to acknowledge that fact, because it will but show that some ignoramus has so demonstrated, but still greater fools will not accept. Science is a very stupid pupil, and was never the originator of one idea. Its ears are filled with undemonstrated wax, its vision obscured by the scales of ignorance.

Science has never yet told us how a tree gathers its solidity, its beautiful proportions and fragrance from off the elements that surround it, neither what or where the life-giving principle came from, that constitutes its very "soul," or entity. Science is but a great, big booby, filled with selfishness and conceit; cannot even tell why the heart continues its thrusts of blood throughout the long night while we sleep; neither knows why the clock ticks, simply because Mr. Armstrong transmits power to the delicate little steel spring so highly tempered that its intuitiv spirit seeks to gain its liberty and straighten itself out instead of being forced to be coiled up within prison walls; why and what the conditions of inanimate matter when formed by certain processes into steel, science knows not, but undertakes to explain that certain properties called this and that, put together, do thus and so and produce certain results. Can it hear the footsteps of the minute little ant as he runs across the floor, or see the nimble little legs as they step with rapid pace to and fro? I think I hear Mr. Ant say to me, "You great, big ass, could I be as large as you I would walk a mile a minute and not mope along as you do, neither would I hav so little regard for ants as you hav, and allow my big, clumsy foot to destroy a whole village of helpless ants." "Hush," says the animalcule, "you are nothing but a big lubber yourself, and pay as little attention to me in my oceanic domain as man does to you, for you will walk with giant strides to our domicil, and gulp a thousand of us down at one swallow."

Now, Mr. Science, you will please consider that could your eyes see and were your ears sensitiv enough you could really distinguish our delicate spirit forms and watch us play ball, see us gather the beautiful flowers, hear us crack foolish jokes with each other, as when in those gross and unsightly forms we had on earth. You would then know that we hav eyes, ears, a heart, and entire physical nature and constitution as perfect as in earth life, but much more refined and progressed, of subtle matter.

Please observe that a soul (entity or life) has the same ability to manifest itself, first, with a physical earth life, then with other and more progressed power; can take on forms of more sublimated matter and such as cannot be perceived by mortal senses.

Now to Mr. Taylor or to others whom it may concern, let them be Colonel Ingersoll, Mr. Putnam, John Peck, or others who depend on science and the ideas of past critics of advanced thought, you can take your own slates to Miss May Bangs, of 10 South Elizabeth street, Chicago, and prepare them yourself, put two or more together, with no pencil between them, in daylight; can either place them on the stand or under it, on the floor, and put your feet on them or suspend them by strings, yourself, from the chaffdelier overhead, and obtain written communications giving both intelligence and physical proof of some unseen power, which signs the names of your deceased friends. You can see the same in your own home should you care to do so by paying the expense as you would for a minister to preach a funeral sermon.

There are many slate-writing mediums in nearly all large cities who can demonstrate nearly all I hav written on the subject of spirit manifestation, and those who doubt my ability to inform myself or my veracity in the matter, after paying out hundreds of dollars to learn the truth (and I hav not been deceived), hav but to expend their own shekels to hav the bigotry taken out of them.

Anyone wishing "My Experience in the Investigation of Spiritualism" can secure it in pamphlet form by sending two cents for postage to A. D. SWAN, Akron, O.

The Church and Woman Suffrage.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12, 294

MR. EDITOR: Without wishing to express any opinion as to the justice of woman's non-enfranchisment, I should be pleased if you would permit me to direct the attention of Clara F. Harker to some facts which she appears to hav overlooked, and if this permission is granted I offer what follows, which is an adaptation of an article of mine that was published in the last issue of Liberty.

I may perhaps be permitted to call the attention of your correspondent to a misapprehension under which she is laboring. I think that it would be very difficult for her to be more mistaken about any other matter of fact than she seems to be regarding the attitude of the conservativ forces toward the political equality of woman. The correspondent mentions the alleged independence of the women voters of Colorado in the election last spring; she tells us that they were not under the control of the ministers, but I remember seeing in THE TRUTH SEEKER a statement of facts that shows that they did make their power felt against the men of Liberal religious views. But let that pass for the present.

Fifteen years ago the minister who advocated giving the ballot to woman was the exception. To-day the Protestant minister at the North (with the possible exception of the Episcopalian, who is not a very conspicuous factor in the discussion of political questions) who does not champion woman suffrage is the man who is rarely found. The tide began to turn about ten years ago, and it has gathered volume every year since, and it still continues to swell. It began in the West, and the further you go in that direction the stronger you will find it to be, generally speaking. So far it is relativly weak in the South, and is not so powerful here as in the Middle West.

The genesis of this movement is very easy to trace, especially to one who has lived in the Prohibition states and is familiar with their politics. Mrs. Harker is well aware, of course, that in the case of all the Protestant churches the membership in and attendance of women is many fold greater than that of men. So notorious is this fact that it a common saying that, were it not for the women, more than half of the Protestant churches would hav to close their doors. They are sustained by the moral and pecuniary support which the women bring to them Many of the men who do go to church attend only because their wives and sweethearts are generally there on Sunday, while the number is still larger who giv money to the church simply because their wives are members thereof and they must help support the conventicle if they would hav peace at home. Could Mrs. Harker leave her home and go out among the people, in all parts of the United States, and spend a few years in getting acquainted with them in town, village, and country, she would be astounded at the number of indifferentists and Infidels who giv with a more or less free hand to the churches. Of course the clergy know well where their friends are and which sex it is that they hav the most influence over, and hence it was very natural that they should early grasp the idea that the ballot in the hands of woman would immediately and vastly augment their power and enrich the church. The first political use they had for woman was in the fight for Prohibition, and they realize that they are likely to be ultimately beaten there if they do not arm her with a vote. Next came the Sunday question—if it was not primary in the thought of the preacher—and from that point the vista of tyranny widened out until at this time the militant branch of the church expects nothing less from the assistance of "enfranchised woman" than the establishment of a theocracy in which religion, morals, and politics will be absolutely dominated by the reactionary principles of the most orthodox wing of Protestant Christianity. Before the clerical influence was enlisted on the side of the woman suffragists the ballot for woman was demanded on the ground that it was her right to vote because she was amenable to the criminal laws, because she was a taxpayer, and because one sex cannot legislate justly for another. But it was not long after the ministers came to her side before the tone of the woman-suffrage advocates changed, and from that time on we heard less and less about equality of rights and more and more concerning what woman would do in the suppression business when once she got her hands on the reins of authority. She would suppress the liquor traffic, she would legislate the social evil out of existence, she would preserve the "Sabbath" from "desecration," and now she is prepared to Christianize the Constitution and outlaw Freethought. She long since allied herself with the priesthood for the regulation of art and literature, and years ago in Kansas she had already been so corrupted by the ministers that, when she got into office in Oskaloosa, she had an ordinance adopted prohibiting the presence of a stallion in any stable within the city limits! That was shortly after she was given the municipal ballot; and now, as the hour of her investiture with full suffrage draws near, her and the clerics' influence has become so potent that the officials hav begun the regeneration of society along more "radical" lines by the castration of the feeble-minded in state institutions. The minister can think of no other method of "reform" so beautiful and efficient as statute law, and he, knowing his influence with woman, is only too eager to giv her political power. Of course there are exceptions, even in the West, but they are becoming fewer every day.

There is another consideration which must always be borne in mind. The churches, as churches, are much more religious and social than they are political in their direct work. The greater portion of their scheming is done indirectly through the auxiliary societies. The differentiation of functions has been going on for some time, and, if you want to know what the live, aggressiv divisions of Protestant Christianity are after, you must make yourself acquainted with the demands and plans of these societies. Among such organizations are the National Reform Association, the American Sabbath Union, the Divorce Reform League, the King's Daughters, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, the League for the Promotion of Purity in Literature and Art (a branch of the Women's Christian Temperance Union), and the Prohibition party. The last contains a few people who are not Christians, but the others are wholly Christian. They are the pioneer political corps of the Protestant churches, and they are for woman suffrage by the overwhelming majority of the membership of each. Although they are many societies, they are seeking the same general end, and there is the strongest bond of sympathy between the leaders of the most reactionary and the (apparently) comparativly harmless organizations. Frances Willard the head of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, is an ardent National Reformer (the God-in-the-Constitution party), and the department of Sunday observance of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, is very activ and successful in its field. Miss Willard has said that she was for woman suffrage because that would be of immense benefit to the church, and Freethinkers know that she is not alone in that position among the prominent workers for woman's political equality. Taken altogether, these societies stand for all that is bigoted and reactionary, outside of the economic domain, in American politics. That they also stand for woman suffrage is significant, to say the least. Between them they are fighting for Prohibition, for rigid Sunday laws, for the Bible in the schools, for one moral code and that the priest's, for no divorce except for adultery and the prohibition of the remarriage of the offending partner, for a censorship of literature, art, and the stage, and the Christianization of the Constitution and laws. For some of these measures they are all united, and no one of them is alone in its propaganda.

As to the Catholic church, it has always permitted to its members considerable liberty of action in regard to most matters not directly affecting their faith. But the prohibitory idea has during the last few years gained a large number of adherents in that organization, and there are not wanting indications of a tendency in the Catholic church to accept and act upon the Puritanic principle. Once it begins to move with an accelerating momentum in that direction, it will not be long before its astute leaders will perceive the wisdom of giving the ballot to woman, as the Northern Protestants hav already. The Catholic church holds for indissoluble marriage, and its vote would be cast solidly for the so-called "reforms" of the Protestant authoritarians. The latter would make almost any concession to the Catholics to secure their assistance. It needs no prophet's eye to see that in two decades the American Catholics will be as devoted to the cause of woman suffrage as the majority of the Protestants now are, and for similar selfish reasons.

I do not say that women should not hav the ballot, despite the grave dangers involved in their enfranchisment, but I do say that we should take the step, if at all, with our eyes open; we cannot afford to be lulled to sleep with assurances that the church is opposed to the woman suffrage movement, for it is not true of the most reactionary part of the Christian army.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Omnipresent Fly.

When winter's gone and spring has sped, and temperature is high,
Prepare to meet and greet the coming of the household fly,

The women folks may fret and scold, and often say "Oh my!"
But what cares he—the buzzing, tiny, ever-present fly?

They come to stay—go right away your tanglefoot to buy,
Or else expect the trouble of the summer household fly.

Though tanglefoot may thin them out and many hundreds die,
Unto their funerals hundreds come to mourn the household fly

But then, though much these household pesky things our patience try,
They're nothing when compared to the bloody out-door fly.

Just look at your old crumpled-horn, industri-ously she'll ply
Her whisking tail, and shake her sides to scare away the fly.

And so he'll buzz—he always does and will till we all die
And leave the field and conflict to the omnipresent fly.

But when the chilly winter comes, 'tis then we'll say good-bye
To the little, tiny buzzing thing—the everlasting fly,

Who, being small, is wont to crawl into some niche so shy,
And there at last they sleep and fast and bid us all good-bye. —B. F. ROBBINS.

The Victory of an Atom.

A large "jag" rolled into the smoking car of a New York & New Haven train at one of the Connecticut stations. It had possession of a small man, who was accompanied by an atom of humanity which huddled down by the small man in the corner of the seat and was completely hidden by the seat's high back and by the man. The man fumbled in his pocket for his ticket, and when he found it, tried to put it between his teeth, where he could find it easily when the conductor came around. His hand went to his eyes, nose, and ears, to the amusement of the spectators. At last he succeeded in getting the ticket into his mouth, where it remained about a minute, and then fell out and into the lap of the atom beside him. Soon the man missed his ticket. He arose with a horrified look on his face and announced to the car occupants that he had swallowed it. The delighted passengers made various suggestions to the man. One advised him to swallow a railroad guide to go with the ticket. Another suggested that he should swallow the conductor's punch with a string attached, so that the ticket might be punched and the punch recovered. At this point, a short, fat man, wearing a pair of green glasses and a snuff-colored suit, asked the man where he was going.

"Sheeder 'Ill," was the reply. Cedar Hill was the station he meant.

The fat man pulled out a time table, consulted it a moment, pulled out from under the seat a sandwich grip, opened it, took out a small vial and, rising, said:

"We are now at Wallingford. I find the running time between here and Cedar Hill, whither our unfortunate fellow-pilgrim is bound, is fifteen minutes. I now hold in my hand a bottle of my justly famous Getthereeli, or Rapid Transit Pellets. I propose to enter them in a race against this train. I will now administer six of them to our friend, and stake my reputation as a benefactor of the race against another ticket that they will overtake the ticket in its wayward course and restore it to its rightful owner before Cedar Hill is reached."

The crowd shouted, the fat man approached the patient, pills in hand, while all the passengers roared. Suddenly a bundle rolled off the seat and tumbled out into the aisle in front of the pill man. It was the atom. His hat had fallen off and a mass of tangled yellow curls fell around his shoulders. His blue eyes blazed and his sturdy little legs were planted wide apart. In his fist he held the missing ticket. His childish, treble voice rang out clear and true.

"You bad mans. You makes fun of my poor papa. You s'ant do it, you naughty mans. He's my papa!"

He stood there like an infant Ajax, glaring defiance at all of them for a moment. Then his chubby fists went up to his eyes and a tempest of sobs burst forth.

A silence fell on the crowd. The pill man stood a moment with mouth agape looking down on the atom. Then he slipped into his seat looking very sheepish. The atom climbed back into his corner while the smiles faded from the faces around. Some looked very steadily out of the window and others with a sudden revulsion of feeling looked reproachfully at the pill man. The conductor came bustling in, sized up the "jag" instantly, and shook the man sharply, demanding his ticket, receiving only mumbled and indistinct replies, while the atom looked up at him with such a world of helpless wonder and trouble in his eyes as would hav melted the heart of an iceberg. The pill man saw that look, arose, touched the conductor's shoulder, and asked how much the man's fare was to Cedar Hill, paid it out of his own pocket, sat down and looked the crowd squarely in the face with the air of a man who has done the right thing and knows it. A colored man entered the car announcing in succulent tones: "Oranges! bananas! figs! candies!"

One man bought a box of candy, reached over and dropped it into the lap of the atom and looked around with a benignant and self-satisfied air. It was catching, and soon the atom was half covered with all sorts of peace offerings. He looked at the things in a dazed sort of way, and then his blue eyes went from face to face with a puzzled expression. Pretty soon two men were hanging over the back of his seat, two more over the back of the seat in front of him, and the aisle near him was crowded with men, all anxious to talk to him, and to show him that they were not the "bad mans" he had thought them. The gigantic "jag," with man attachment, had dwindled into insignificance beside the atom. Cedar Hill was soon reached, and a dozen men stood ready to steer the "jag" and man safely out to the platform of the station, all for the sake of the atom, whose tiny fingers, straying among their heart strings, had found and touched a hidden but tender chord and made it thrill to to the sweet music of humanity.—New York World.

Correspondence.

MIDWAY, KY., Nov, 9, 1894.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav lately read some of your books, and, on the whole, quite an amount of Freethought literature. It is a pleasure to see our cause so rapidly progressing, and let us hope that the day is not far distant when America will indeed be a land of the brave and the free; when every intelligent man and woman, released from the bonds of a religion that seeks to destroy their liberty, will say with that brave and never-forgotten patriot: "The whole world is my country; to do good, my religion."

The contributions in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Mrs. Schwartz and Clara F. Harker on "Woman Suffrage" I read with pleasure, and while I think the opinions of the former were well grounded and accurately expressed, still I agree with the latter, believing as I do that when women interest themselvs in politics and national affairs the church will suffer for lack of nourishment. It is because of the narrow sphere to which they are limited, and because they are told that it is unwomanly to broaden their minds and cultivate their reason, that they remain the bulwarks of the church to-day. Even the most liberal-minded Christians can scarcely free themselvs from the opinion that God created woman for man alone and to exist merely for his pleasure.

Heredity is an enormous power. She can be a friend, but she is often the worst of foes. "I will avenge" is her motto, and with her sword directed toward what is wrong, she strikes a furious blow at the race for every injustice done to woman, every crime in the name of God.

It is only the mothers who are fair-minded and well educated that will free humanity from the shackles of superstition, and produce a race of high-minded, honorable sons.

My letter is growing rather lengthy, so I must bring it to a close. I liv in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. Atheism has very little show here, and at times I feel quite lonely. I should be pleased to hear from some of the young people. My parents are Christians. I became an Infidel of my own accord. I am eighteen years old. With best wishes for yourself and the Cornerites, sincerely,

MAY L. COLLINS.

[A young lady who thinks and reasons for herself is a treasure. We hope May will favor the Corner with her thoughts often. Please tell us something about Freethought in the Blue Grass region.—ED. C. C.]

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing th at this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promiised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History: for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the FreethoughtPress.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

Marching to Freedom.

(AIR—Marching Through Georgia)

Bring the Freethought songster, and we'll sing another song—
Sing it as free men should sing it, many millions strong;
Sing it with a spirit that will start the world along,
As we go marching to Freedom.

CHO.—Hurrah! hurrah! we'll bring the jubilee.
Hurrah! hurrah! 'tis science makes us free.
So we'll sing the chorus over land and over sea.
While we are marching to Freedom.

How the patriots shouted when they heard the joyful sound,
As "Common Sense" by Thomas Paine was scattered all around;
How the crowned heads cursed him when that noble truth was found,
While we were marching to Freedom. [Cho.]

Yes, and there were honest men who suffered at the stake
Because of those blasphemy laws that priests and kings did make;
And only for the 'Rights of Man" we'd never been awake
While we were marching to Freedom. [Cho.]

Sectarism is played out, 'twill never win the host,
Was what old orthodoxy said; it was a handsome boast,
But, alas! they quite forgot to reckon with their ghost,
While we were marching to Freedom, [Cho.]

Robert G., you plainly see, is working with a will,
Macdonald, THE TRUTH SEEKER man, the musty creeds will kill,
And Heston with his cartoons, is by no means keeping still,
While we are marching to Freedom. [Cho.]

Putnam, Bell, and Washburn too, who speak their pieces loud,
Katie Kehm of Oregon, of whom we're justly proud,
And scores of others not here named who are with brains endowed,
While we are marching to Freedom [Cho.]

All hail! to every honest man who battles for the right—
And every noble woman who has shed a ray of light;
Do not be discouraged, but continue in the fight
While we are marching to Freedom. [Cho.]

So we'll make a thoroughfare for Freedom and her train
From western California to southern coast of Maine,
And creeds must fly before us, for resistance is in vain.
While we are marching to Freedom. [Cho.]

Books by SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS),
Editor of the London Agnostic Journal

GOD AND HIS BOOK.
When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think.' It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclasti broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible Cloth, gold lettered. $1.25

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.
The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that 'Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.
A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.
A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christion Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

Gems of Thought.

MENTAL power cannot be got from ill-fed brains.—Herbert Spencer.

ENTHUSIASM is the genius of sincerity; truth accomplishes no victories without it. —Bulwer Lytton.

CHEERFULNESS in lonely adherence to the right, is the endowment of elevated characters.—Emerson.

BE you yourself, in yourself, whole. Do the acts of justice. Let mutual respect epitaph charity. Let men take their natural places in self-sufficient poise. Let priests and professional economists retire. Take up the golden thread yourself. It runs through all history and it leads the way of all revelation.—Horace L. Traubel.

BRIEFLY, a morality which does not imply character is no morality, or a morality of the scourge and the hangman; but a morality which does imply character is a morality which cannot appeal to the motivs common to men and pigs. The essentially bad man is safe from argument. The attempt to escape from this dilemma is, I hold, the source of most of the sophistry about ethical problems.—Leslie Stephen.

To test all assertions by adequate evidence, to extricate the truth from involvements of imperfect language, to push inquiry by every method—these are prime essentials of human progress. Of equal necessity is the removal of all checks to the liberty of expressing opinions. If these objects hav the importance that Mill attributed to them, his labors for their promotion would alone entitle him to be accounted a benefactor of the race. —Dr. Bain.

AND what is · · · true of the body corporal is true also of the body spiritual, intellectual, esthetic. It is the duty of every one among us to develop himself and herself to the highest possible point, freely, in every direction. It is our duty to think as far as we can think; to get rid of all dogmas, preconceptions, and prejudices; to make sure we are not tied by false or vague terrors ; to examin all faiths, all belief, all fancies, all shibboleths, political, religious, social, moral.—Grant Allen.

LET others bow at marble shrine
Within the white cathedral's calm,
And sing the penitential psalm,
And quaff the red communion wine;
But never to your unseen king
Will my proud spirit bend the knee
Until with mortal eyes I see
An angel hovering on the wing,
Or hear a melody divine
Down-ringing through the purple skies,
Or see the fronded palms that rise
Where heaven's hills are said to shine.
—Kenneth Lamar.

WE are told that morality without a particular form of belief is impossible. For twelve years every kind of religious teaching has been banished from the primary schools of France, and yet immorality among the French children has not increased. The beliefs which the church imposes are like the "bogie" which the nurse conjures up to keep her charges quiet. Mankind asks for bread, but the church givs a stone; for work she offers fine phrases; empty promises she givs instead ofaction: trust in a visionary future instead of well-being in an actual present. —Ludwig Büchner.

I AM just and honest, not because I expect to liv in another world, but because, having felt the pain of injustice and dishonesty towards myself, I hav a fellow feeling with other men who would suffer the same pains if I were unjust or dishonest towards them. Why should I giv my neighbor short weight in this world because there is not another world in which I should hav nothing to weigh out to him. I am honest because I don't like to inflict evil on others in this life, not because I am afraid of evil to myself in another. It is a pang to me to witness the suffering of a fellow being, and I feel his suffering the more because he is mortal, because his life is so short, and I would hav it, if possible, filled with happiness, and not misery.—George Eliot.

FOR thousands of years men hav been writing the real Bible, and it is being written from day to day, and it will never be finished while man has life. All the facts that we know, all the truly recorded events, all the discoveries and inventions, all the wonderful machines whose wheels and levers seem to think, all the poems, crystals from the brain, flowers from the heart, all the songs of love and joy, of smiles and tears, the great dramas of Imagination's world, the wondrous paintings, miracles of form and color, of light and shade, the marvelous marbles that seem to liv and breathe, the secrets told by rock and star, by dust and flower, by rain and snow, by frost and flame, by winding stream and desert sand, by mountain range and billowed sea.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

$679,694,439.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. - - - - - -	$1.00

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield. one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Not for Parsons.

SANDY MACTAVISH.

"The Sabbath was made for man," but the "Scawtchman" was made for the "Sawbath."

Sandy Mactavish was walking one day
Along by the seashore in Armadale Bay,
When, splashing and dashing and quite within reach,
He saw, in a pool that was left on the beach,
A salmon that struggled in vain to be free,
And tried very hard to get back to the sea.
But Sandy rejoiced, like a canny old Scot,
And made up his mind that return it should not,
When, just as he started to capture his game,
He remembered the Sawbath, and thought of the shame,
That the elders and deacons would say was attached
To fish that on Sawbaths by sinners were "catched,"
Aud stood for a moment crestfallen and glum,
Now scratching his head and now biting his thumb,
For nothing could alter the date or the day
To justify taking the salmon away.
But Sandy was canny, like most of his race,
And thought that he might find a snug little place
Where the tide wouldn't reach, but the fish could remain
Till Monday would let him come fishing again,
For all the kirk elders and all the kirk men
Wouldn't hav spoken to Sandy, ye ken,
If he'd taken the fish when the law had decreed
That Jews from all manner of work should be freed.
So he found a nice spot, in a dark little grot,
And rejoiced at the fortune that fell to his lot,
And there he conveyed the fine fish that he'd found,
Which he'd hav for his supper when Monday came round.
Monday morning arrived, as did Sandy as well,
And there was the fish, safe and sound as a bell,
And Sandy Mactavish, I hardly need say,
Didn't wait very long ere he took him away.
He straightway invited, that very same night,
Some friends of his bosom with him to unite,
To partake of a fish, which would make such a dish,
That never for better could anyone wish;
And when they appeared at his jovial board,
'Twas just as he said; it was fit for a lord.
There was Elder McPherson and Deacon McGill,
And Macgregor the laird, who lived up on the hill,
Doctor McCulloch and Hamilton Quirk,
The parson who preached in Mactavish's kirk;
Six brawny old Scots, who had long pulled together,
Thanks to Scotch whisky, thro' all the Scotch weather;
And they didn't take very long to dispose
Of the salmon—and peas. Then a question arose
As to how such a piece of good fortune befell
To enable Mactavish to treat them so well,
And over the whisky they begged him to tell
As to who was the donor, and why he had sent
Such a fine bonny fish, which he doubtless had meant
As a token of gratitude; still, there were some
Who thought it might indicate favors to come;
But these, from respect to propriety's laws,
Didn't hint that they thought such a thing was the cause.
They had eaten the salmon, jowl, middle, and tail,
With the peas that I've mentioned, as well as sea kale,
And whisky the best that was ever distilled,
And so with all peace and contentment were filled.
They puffed their tobacco, what more could they wish,
Save that Sandy would say how he came by the fish.
Mactavish, then beaming with innocent pride,
Did the tale of his fishing excursion confide,
And expected his guests would exclaim with delight
That in spite o' the Sawbath he'd done what was right.
But picture his feelings when never a word
Beyond a deep murmur of censure he heard,
While they sat in their places with frowns as they spoke
(The elder and deacon both stopped in their smoke);
Till an unpleasant silence the minister broke:
"Alexander Mactavish, it's little we cared,
Myself and the deacon, the elder, and laird,
To ask any questions before we appeared
At a house where we thought there was nought to be feared,
Tho' some of the folk are weak brothers, 'tis true,
We never expected such conduct from you.
But fishing on Sawbath! We ne'er could ha' thought
That you by the deil were so easily caught."
He paused; and the others all showed by their looks
That Sandy had got in their very black books.
And when he attempted to tell them his views,
They shut up their ears. Why, they might hav been Jews!
In silence they left, except Minister Quirk,
Who said that he'd hav to report to the kirk
The breach of decorum and Sandy's confession—
Which he couldn't deal with, but left to the session,
Which had its next meeting that very same week,
And there with Mactavish again he would speak.

. . . . .

Kirk session was met, and Mactavish was there,
With Minister Quirk at the head in the chair,
And the elder, and deacon, and doctor, and laird,
Who now for inquiring apparently cared,
As well as some others, who felt very queer,
Thro' not being asked to partake of the cheer;
And if a conclusion was ever foregone,
To make a man wish he had never been born,
'Twas that which they sat on in judgment this morn.
They sat upon this, and they sat upon that,
And one of the gentlemen sat on his hat
And squashed his best beaver remarkably flat;
So when to the fishing excursion they came
With just indignation their hearts were aflame.
And didn't they giv it to Sandy, and say,
That the fish was a test which had come in his way,
Being left by the deil, as he ought to hav known,
Who wished to secure him for one of his own,
And as with such ease he had taken his prey,
They wondered he'd gone so much out of his way;
For he needn't hav left a fine salmon like that,
When all that he wished he'd hav had for a sprat.
And this was the judgment they passed on the case:
"That fishin' on Sawbaths was awfully base,
And Sandy had brought on the kirk such disgrace,
That ere he could enter its precincts again,
He must make an apology ample and plain;
And then if they thought he was penitent quite,
They wouldn't be sure, but receive him they might."
But Sandy was obstinate, little he cared
For the wrath of the deacon, the elder, and laird;
And as to the minister, also the session,
They could all go to—(oh! such a wicked expression).
His dander was up, and he wasn't polite,
And he knew that they acted from motivs of spite.
Himself, he considered the salmon was sent
By providence and as a favor was meant;
And if any more on the Sawbath he found,
He wouldn't abide until Monday came round,
But take them directly, and eat every bit
By himself, as his neighbors were clearly unfit
To partake of such dainties as salmon and peas;
They didn't deserve more than dry bread and cheese.
And if in the kirk they'd receive him no more,
He'd go all his Sawbaths to fish on the shore.
The session replied, thro' their head in the chair,
He could do as he liked, and they'd none of 'em care,
And after the way that he'd treated them all,
Although they regretted his terrible fall,
They'd hav him to know that they wouldn't relent;
And further, the fish by the deil was sent,
And Sandy had better hav tested the case,
By leaving the fish or hav hidden his face,
And so hav avoided temptations like this,
And, counting such trials as nothing but bliss,
Hav lived, as they certainly thought that he ought,
Without eating fish that on Sawbaths was caught. —Chilian Times.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD.
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

THE chief of the Chicago police has dismissed thirty policemen for neglect of duty and malreating citizens on election day. Seventeen others hav been suspended for conniving at the escape of murderers.

ON November 12th the American liner "St. Louis" was launched at Philadelphia, Mrs. Cleveland breaking the bottle of champagne over the bow of the vessel, against the emphatic protest of the Prohibitionists.

MISSOURI went Republican by 3,094. The Democrats lost 41,853 and the Republicans gained 1,927. The Populist vote was 42,466, the Prohibitionist, 3,098, and the Socialistic Labor, 1,572. The Populists gained 1,259.

THE report of the commissioners appointed by President Cleveland to investigate the Pullman railway strike is decidedly adverse to the railroad corporations, a surprise alike to the strikers and the railway managers.

DISSENSIONS hav broken out in the ranks of the striking cloakmakers of this city, and about three thousand hav returned to work. They are very poor and receive such small wages that they cannot maintain a protracted strike.

BY the foundering of the British ship Culmore off the coast of Yorkshire during the great storm of last week twenty-two lives were lost. Thousands of people hav been driven from their homes by the overflowing of the Avon.

ON November 15th Prudente de Morães took his seat as president of the republic of Brazil, being the third in succession. but the first elected by the vote of the people. The cabinet seems to be composed of men friendly to Ex-President Peixoto.

A SYNDICATE of Chicago firms has secured two contracts with Japan, one for canned corned beef for the army and the other for cast-iron pipe to extend the Tokio waterworks. The contracts were secured in competition with English, French, and Belgian bidders.

THE lenses for the Chicago observatory were tested at the Cambridge establishment of Alvan G. Clark a few days ago. They are the largest ever made, the diamter of each nearly equaling that of an ordinary buggy wheel and weighing, with their mountings, 1,200 pounds.

THE Supreme Court of Pennsylvania reaffirms the decision of the lower court in the Gallitzin case. The decision is that it is not sectarian instruction for teachers who are nuns to appear in the school room in the garb of their order. Justice Williams hands down a dissenting opinion.

A BILL has been introduced in the legislature of Georgia which makes the sale of liquor in that state a felony and creates a state dispensary and state liquor inspector, the latter being clothed with despotic power to enter upon property for purposes of investigation and to seize contraband goods.

THE Woman's Club of Chicago, after a stormy session, declined to admit to membership the noted lecturer, Mrs. Fanny Williams, who is an octoroon. Mrs. Charles Henrotin is bitterly opposed to drawing the color line and it is probable that the action of the majority will disrupt the association.

THE butchery of Armenians by Kurds appears to hav been more appalling than at first reported; the death list is put by some as high as ten thousand. The massacres were attended by all the peculiar atrocities which hav ever characterized religious slaughterings. In reading the narrativ of the terrible event one is reminded of the awful scenes that attended the capture of Jerusalem by the Christians during the Crusades.

THE Bureau of Engraving and Printing, refusing to profit by the long experience of the former makers of our postage stamps, has turned out a large supply that do not meet the requirements of the users of stamps and now postmasters are authorized to return them to the department. The ink is "off color," the stamps curl, the mucilage will not stick. The bureau tried to use a cheaper grade of paper and of mucilage than experience had demonstrated to be necessary.

ON November 19th Reuben F. Kolb, defeated Populist candidate for governor of Alabama, issued an address to his party and the people of the state generally in which he renews his charge that he was defrauded out of the governorship in 1892 and again in 1894. December 1st is inauguration day and Kolb announces that he will be in Montgomery on that day and take his seat as governor. He calls on the people to gather there to support him by "all proper and peaceable methods." These are the concluding words of his address: "You, fellow citizens, hav twice elected me governor of this state, and this time, by the grace of God and the help of the good people of Alabama, I will be governor."

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Vol. 21. No. 48. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, December 1, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

The Difference between Faith and Common Sense.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promiised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

THE

Truth Seeker Annual for 1895

WILL CONTAIN AN ARTICLE BY

Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,

Entitled, "THE OLD AND THE NEW."

"Christian Charity."

Although Jesus, the "master," told his followers, so the story goes, to return good for evil and to hand over their ulsters to the takers of their coats, there is no Infidel, probably, so vindictivly remorseless in pursuit of offenders as is the average clergyman. We find a case in point recorded in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Four boys, the oldest but fourteen, were arrested for taking some hymn books from Rev. Dr. Mulholland's church. Mrs. Traub, the mother of three of the children, found her boys playing with the books and took them back to the church. In order to apply the instructions of his "master" in this case, Dr. Mulholland should hav sought out the offenders and given them his pulpit Bible, if not the whole Sunday-school library, but in lieu of that, warrants for petit larceny were got out and the boys were brought into the Court of Criminal Correction. Otto Traub was at once released on account of his extreme youth—seven years—and the fourth boy, named Shicktanz, was discharged because there was proof that he had nothing to do with the theft. The prosecuting attorney wanted to let the other two boys go with a severe reprimand, but Rev. Mr. Mulholland strenuously objected, declaring that he wanted them sent to the House of Refuge or Work House. At first he swore that the books were valued at eight dollars, but on cross-examination he was unable to tell how much they were worth. After the evidence was all in it was seen that Mr. Mulholland had proved nothing beyond the fact that the children were playing with the books. Again the prosecuting attorney asked that the boys be released, but the minister refused, saying that he wanted them "put through." This disgusted the attorney, and he nolle prossed the suit, amid the protestations of Mr. Mulholland. All the boys are sons of his parishioners. The ambassador of the "meek and lowly" and forgiving Jesus was eager to affix the criminal brand to those children, who were in his "spiritual" care, although he had received back the books.

The Sabbatarians' Purposes and Plans.

There is not the least room to doubt the intentions of the Sabbatarians to make the enforced observance of Sunday the test issue between theocrats and secularists. We hav no choice in the matter. They hav elected to fight the secular principle in all its applications, but more than all else that we demand they hate the Free Sunday, and they believe that if they lose in the struggle around that they lose in everything. In choosing the issue they necessarily choose also the battle-ground, which is the field of legislation. They stake even Christianity on the result. They say that if the law-maker does not giv the priest one day out of each seven for his personal use and emolument the whole structure of revealed religion will tumble into ruin. By taking this extreme position they invite for the church the very fate they foretell. Beaten they will be ultimately, though it may take a century to drive them over the precipice of popular disfavor, but when they are finally routed it is not improbable that the people will take them at their word and throw the remnants of their religious system into the pit with them. A hierarchy that predicts its own downfall the moment the sustaining hand of the state is withdrawn is in a terribly perilous position; it surrenders all claims to respect and puts its fate into the hands of its enemies. But it will do great mischief before the catastrophe comes, and it will not be overthrown by our wishes and hopes. Optimistic dreams and rosewater batteries will not destroy it. No great cause was ever borne to victory by those who thought that there was "no danger" in the machinations of its enemies.

On October 30th a convention called by the Pennsylvania Sabbath Association and other Sunday associations of the state was held at Williamsport to celebrate the centenary of the Sunday law of 1794. But let it not be supposed that this convention was called for mere idle glorification of the work of the legislativ bigots of the past century. It was held by the clerical bigots of this century to devise ways and means whereby the legislativ time-servers of the present can be hoodwinked or frightened into making still more invasiv and onerous the Sunday law of 1794. Almost simultaneously with the holding of the convention, the city council of Williamsport passed a very stringent ordinance, the provisions of which hav already been commented upon in these columns. The next work of the Sabbath associations of the state will be the presentment to the legislature of Pennsylvania of petitions asking for the increase of the penalty for the violation of the state law from four to twenty-five dollars, the latter being now the penalty in Allegheny county, and against any reduction of that penalty in the county named. What the Sabbatarians fear is that Walter A. Lyon, just elected lieutenant-governor of the state, will attempt to carry out a program to which they assert he is pledged. This program is said to include the repeal of the special penalty of twenty-five dollars in Allegheny county, the modification of the law of 1794 so as to giv Sunday newspapers and "other forms of Sabbath desecration" a legal standing, and for the transference of all the cases of Sunday-law violation that may be left from the criminal to the civil courts. It certainly is time that Pennsylvania took a step forward, and it will be a decided advance if the reforms named can be brought about during the coming year. Now that the intolerable bigot Patterson is out of the way, it may be that, if a reform bill gets through the legislature, it will not be killed by a veto. Of course Freethinkers will be satified with nothing less than the total repeal of all Sunday statutes, but nevertheless they will welcome every real step forward as one that takes them nearer the goal of true liberty. However, it is best in every way that we do our work through our own organizations and along the line of our own demands. At the same time individual Secularists can help leaven the less radical reform forces, and thus push them further along in the right direction.

Here is a summary of the resolutions adopted by the Wiliamsport convention, and it is an epitome of the designs of the Sabbatarians:

In the preamble we are told that all power is from God; that he has delegated the administration of this power to Jesus; that this control "extends to every department of human interests"; that the "King's" law contemplates every requirement and necessity of our nature, here and hereafter; that Christianity has long since "been declared to be the common law of Pennsylvania (see decision of the Supreme Court in the Girard Will case), and that the Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed that this is a Christian nation; that Jesus declared that he is the Lord of the Sabbath; that the Pennsylvania Sunday law of 1794 is based upon the divine law, and that it has proven itself" the conservator of the vast commercial, social, and moral interest of the commonwealth."

Resolution One pledged the Sabbatarians to "the most determined maintenance of the Sabbath law of 1794"; Resolution Two expressed their conviction that the penalty of four dollars is inadequate and should be increased to twenty-five, and in this resolution was included the form of a petition to the legislature praying for the increase demanded. A committee of three doctors of divinity was appointed to draft a circular letter, copies of which are to accompany the petition. Another committee of the same composition was appointed to receive the signed petitions and present them to the legislature, and the last named committee was empowered to call a mass meeting in Harrisburg during the session of the legislature, if deemed necessary. The expense of all this was apportioned among the three Sunday associations.

Resolution Three is a diatribe against the Sunday newspaper, which is characterized as "one of the most insidious and dangerous of all the enemies of the Sabbath"; Resolution Four calls for the impeachment of all officials who fail to enforce the existing Sunday laws; Resolution Five demands the suppression of the Sunday electric car, the grievance against it being its carrying of the people away from the church to resorts where they "spend the sacred hours of the Sabbath in mere idle recreation, if nothing worse." [As the day worshipers profess to be so anxious to secure "rest" for the "laboring man," why should they object to his spending Sunday in "mere idle recreation?"] Resolution Six is a pronunciamento against Sunday mails; Resolution Seven indorses the efforts of law and order societies to enforce Sunday laws and urges their formation in every town and village where they do not already exist; Resolution Eight adjures all Christians to be consistent observers of Sunday; Resolution Nine pledges them not to sustain by their votes any candidate for civil office who has shown himself unfriendly to the existing Sunday law or who will not help raise its penalty; Resolution Ten requests citizens living in places where the mails are delivered and distributed on Sunday to unite in petitioning the postmaster-general to hav such work discontinued; Resolution Eleven asserts that the "greatest need of the Sabbath cause at the present time is sound and thorough instruction as to the authority and permanence of the divine law of the Sabbath, together with the blessing of God upon this instruction," and so it is urged that the week between the first and second Sundays of April be observed as a period of special prayer.

Among the subjects which were discussed by the convention were "The Sabbath for man, Historical and Ethical," "The Sunday Mail," "The Christian Citizen and Enforcement of Law," "The Secular Press and the Sabbath Issue," "The Sabbath and the Laborer," "The Sabbath and the Home," "A Plague in the Head" (the leprosy of Sabbath desecration); "The Citizen and the Law," "The popular Fallacies Concerning Sabbath Legislation" (Judge Ashman); "Sabbath Legislation and the Commonwealth," "Moses and Medicin" (the health value of a rest day, by the Rev. H. L. Hastings, of Boston, the Infidel annihilator); "The Workingman's Right to the Sabbath" (by Hon. H. M. Hinckley). E. K. Hart sent a paper on the "Sunday Newspaper," which was made much of as the production of a "practical newspaper man." It will receive, later, some attention in these columns.

Of all the essays read and addresses delivered, but three were from the pens or lips of laymen; all the others were delivered by ministers, and nearly all the officers of the convention, as well as the committeemen, were likewise of the cloth. This is not to be wondered at, for the whole Sunday movement is one in the interest of the priesthood. It is not strange that they look out for what so immediately concerns themselvs and can do so little for anybody else.

Preposterous Claims and Fatal Admissions.

In the Williamsport Sunday law convention, Rev. W. A. McCarrell, responding to the address of welcome, said that the Sunday question was one of the most important, if not the most important question before the people to-day. His reasoning was quite peculiar:

"The continued prosperity of our state and nation depends on the morality of the people."

We shall agree with this if "morality" is defined as equality of opportunities for all the citizens of the republic, irrespectiv of belief, and self-impelled conformity to the laws of nature.

"A true morality depends on religion—the Christian religion. There is no morality outside the pale of Christianity."

A true morality does not depend on religion, the Christian nor any other. Men hav been moral under all religions and under no religion. Morality does not depend upon belief, although it is often destroyed by belief and sometimes strengthened by its sanctions. But belief is not fundamental to morality, only incidental. The man who asserts that there is no morality outside the pale of Christianity is either very bigoted or densely ignorant, with the chances largely in favor of the truth of both suppositions. Every civilization has had its great defects, but none has been wholly bad and some of the best hav been untouched by Christianity, while one of the worst was that which dominated Europe during the ages when Christianity was supreme in all its nations. Thus it is seen that the perpetuity of our free institutions does not depend on the persistence of Christianity, if we are to be permitted to judge the future by the past.

"Christianity cannot be maintained to-day without the Sabbath. If there is no Sabbath, the churches will soon be emptied, and religious teachers cannot reach the people."

The italics are the Christian Statesman's. It would seem that Christian ministers are mad to take such a stand as this. It givs away the whole case for Christianity. It is equivalent to saying that there is no vital truth in the religion of Jesus, and that the terror of the law is all that can fill the churches in this age of science. It involves the assumption that there is not enough earnestness, not enough self-abnegation, not enough learning, not enough eloquence, not enough humanity, in all the priesthoods of the United States to keep the people within the fold of the only church which, as we hav just been assured, possesses a vestige of moral power! Mr. McCarrell distinctly says that the churches would be emptied if there were no Sunday laws, and that the preachers could no longer reach the people. What a confession! Think of asking the people to make laws to compel themselvs to attend religious services on Sunday, it being admitted that they will not hereafter be seen inside the synagogs if they do not now provide statutes whereby they may then be clubbed in by policemen or deputy sheriffs. While the Sabbatarians are in the business why do they not ask for laws compelling the people to attend "week-day" evening prayer meetings and revival services? Or is the "drawing power" of the clergy hopelessly weak only on Sunday? By the way, how does it come that Christianity survived during the first centuries of its existence or until Constantine issued the pioneer Christian Sunday edict? Was it stronger then than it is now, or hav the discoveries of the scientists, the investigations of the scholars, the excavations of the archeologists, and the comparisons of the students of the world religions so strengthened the cause of its enemies that it is obliged to ask for the aid of the civil power? Or may we not attribute its present inability to do what it once did, when numerically almost infinitly less powerful than it is now, to the increasing intelligence of the masses of the people, who, while not possessing very clear notions of the relation of the various educational factors we hav named to the Christian religion, hav nevertheless felt the influence of the scientific spirit and find it easier to seek for natural causes of unusual phenomena than to accept the supernatural explanations which to their ancestors seemed the most rational of all interpretations? At all events, it has come to this that the most aggressiv of the Christian propagandists are compelled to confess that Christianity is a failure unless backed by the bayonets and cannon of the state. We are glad to meet them right here and to say to them that they shall not hav the bayonets and cannon of the state to further the interests of their church. If Christianity can maintain herself in the field of fair and open discussion, well and good; so long as she can do that she is entitled to survive, but not one moment longer.

Mr. McCarrell adds that the Sabbath is the "key stone" of the ten commandments and that "every other commandment is dependent on this." It is a wonder that he does not say that we could not breathe if it were not for God's law of the Sabbath, or that the animals and birds and fishes and insects all hold their tenure on life by virtue of that commandment. Perhaps if the Pennsylvania legislature does not make the penalty twenty-five dollars in all parts of the state the moon will jump out of its orbit and the sun go into perpetual eclips. It just now occurs to us that the good Sunday folks are not any more respectful of the property, liberty, and lives of their fellow-citizens than are those of the people who think that one day is just as good as another if the meteorological conditions are equally favorable. Just how it is that it is so wicked to disobey the command to abstain from work and play on Saturday, while all Christians except the Adventists and Seventh-Day Baptists do disobey that command, we hav never been able to understand. And then when we see how eager they are to raise a small hell here and predict a large one in a world to come for those who make secular use of a day about the alleged holiness of which the Bible is dumb as the traditional oyster, we are again amazed.

One more quotation from the reverend pessimist: "Is it not high time to awake? · · · The continental Sunday is almost on us. If the Sabbath goes, religion will go; if religion goes, morality goes; if morality goes, then, what?" We confess to an utter inability to see so far into the future. If all these losses are to follow the abrogation of Sunday laws, we perceive no possible way out of the trouble. If morality depends upon religion, and if religion departs from our borders when the "continental Sunday" arrives, it appears that all the "marvelous mysteries of God" and all the ethical truths and beauties which now delight the soul of the moralist and render secure the lives of men and women are contingent on the vote of some few thousand legislators who are more or less—generally less—moral and intelligent than the average of their unofficial fellow-citizens.

"Great God! on what a slender thread
Hang everlasting things!"

Fruits of a Foolish and Unjust Law.

Tennessee is now reaping the fruit of her narrowness and bigotry in her inability to enforce her laws against a gang of the most cold-blooded murderers that ever brought shame on a state. The Millington butchery of six Negro prisoners who were accused of arson will be recalled by our readers. Several men concerned in the atrocious crime were indicted by the grand jury and held for trial. One of the witnesses who testified before the grand jury was the son of Sheriff McCarver. The case came on for trial last week and this young man was put on the witness stand, but being a friend of some of the accused persons he determined not to giv any incriminating evidence. So he announced that he was an Infidel, that he did not believe in God, heaven, or hell. The state was thunderstruck. Cross-questioned, he said that his reading of Infidel literature was confined to a half-page of Ingersoll. A doctor, brother-in-law of one of the prisoners, swore that when the fellow had been sick and he, the doctor, had attended him, he had said to him that man was just like any other animal. His father, the sheriff, swore that the young man's mother was a Catholic while he, the father, was a Presbyterian. He had never known that his son was an Infidel until he heard him say so in court. Of course it was all a trick to save the men in the prisoners' box. We hope that such Christians as the editor of the Independent and other religious papers can see the point to this without any assistance. Perhaps even the theocrats who want only Christian citizens will for once perceive the folly of discriminating against those who do not hold to the orthodox creeds. If all persons without regard to their religious opinions could testify in the courts of Tennessee there would be no opportunity for such fine work as this in the interest of criminals. If a witness wished to shield his associates he would hav to swear falsely under the risk of imprisonment for perjury. If the punishment of a murderer depended on the testimony of an Atheist, and the Atheist was perfectly willing to giv that testimony, he could not do it in Tennessee if his Atheism were known. This shows the other side of the miserable oaths law of that state, the state which delights in the persecution of Adventists and now has probably to permit red-handed murderers to go free because in the early years of her history she let the priestly spirit creep into her statute books and has never since had the courage and wit to exorcise it. Such are the laws we shall hav everywhere if we permit the National Reformers and the Women's Christian Temperance Union to get into power. We are forewarned.

Since the above was written the testimony of the young man who pretended to be an Atheist has been admitted. After a long discussion between the attorney-general and the counsel for the prisoners Judge Cooper said that he had carefully studied the matter and prayed over it. "In the light of the law, and after his praying, he felt that McCarver was not sincere when he said there was no God and therefore he would hav to hold that he was a competent witness." Having reached the conclusion that the young tough was a Christian and a liar, his evidence was acceptable under the laws of Tennessee, whereas if it had been determined that he told the truth when he said that he was an Infidel, Tennessee "justice" would hav had no use for him! It is to be presumed that this is the decision of God as well as of Judge Cooper, for we find that while the judge examined the law he also prayed, and after both exercises he was of the opinion that McCarver had lied when he said he did not believe in God. Probably God gave the judge the benefit of a special revelation. Anyway, he did not believe that the fellow told the truth and therefore he held him to be competent to testify in a case of life and death, while if he had believed that he told the truth in the matter before the court he therefore would not hav let him testify in the more weighty issue. So long as Tennessee prefers liars to truth tellers she will retain her laws which forbid Freethinkers to giv evidence in her courts.

Father Chiniquy, one of the most reverend apostles of the "non-sectarian" proscriptivs, has this to say, as we learn from the Independent Pulpit:

"Though I am in favor of liberty of conscience in its highest sense, I think that the Atheist ought to be punished like the murderer and the thief—for his doctrins tend to make a murderer and a thief of every man."

Can we expect straight thinking from a man who in one breath affirms that he favors liberty of conscience "in its highest sense" and in the next declares that he does not favor such liberty? If he really stood for freedom of conscience to the fullest extent he could not demand the punishment of the Atheist as a criminal. We prefer things as they are rather than as they would be if the Father Chiniquys got into power.

In Philadelphia Superintendent of Police Linden had two newsdealers arrested for selling sporting papers. He got two bootblacks to purchase the papers and then he arrested the dealers. That inculcates moral lessons with a vengeance! An excellent way to start boys out on a career of crime. But a law that is itself a crime takes criminal methods to enforce it.

Mr. J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, is well pleased with "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." He has this to say about it in the November number of his magazine:

"This is a great book containing 1,165 pages neatly bound, with a well arranged compendium of the history of Freethought for the last four hundred years. As was promised in the prospectus, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in the most attractiv and impressiv manner. It is on the whole a picture of human development during the period considered. The book is in two parts; in the first of these we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence, while in the second it is presented as an organized force, and contains 141 portraits of the men and women who hav participated in the struggles of the past, with elaborate sketches of their lives and the work they hav done.

"This is, perhaps, the most important work that has issued from the Liberal press in many years, and Mr. Putnam deserves the gratitude of Liberals everywhere for the labor and pains with which he has placed before us so much valuable data for use in the struggles yet to come, and we congratulate the Truth Seeker Company on the handsome style of the work, which displays commendable skill and energy in the matter of book publishing."

In Switzerland the Seventh Day Adventists are having a hard time with the government, which is determined that they shall observe the Christian Sunday. Switzerland is supposed to be an asylum for the oppressed, but it seems that it all depends upon whether they are willing to forswear their own conscientious convictions regarding certain religious dogmas if they are to be protected from legal robbery and alienation of liberty. The Sunday question is coming to the front both in Europe and the United States and will never be settled until the law admits that an act legitimate on one day of the week is not a crime on any other day. But we shall pass through many a storm of conflict and sustain many a temporary defeat before that glad day dawns on an emancipated world. While the earth is governed by the dead we shall be the slaves of the priests who presume to interpret the will of the dead. Sacred books and gods and devils are the actual rulers of the world. Discredit the books and drive the phantoms out of the human brain. It is the "one thing needful."

There is a pious person in this city who would make glad the heart of Dr. McAllister or W. F. Crafts. He is a dealer in toys and notions and livs at 263 West Fortieth street. He holds that it is deserving of hell here and hereafter to play marbles or any other sinful games on Sunday. Children should be in Sunday school on the priest's day, he wisely observes. He tries to make his acts harmonize with his opinions. To this end he had five boys arrested on November 18th for playing marbles in West Fortieth street. The eldest of the boys was fifteen and the youngest ten. They were well-behaved and were disturbing no one—except the person mentioned, whose name is Franklin Schumway, and who has the Puritan's instinctiv hatred of happiness found in non-orthodox ways. The culprits were taken to the station house, and then to the rooms of the Gerry society for the night. Monday morning they were arraigned before Justice Hogan. The Times' reporter says that they "presented a fine appearance," which we will warrant was more than Mr. Schumway did. This dialog took place between Schumway and the eldest of the boys:

"'Why did you hav us arrested?' asked young Fern. 'Because you were on the road to Sing Sing,' said Mr. Schumway. 'But,' said Fern, 'I hav to work all the week to get money for my mother. The only time I hav to play is on Sunday.' 'You havn't any business to play,' said Mr. Shumway. 'You are on the road to perdition.'"

Justice Hogan promptly discharged the Sabbatarian's victims, remarking as he did so that "the lads hav got to play some time, you know." If justice was to be had in the present instance Mr. Schumway would be compelled to pay the boys at least fifty dollars each in compensation for their most unjustifiable arrest and detention as alleged criminals. Such men should be taught to mind their own business. Of course the law under which persecutions of this kind are often successful is all wrong, but that is no reason why a man should make a fool of himself at the expense of the innocent. He should pay the bill, not they.

Referring to different methods of reform work, a friend says that he believes in the "amenities" and that he does not think that fairness can at any time do harm. We fully concur in the latter part of this statement of belief, but as to the amenities it will be well to say that they sometimes hav to take a secondary place if we would be really fair to ourselvs, to truth, and to those with whom we work. It is not exactly courteous to knock down a rough who assaults one on the street but it is sometimes necessary. Where there is only a difference of opinion as to an asserted fact or merely a question of preference as to what is best for the individual under given circumstances there need be no disregard of the amenities of discussion. But when antagonizing those who are striving to secure the enactment of laws which would deny to the individual the right of choice in thought and noninvasiv action we find it necessary to call a spade a spade at times, and to expose the violence and trickery of the enemies of human freedom. It then becomes a question of expediency wholly, whether we shall handle them with hands kid-gloved or steel-gauntleted. They hav taken the sword and cannot complain if they meet the sword. When the police of a city tyrannize over the poor and helpless and blackmail men of business and places of evil resort, it is useless to talk about amenities. The discourteous epithets of "bully" and "blackmailer" are the missils that hurtle from the hand of every friend of justice and peace. At the same time, of course, the real student of sociology will point out the causes which tend to produce bullies and blackmailers. When ward heelers stuff ballot boxes, and Sabbatarians stuff petitions, there is no great danger of upsetting the world if we say that these enemies of fair play hav done these things, and say so in the most clear-cut and vigorous Saxon at our command. This is an entirely different matter from the abuse of those who do not think as we do or who hav the misfortune to belong to an organization whose history and leaders are such as to make us the foes of the organization.

In her annual address to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, Frances Willard said that she wanted a new cabinet officer whose business it should be to supervise the amusements of the people. This is censorship with a vengeance! But Miss Willard is too modest by far. While she is in the humor for this kind of work, why did she not indicate her choice of first Pooh Bah of Athletics, Art, and the Drama? Anthony Comstock would about fit into that niche; or how would Mayor Hopkins of Chicago do? The latter stole into private premises at night, because he did not dare to trample on the law in the light of day, and tore down fences and bill-boards in the interest of the counterfeit morality to conserve which Miss Willard longs for her cabinet censor. There are several other promising candidates for this position whose names will readily suggest themselvs to the minds of thoughtful citizens and to Miss Willard. The cabinet could be indefinitly enlarged in the direction indicated by the president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Looking at the matter from the point of view of the lady who has made this startling suggestion, there does not appear to be anything except the Constitution—and that is only a trifling obstacle—in the way of the appointment of secretaries who shall respectivly select the drinks, food, clothing, houses, occupations, and religion of the people; others who shall choose for us our wives or husbands and dictate the size of our families, and also some one to tell us when to go to bed and when to get up, whether to walk to our places of business in the morning and home in the evening, or take a bicycle, horse car, or elevated train. In fact, there should be not less than one thousand of these Christian cabinet grandmothers to properly look after the material, religious, and moral affairs of the imbecil masses. Frances Willard herself seems to realize this, for she tells us that "it is idle to talk of personal liberty." As an indication of what we are coming to she informs us that "in France so strong is the sense of beauty that no one is allowed to make an alteration in his house till the plan has been passed upon by the authorities appointed by the city." It is to be hoped that when we get our Secretary of Architecture he will not permit the construction of such monstrosities as our present government architects advise for the nation.

Many Liberals wonder why Freethought books and papers are not as cheap as some orthodox and secular books and journals. Then we are often told that the Puritanic spirit is about dead and that it does not greatly influence business and professional men to our disadvantage. Perhaps the relation of the Puritanic spirit to the relativly high price of radical literature will be seen by the perusal of what follows. A London correspondent of Printers' Ink, referring to the fact that the Youth's Companion had refused an advertisment of playing cards, remarks:

"There are abundant facts to show you that hardly anything makes for large circulation like strict, even excessiv and old-fashioned 'respectability'—Puritanism. Not that playing cards are otherwise than respectable, but the prejudice against them is one of the things that it pays a publisher to giv way to."

From this the correspondent proceeds to show what the popular taste in literature is and this showing is a very good explanation of the phenomenal success of matter which the intelligent Freethinker will not touch. Mr. Russell (the correspondent) says that when a curious person took a literary census in America, it was found that "it was not Shakespere, or Scott, or Thackeray, or Fielding—it was not even Dickens—that was voted the most popular author." The most popular books were the "blameless" fictions of Rev. E. P. Roe! The same state of affairs prevails in England to-day, where a series of "semi-religious novelets" hav attained in a short time an enormous circulation. "They are 'pure,' Puritanical, and not too clever." That is the explanation: To suit the religiously educated masses the book or periodical must not deal in a scientific manner with the facts of existence, else it will not be "pure"—and it must not be "too clever." Mr. Russell also says that the religious papers of London that hav the big circulations are not the well-edited Christian World or British Weekly, but the sloppy Christian Commonwealth, quoted in every daily paper in the country, and the Christian Herald, which prints Talmage's sermons and has a lot of "second-advent and faith-healing matter, with illustrations and little religious anecdotes—that is the paper that sells; and it sells by the hundred thousand." This enables us to see that the Christian religion yet molds the thought of the masses and that the Liberal publisher, who has perhaps a thousand subscribers where the religious publisher has fifty thousand, cannot compete with the latter in prices, for the larger the circulation the relativly smaller is the cost of putting the publication on the market and the more the advertising patronage that can be secured, and this is what pays in the newspaper business. And if the publisher of popular literature will not advertise playing cards because to do so would injure his business, we cannot expect him to make favorable mention of Liberal books or giv Liberal ideas a hearing in his columns.

When you send in your renewal for THE TRUTH SEEKER just remember that the ANNUAL for 1895 will cost only twenty-five cents.

Teaching the Clerk of a Court a Little Law.

It requires a good deal to convince the Roman Catholics whom Tammany Hall has placed in official positions in this city that people who do not believe in their religion hav the same right to exist that they themselvs do. The clerks of courts particularly seem to need instruction in their duties, in the law, and as to the fact that the Bible is not in all cases an indispensable part of the equipment of a court room. The missionary of civilization and upholder of the rights of man finds virgin soil in most of our municipal, county, and state offices.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has for years been one of these missionaries, sometimes winning by persuasion, and sometimes by resort to force. In 1888 he had a difference with an election board, and won a decision from the court that has been used as a precedent by other Freethinkers ever since. It was as to the way to take an oath, or affirmation, and the election inspectors received a lesson that astonished them. A few of the clerks in our courts need the same lesson—and one of them has got it, as will be seen by the following affidavit:

"Superior Court of the City of New York in the Matter of the Application of Eugene M. Macdonal, for relief from duty as a Petit Juror.

"City and County of New York ss:

"Eugene M. Macdonald, having duly affirmed, says that on the 19th day of October, 1894, he appeared in Part II. of the Superior Court of the City of New York in response to a notice to serve as a Petit Juror therein.

"That deponent, believing himself entitled to exemption from such duty, offered to affirm according to Law as to such exemption, but that the Clerk of the said Court declined to permit deponent to affirm as provided by section 847 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides as follows:

"A solemn declaration or affirmation, in the following form, must be administered to a person who declares that he has conscientious scruples against taking an oath, or swearing in any form: 'You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm.'

"That deponent does not require or exact that any peculiar mode of swearing, or that any ceremonial whatsoever be employed, but that he be permitted to affirm as aforesaid.

"That deponent is informed and verily believes that under the Statute above quoted, and under the decisions of the Courts of this State, it is the privilege of every person therein, who has scruples against swearing upon the gospels, to affirm as aforesaid without regard to the position of the body, or any part thereof, or to dress, or any other formality not expressly provided for by said Statute.

"Deponent begs leave to refer to the opinion of Mr. Justice Barrett rendered on the 1st of November, 1888, in a proceeding entitled People of the State of New York ex rel. Macdonald vs. Nuss. The inspectors of election had refused to register deponent because, in administering the affirmation, deponent refused to raise his hand or to be interrogated as to his religious beliefs. Mr. Justice Barrett in his opinion says:

"'The inspectors had no right to require the Relator to affirm with the uplifted hand. Nor was it within their province to exact a religious test. Indeed, their interrogation upon the subject of the Relator's belief in the existence of a Deity was an impertinence to which no citizen, in the absence of any suspicion of his truthfulness, should be subjected. The Mandamus must be granted.'

"Deponent also begs leave to refer to the similar case of Mr. John Frankenheimer against William Bainton and others, reported in the New York Law Journal of October 23, 1891, wherein Mr. Justice Barrett declared that Mr. Frankenheimer had a perfect right to affirm in the manner he desired, and censured the Respondents for requiring him to affirm with uplifted hand and uncovered head.

"Deponent begs leave to refer to the case of Fryatt vs. Lindo 3 Edwards Chancery Reports 239 as illustrativ of the absurd lengths to which a departure from Deponent's position may lead. EUGENE M. MACDONALD.

"Affirmed before me this 20th day of November, 1894.
"ELMER G. SAMMIS,
"Notary Public, Kings County, Cert. Filed in New York County."

The way that happened to be offered to the court was this: The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has a valid excuse for not serving as a juror, and being called for such duty last Monday endeavored to explain to the clerk of the court his reasons for asking for exemption from such duty. The clerk is undoubtedly a Roman Catholic, with no particular fitness for his position—except that he fits the ideas of the political friend who placed him in a position he evidently could never hav won on a civil service examination—and when the Editor offered to state his reasons for not wishing to serve he held out a Douay version of the Bible and told him to swear to his statement. Naturally the Editor objected, and requested an affirmation. The Irish gentleman then ordered him to elevate his hand. The Editor said, No. Holding up the hand is no part of an oath, and not necessary in taking an affirmation. The clerk thought he knew better, and refused to administer the affirmation, ordering the affiant to sit down, which the affiant did.

When the court itself arrived, he was appealed to, and to him was explained the ignorance of the clerk. The court said the point was a novel one—which it wasn't—and ordered the affiant to sit down again, which the relator did of course, being a law-abiding and law-upholding and law-enforcing citizen. After sitting as long as he considered it necessary the affiant again appealed to be allowed to take the affirmation and go about his business. The court said that he would allow the affiant to take the oath without uplifting his hand, and the clerk read an oath concluding with, "So help you God." "That," said the court, "will go on record." "Will it also go on record," asked the affiant, "that I protest against it?" "No," said the court. "Then," retorted the affiant, "It is not my oath." "Take your seat," said the court, which the affiant did.

In a few minutes the clerk called a panel of jurors, and among the names read was that of the affiant. When the lawyers in the case began the formalities necessary, and got as far as asking the affiant if he knew any reason why he could not try the case the affiant said he did, and added that he had been trying to tell the court so all the morning. By consent the lawyers excused the affiant, and the court ordered him to bring in a written statement as to how he desired to take an oath. Hence that affidavit.

When the affidavit was presented the next morning the court read the words of the statute from it and permitted the relator to go—which he did at once, to the commissioner of jurors and asked to hav his name taken from the list of possible jurors. The clerk there had more sense, and when the situation was explained to him took the affirmation without either an "uncovered head" or an uplifted hand. He seemed to hav heard of men who would neither kiss a dirty book, nor extend their hand to an imaginary being in the sky who is supposed by the inventor of that form of oath to strike the false swearer dead. And it is for the benefit of the clerk in the court, who did not see the affidavit, that we print it here, and shall send him and his fellows copies for their instruction in their duties. They ought to know how to do so simple a part of their duties as to administer an affirmation, and that they do not is one of the best reasons why the Freethinker should kindly but firmly teach them their business. The law is perfectly plain in the matter, no court in this state can get around it, and every public official who refuses to take such affirmation can be mandamused and forced to take it. No official has the right to make it a religious question at all—nor to ask a man what his religion is or whether he has one or a dozen different sorts. That is simply none of their business. The law says they must administer the affirmation when requested—and a man cannot be required to hold up his hand nor to uncover in the presence of supposed deity. In court of course his hat is naturally off in deference to the visible presence of the representativ of law in the person of the judge.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER feels that he has done the clerk a kindness and benefit in teaching him so much of law, and he also asks the aid of other Freethinkers to extend this information all over the state, and teach the Christians to practically separate church and state in this matter. The law on the subject is all right and plain—it only needs frequent enforcement to make that fact known.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 will hav contributions from Colonel Ingersoll, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Helen H. Gardener, Samuel P. Putnam, James B. Alexander, Susan H. Wixon, Katie Kehm Smith, Henry Rowley, W. F. Hamilton, George E. Macdonald, John Peck, and probably others.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

At the Belleville Sunday-school convention, a Miss Vella, of Massachusetts, remarked that teachers should pray for every pupil by name, for "when the children knew this was done, it had a great influence upon them." No doubt; the praying had the influence, not the supposed answer to the prayers. The children would be put to a certain extent on their good behavior, and they would be impelled to try to justify their teachers' interest in them. Gradually the theologically inclined are coming to recognize the fact that the efficacy of prayer, in so far as it has any, is not due to God's interference in the affairs of nature or the concerns of man.

When purchasing your money order for your TRUTH SEEKER subscription think to add twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1895.

Four New Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

Colonel Ingersoll has a new lecture, which he will deliver this fall and winter. It is entitled "The Holy Bible," and is now ready in pamphlet form. A million copies should be sold, and we are ready to dispose of our share of them at the regular and low price of twenty-five cents each. It will make a superb missionary document.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also in press, and will be ready soon. The price of each will be twenty-five cents. They will be printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. Every one will want copies of these splendid addresses, and orders may be sent to us at once, and will be filled as soon as we get the books from the publisher.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents.

In his introduction to the papal encyclical calling on the "nations and peoples of the universe" to return to the fold of the Catholic church, Cardinal Gibbons points out that "the fathers and doctors hav invariably taught that 'where Peter is, there is the church,' and that on account of its superior power and primacy every particular church must adhere and be united to the church of Rome where blessed Peter erected his see forever." Commenting upon this the American Sentinel says:

"It is only when we realize that Peter is dead that the stupendous folly of the whole thing dawns upon the mind. The papal system is built upon men, and upon dead men at that."

Can the American Sentinel at this moment call to mind any religious system that is not built upon men and dead men at that? It seems to be able to realize that Peter is dead, but we are under the necessity of assuring it that Adam and Noah and Paul and Jesus are fully as dead as is Peter. The dogma of the infallibility of Peter and his successors is no more absurd than the dogma of the infallibility of the Bible.

It is a great pity that any man will indulge in cant in order to catch the ears of the unthinking, and this is especially true of men who, outside of politics and other business, are Freethinkers. The Kansas City Times reports that Judge J. B. Johnson was making a speech in Kansas and took occasion to say that every Anarchist was a Populist. A foreigner in the audience asked for a definition of an Anarchist. Judge Johnson replied:

"He came from the same country that you did. He knows no law, no country, no God, no flag, no wife, no children, and when America asserts itself I hope it will hang every one of them higher than Haman."

We are not concerned here with the fact that Judge Johnson fails to distinguish between the Philosophical Anarchist and the revolutionary Anarchist-Communist, nor with the further fact that neither of these are Populists, but we are concerned when a Freethinker tries to make a man's nonbelief in God a reproach to him and counts his Atheism among the offenses for which he ought to be "hung higher than Haman." If Judge Johnson has been reported correctly he should be heartily ashamed of himself.

The Independent seems to hav a "Higher Critic" on its staff of book reviewers. In its issue of October 25th there is a notice of a new work on "The Origin of the Pentateuch in the Light of the Ancient Monuments," and the author of the book is treated in a very unsympathetic manner by the reviewer, who says that he does not know how to use the vast amount of critical material that lies ready to his hand, nor does he properly utilize the "fragments he has accumulated." We are told that "the results of scholarship go for nothing with such a writer as this. If we read him correctly he will not even admit the presence of Elohistic or Jehovistic documents in the composition of Genesis," which is equivalent to saying that he will not admit that Moses did not write the Genesaical narrativ. But this is not all; the reviewer charges that the writer of the book in question is unable to free himself from "theological constriction" because he says that Adam was "the representativ head of the race," was the first man, and that his acts "were binding on his progeny." Has it come to this that one of the leading Christian papers of the world openly declares that a Christian writer is a victim of "theological constriction" because he holds that Adam was the parent of the human family and that in his sin "we all jined in"? Surely the light is breaking!

Our esteemed progressiv contemporary, Unity, of Chicago, is not wholly pleased with Colonel Ingersoll's last lecture in that city, "The Holy Bible." The gist of its criticism is that Mr. Ingersoll "goes on in the old way assuming the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch," and ignoring the results of the Higher Criticism and the Higher Criticism itself. And why should he not? So far as the claims for the so-called "Holy" Bible are concerned, the task of the Freethinker is to meet the official affirmations of the church and to show them to be unfounded, if he can. When any church repudiates the alleged Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, accepting and affirming the results of the Higher Criticism, the Freethinker will be bound to meet that church on its new ground. The Christian church formally affirms a revelation, and that revelation is not that which the Higher Criticism leaves to us, but it is the one which the great body of the Christian church accepts. It will be time enough for Freethought advocates to assume that the theory of the Mosaic authorship of the first five books of the Bible is obsolete when some authoritativ evidence is forthcoming that that theory has been abandoned by the church itself. But there is no such authoritativ evidence; so far as we are aware, the Higher Criticism has not had the effect of changing one letter in the creed of any one of the orthodox churches. As far as the organization represented by Unity is concerned, it is Infidel under another name, and is not entitled to speak for Christianity. It merely stands for one form of Theism.

Dr. Rossiter W. Raymond is opposed to giving money to the American Board of Foreign Missions for the spreading of the gospel of hell fire. He says:

"I am sick and tired of going to the American board in sufferance to aid in supporting missionaries who believe out-and-out in the damnation of all the heathen and that damnable heresy that God doesn't love the heathen. I am tired of the whole miserable humbug, and I won't giv a cent to spread the news of damnation. I won't let the damnable doctrin be disseminated by my money. That God is love is good news, but it is made stale old stuff by these men who drag a juggernaut car over the heathen and want us to feed the beasts that haul it. It is my Christian duty not to giv to any concern that will teach the heathen that their fathers went to hell."

That has a vigorous sound, and it would delight the heart of a Universalist or a Unitarian, but a logical Presbyterian or Freethinker will at once perceive the fallacy that puts a false note into the ringing sentences. If God is too good to burn us in another world, why was he not too good to make this life a hell for a majority of the human family and of the animal races? If he will not cause purposeless suffering in the world that is said to await us beyond the rim of this planet, why does he cause purposeless suffering in this world? If God is infinit in knowledge and power, did he not predestin every pang of pain that has ever torn the nerves of sentient creatures on this earth of ours? Calvinism is a horrible doctrin, but it is horrible because the facts of the universe which (it is said) God made are horrible.

At the laying of the corner-stone of the new Roman Catholic church of St. Joseph in this city, Rev. Henry A. Brann of St. Agnes' church said:

"'Thou shalt not steal' is one of the fundamental laws of the church, and society, therefore, must look to the church for protection."

If this is so, why does not the church pay her taxes? As she does not, are we not justified in saying that the man who looks to the church for protection is in the same position that the rancher would be who should depend upon the Cook gang in the Indian Territory to protect his stock farm? But what does Mr. Brann mean when he says this:

"There are some would-be statesmen who tell hundreds of thousands of patriotic American citizens, as our Catholics are, that our church can hav no state funds to help it educate the youth in the love of God and the rights of citizenship; but they willingly giv them to jail-birds and ruffians, who are a menace to the land."

"For the love of God," who are these "jail-birds and ruffians" to whom the state givs the school money that is or should be withheld from the church? Does Mr. Brann intend to be understood as claiming that if the school money is not given to the church for such educational use as is specified, those who grow up without the said education that the church is so anxious to giv will be "jail-birds and ruffians"? If this is his meaning it is rather strange that the jail-birds and ruffians of the present time are largely recruited from the ranks of those who hav had the advantage of the much-lauded education "in the love of God and the rights of citizenship" which the church imparts.

The position taken by the writer of "Bible Temperance" concerning the "wine" and "strong drink," so frequently mentioned in the Bible, is ably sustained by T. W. Chambers, D.D., in a contribution to a symposium on the drink question which appeared in the Independent a few weeks ago. Referring to the "two-wine" theory put forward by the "Christian Temperance" people, who maintain that the Hebrew scriptures inculcate the duty of total abstinence and the rightfulness of prohibition, Dr. Chambers observes that it is difficult to combat it because the effort to do so involves the necessity of kicking at nothing. He says:

"The view is not held by any respectable scholar now living in any part of the world. It is not maintained in any influential commentary on the inspired word. It is not supported by any Hebrew or Greek lexicon, whether issued in Europe or America."

He adds that all scholarship is on one side and some "mistaken advocates of temperance on the other." His contention is that in Eastern lands in Bible times, as now, there was no such thing as unfermented grape juice called wine, and he cites many texts of scripture in support of this position. The fact that the Koran forbids the use of wine is here mentioned, and the doctor remarks that it would hav been very easy for Jesus and his apostles to hav inserted "the same prohibition in the New Testament had they been so disposed." But as they did not do it the latter day Christian invented the "two-wine" theory to make it appear that the "Son of God" was familiar with and favorable to the modern temperance and prohibition attitude toward liquor drinking.

Burial of Thomas Paine.

A brief biography of Thomas Paine was written by Madam Bonneville, to whom and her two sons, Benjamin and Thomas, he bequeathed the bulk of his estate, valued at $30,000. Mme. Bonneville attended Paine in his last illness. She says he spent the last night in tranquility and expired at her house in the morning about eight o'clock. She then adds:

"On the 9th of June my son and I and a few of Thomas Paine's friends set off with the corpse to New Rochelle, twenty-two miles from New York. This interment was a scene to affect and to wound any sensible heart. Contemplating who it was, what man it was that we were committing to an obscure grave on an open and disregarded bit of land, I could not help feeling most acutely. Before the earth was thrown down upon the coffin, I, placing myself at the east end of the grave, said to my son Benjamin, 'Stand you there at the other end as a witness for grateful America.' Looking behind me and beholding the small group of spectators, I exclaimed as the earth was tumbled into the grave, 'O Mr. Paine! my son stands here as testimony of the gratitude of America, and I for France.' This was the funeral ceremony of the great politician and philosopher."

In 1833 Mme. Bonneville emigrated to St. Louis, where she died in 1846, a devout Catholic. Her son Benjamin entered the military academy in 1811, served through the Mexican war, and was brevetted for gallant service. He also made important explorations on our western frontier. At the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861 he was too old for activ service, but he lived till 1878 and died a colonel of the United States Army. W. H. Burr.

Observations.

The court clerks in New York are not the only officials of that class in the country who never heard of a plain and undecorated affirmation. In a murder trial out West a few years ago a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber named Richard Roesiger, who was called as a witness, indicated his desire to affirm. The clerk had never learned the form, and in his confusion at such an extraordinary request, invoked the help of God to aid Mr. Roesiger to tell the truth. The witness rejected the proffered assistance and remained standing until the court took cognizance of the situation, and administered a secular obligation. The lawyers, by the way, found Roesiger a peculiar witness. He had no prejudices, though he might hav an opinion. Previous to being subpenaed he was interviewed by both prosecution and defense, and both hesitated to call him. Being asked whether he would testify for the state or for the other side, he replied that the jury would hav to settle that question after his testimony was in. His purpose was to testify for the truth. The defendants' counsel accepted him for his moral support, and showed some shrewdness in preventing him from telling all he knew, while the prosecution was short-sighted enough not to know the state had in him a good witness. Roesiger, who is a German and a rancher, shook his head in deprecation of a kind of legal procedure which in effect forbids that all of a witness's knowledge of material facts shall go before the jury. Having been allowed to tell only what favored the accused, while his information that might help toward a conviction was repressed, Dick returned to his ranch quite dissatisfied with the proceedings, and doubtful of the court's ability to get at the root of the matter.

The Theosophist, a magazine published at Madras, India, by the wily Col. H. S. Olcott, felicitates itself upon its sixteenth year and upon the advance which Theosophy has made since he took hold of that cult. But what are sixteen years? In about a month we shall celebrate the close of the eighteen hundred and ninety-fourth year of the era of Christ, so that judging a spook by a myth, and a fallacy by a delusion, Theosophy has at least one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight years to run. By that time the questions of fact and authenticity, which now rise up to harass Colonel Olcott, will hav ceased to trouble true believers.

Now we hav all got it right in the neck. Mr. Herman Wettstein, of Byron, Ill., continuing his argument against God with a big G, says that any one "who capitalizes 'god,' or uses the word without placing an 'a' or 'the' or 'any' or some other suitable letter or word as occasion may require before it, in order to reduce it to an object of the imagination, practically admits its existence as a reality and just to that extent is he derelict to his convictions," and, Geewhillikens! "a traitor to Freethought." If Mr. Wettstein had said that the improper use of large initials was a capital offense he might hav been understood as attempting a joke to soften the asperities of things, but it transpires that he could make that remark in sober earnest; for a traitor to Freethought could certainly betray so commonplace a thing as his country without blinking. And now how long will it be before somebody is called down for pronouncing the word in an upper-case tone of voice?

God, it is generally understood, is the ghost of that disreputable character known to Old Testament readers as Jehovah. He is a myth beyond the shadow of doubt in my mind, and dwells only in imagination. But, grammatically, anything which exists in the imagination is a reality in its class. To those who never heard of Mr. Wettstein, that gentleman does not exist; to those who hav heard of him he does exist, in their minds. So far those who argue for the existence of Mr. Wettstein hav no advantage, except in the plausibility of their contention, over those who maintain the existence of the Jehovistic ghost. Investigation would change the situation, and demonstrate that Mr. Wettstein is an actual citizen, or that he is not. Those who failed to find him would set him down a myth; those who discovered him, or thought they did, or got on what they took to be his trail, and found "sign," as the bear-hunters say, would accept him. Then if a discussion arose between the believers and the unbelievers in the or a wettstein, the former, being the more numerous, would make it tropical for the latter, who, to express their contempt, would write the myth herman wettstein (for in the last analysis, what does herman mean more than the common noun gentleman, or wettstein than whetstone?) Would either side score? I think not. This rigmarole is to get where I can ask my friend at what point it would be proper to begin the use of small letters, and how soon "traitors" could be appropriately fired at those who, while accepting the myth hypothesis, yet failed to follow at once, and in a servile manner, the innovation on the established rules of grammar arising out of the debate.

Having reduced God to its lowest terms, we are bound by consistency to perform the same service for the alleged son. The word Christ signifies the "anointed;" it is synonymus with messiah and also with "savior." It is no more a proper noun than "god." Hence Jesus christ. Mr. Wettstein's position will hav to be abandoned. It is too crowded with ghosts who, in printers' phrase, cannot be "kept down."

The Prohibitionists and other political theologians will need a revival before next spring if they intend to maintain their rank as soldiers of the kingdom on earth, for the Pops are crowding them. In the town of England, near Little Rock, Ark., the Populists put up one of their party for preacher to a Baptist society, and being defeated by the plutocrats, they bolted and organized the First Populist Baptist Church. At a meeting of the same political persuasion in Denver, the audience, led by an office-holder under Governor Waite, sang the Doxology "with all the fervor of a camp-meeting." And now, quite expectedly, comes the Vineland Independent pointing out that the People's party was foreseen by the prophet Daniel; that the government it is to establish will be one in which "the people of the saints of the Most High should take the kingdom and possess it forever and ever." And there will be no change to secular forms of government, for the administration of the saints is to be permanent. During the late campaign this party inaugurated the millennium by nominating ministers for office at the ratio of about 16 to 1, and the record of their men in Congress has been awful. Hundreds of Freethinkers are members of the People's party, though its platform pledges them to the God-in-the-Constitution whim, and its representativs are Sunday-law communists. If the Pops would get somebody to cremate that Ocala platform and replace it with one having the Demands of Liberalism for a preamble; if in addition they would discontinue the services of their spiritual advisers and leave the parsons to pastoral functions and other duties appropriate to their sex; and, finally, if they would abandon Socialistic notions to professed Socialists, they would present a system of government worthy to be called progressiv, although they might not be able to maintain that it was inspired.

One who is not a financier may fail to understand the government bond system which the present administration is so industriously applying, but he is not thereby prevented from contemplating it with reverential awe. A few months ago a fifty million dollar issue of bonds had the effect of increasing the treasury supply of gold by about thirty millions. On the face of things, of course, it would appear that the supply was increased to the amount of the bonds, but such is not the result reported, for the purchasers of the bonds drew some twenty millions in gold from the treasury so they could pay for them. The present issue promises to be still less fruitful, as the thirty millions previously realized will be drawn out by the financiers who buy the new bonds. The result, as we are bound to see, is that by running one hundred millions in debt on the two bond issues, the administration is enabled to realize one-half that amount in gold with which to redeem previous obligations that hav doubled since they were assumed—that is, unless figures and figurers incontinently lie, two dollars in bonds are issued to procure one dollar in gold. When the bonds mature, more bonds will be issued at the same or greater discount to redeem these, and in the mean time interest possibly equaling their face value will be paid. The case of the man who explained his inability to straighten up by saying that dry made him drink, drink made him drunk, and drunk made him dry, has long been known to many people who did not suspect that its central principle was being applied to national finance.

The Shoe and Leather Bank of this city has just discovered its loss of $340,000 through the rascality of a bookkeeper named Seely. Simultaneously the facts are developed that the thief is a man of exemplary moral habits, temperate, idustrious, frugal, with no known defects, and a pewholder in a Brooklyn church, at which he has been a regular and devout worshiper. And his accomplice was a man who stood still higher in religious circles. The bank officials would deserve more public sympathy if they had taken the pains to inform themselvs of the situation before they placed Seely in a position of trust. Recent warnings, like those afforded by Erastus Wyman, Breckinridge, McKane, and many other less conspicuous persons, had put the community on its guard—all but the directors of the Shoe and Leather Bank. As we say about our rural friends who are taken in by bunco steerers, green goods men, and other smooth swindlers, they ought to read the papers. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

"Thanksgiving" Reflections.

We hav just beheld the sun of a Thanksgiving morn and we were enjoined to thank God for his blessings bestowed. This has caused me to think and ask myself three questions: Who and where is God and how will we return thanks for his divine favors? What need has he for our thanks and how much does he deserve thanks? In trying to answer the first question I find myself swamped in the midst of know-nothingism, for no one can know of a god or where located. An ideal god is simply a creature of the imagination and no one could possibly conceive of a god great enough and with energy enough to make from nothing or otherwise the great and grand universe, composed of a multiplicity of individual worlds suspended in infinit space, inconceivable to the mind of man. As a worker must be greater than his works, how much greater must God be than the works he has made, and how can such a being expect or ask of a worm (for nothing greater is man in the sight of God) his thanks or devotion? Also how shall we thank him or even feel thankful when we are forced into the world without even our wish or consent and then hav the joy to know that we are born in sin, filled with imperfection, pain, sorrow, and tribulations and at last must be cast into hell? What a great and unspeakable satisfaction it is to know that our president has reminded us of our duty to giv thanks to Almighty God for such blessings! Some should be thankful that their days on earth are but few; that the beneficent goodness of him that has filled their days of mortality with fear and trembling has made such laws that they are not compelled to remain in earthly torment, and that they are promised an eternal hell in which their condition cannot be worse. My waiter at the hotel said he was thankful for a black skin and a second-class existence on earth and hoped for straight hair in the city of dreams reached only by climbing the golden stairs.

The two thousand Armenians lately butchered should thank God for a premature entrance into the happy heaven of rest, and the Turks who murdered them should fall on their knees in thankfulness to God for the privilege of destroying so many Infidel heretics. Yes, even I should be thankful that the God-like Christians hav not been able, in the year of our Lord, 1894, to bribe our legislators to pass laws compelling me to pay priest tax. However, my aged grandfather, a poor old blind man who had lived in Litchfield county, Conn., once had the pleasure of having his only cow taken from him by the officers of the law for that noble purpose. I feel like jumping to my feet and shouting "Glory to God," so that the sanctuary of heaven will resound in echo; yet I will keep my seat and wait until I learn more of heaven and the holiness therein. If I find that heaven is the home and dominion of Jehovah, the god of the Jews, I shall want a ticket for the other place where thanksgiving to an undeveloped ideal God never preys upon his subjects.

There are thousands of children dying every day with that dread scourge diphtheria, caused by the same hand that forced the poor little sufferers into the world. How thankful they and their loving parents should be for such a showing of God's love toward them! Let us pray: "O thou God of abomination, thou who gavest us the thirty-first chapter of Numbers and taught us to slaughter our enemies, to save none but the virgins for immoral purposes; thou who dividest spoils with the devil and cursed Eve and her posterity as well as all the mammalia of thy creation because thou failest to make us perfect, and took into partnership Old Nick, who you knew was evil disposed, and would get the better of thee in business and bring trouble and sorrow upon all the world; while we are prospered to eat a turkey dinner, many other poor sinners no worse than ourselvs hav none, and for this special dispensation of thy providence in our behalf, we are glad we are on thy side, also on the side of the turkey. Clothe us with divine armor that the devil may never get us or deprive us of a good dinner on Thanksgiving. As long as thou wilt be on our side we will keep Thanksgiving and never feel sorry for the poor turkey." I will leave the congregation of THE TRUTH SEEKER to shout Amen and sing the Doxology. And while they are singing I will pass the hat for a collection to buy something for those whom God's mercy has not reached.

A. D. SWAN.

What Do You Believe?

It is easier to deny believing a statement than to advocate it, but in my brief letter I propose to ask questions and leave the reader to answer them for himself.

The Egyptians probably believed in their religion of many gods and in sacrifices and prayers to those gods to secure their blessings, and that their gods Khem, Knoph, and Phtah were the creators of all things. Perhaps they believed in a future state of existence for souls that hav departed this life; some in a state of felicity, some in torment, and some reincarnated as the spirit of some animal or other human being. But because they believed it do you accept it without investigation?

The Assyrians and Babylonians believed in a multiplicity of gods. They considered Anu the chief of their gods. "Bel is the God of Lords," "the father of the gods," "the creator." In the history of creation we are told that "Bel made the earth and the heaven; that he formed man by means of a mixture of his own blood with earth, and also formed beasts; and afterward he created the sun and the moon, the stars and the five planets." They also believed that sacrifice and prayer were very necessary to appease the displeasure of their passionate gods. The Assyrians and Babylonians no doubt believed in their gods and the above statements; but do you believe it because they taught it?

The Chaldeans had a long history of their gods doing the creating, making many terrible mistakes, but finally creating the heavens, the earth, and hades. This history also stated that "the god Belus commanded one of the gods to cut off his head and to mix the blood which flowed forth with earth and form men therewith and beasts that could bear the light. So man was made and was intelligent, being a partaker of the divine wisdom. Likewise Belus made the stars and the sun and the moon and the five planets."

In another account Anu is credited with doing the work, especially among the sun, moon, and stars. He made the moon the principal luminary on consideration of being worshiped. "Each month without fail brought together festal assemblies in the beginning of the month · · · and on the seventh day a holy day appointing and commanding on that day a cessation from business." This might be called a Sabbath for worshiping the moon.

The Chaldeans had a legend of the deluge quite similar to that narrated in Genesis, though stated differently in some particulars. Shamas, the builder, completed his ship on the eighth day.

Do you accept all these accounts as true without investigation because others are supposed to hav believed them, or do you condemn them as myths unworthy of credence?

We find the account of another ancient religion that men of the present time profess to believe to be positiv truth. We find in it another account of the creation of all things by a God who created all things in six days and rested on the seventh, and hallowed it as a Sabbath. But according to the account, the Lord God must hav accomplished the work in one day and then cursed part of his work because it did not result as he intended, and afterward resolved to drown the world because of its wickedness, and made a failure of that because the wickedness crept into the ark that had been prepared to save a few righteous ones. Noah got angry at Ham and cursed his son Canaan, saying, "A servant of servants shalt thou be unto thy brethren." The Lord God made a covenant with Abraham, making him and his posterity a specially chosen people and giving them the land of Canaan as an inheritance forever. But the children of Israel displeased the Lord God, and he sent them into bondage to the Egyptians and then sent Moses with the various curses to afflict the Egyptians for chastising the children of Israel as he had caused them to do, and commanded Moses to deliver the Israelites from the Egyptians by piloting them through the Red sea, and then fed them on manna and quails in the wilderness; and then the Lord gave Moses the law from Mount Sinia, the most of which was extant previous to that time. The Lord God commanded Moses to conquer and drive out the tribes of the Canaanites and take their country to themselvs for an inheritance, and to utterly cut off the Amalekites and also the Midianites, which included Zippora, Moses's wife, and his and her two sons and all their kindred, and then there was the butcheries of Joshua, Saul, David, and others. Do you believe all these statements to be true and all these bloody deeds to be righteous acts? Then there is the building of the tabernacle of the Lord and the arrangement of the priesthood with the garments and other paraphernalia and the sacrifices, tithes, and other tribute for the support of the priests and synagogs; is this productiv of civilization or improvement of mankind? The Lord punishes the children of Israel by permitting the Babylonians to capture them because of their wickedness, and then the Babylonians are punished for doing this thing and the Jews are restored to Jerusalem.

When they returned from Babylon their first care was to rebuild the church on the most orthodox system. The prophets exerted their energies to revise and record the law of Moses and restore the purity of descent by casting out all mixed blood and enforcing the traditional rites and usages of the ancient Israelites.

The Jewish law as at that time established, is closely observed to this day by all orthodox Jews. They adhered to the so-called God's covenant with Abraham up to the time of recording the law, and that law is still in force. The Jewish priests or rabbis adhere to the old law. The Jews are all brothers and the remainder of mankind are the heathen round about them; and their religion givs them license to plunder and enslave them just as much to-day as it did in the time of Abraham or Moses, or any time since.

A god is and always was a man-made institution, and was made the very prototype of the builders. If they were savages, their god was a savage; if they were barbarians, their god was a barbarian; if they are enlightened, they hav an enlightened god.

The Jew has become better than his religion through the pressure of advanced progression; he has outgrown some of its savagery; but the intense selfish "I am better than thou" spirit still exists that he has inherited from his ancestral religion; and as long as they pin their faith on God's covenant with Abraham that selfish, arrogant, haughty spirit will adhere to them.

Now, thoughtful, reader, you claim to protest against other ancient religions. Why adhere to that of the Jews, which is no better and is still existing among us and is making terrible havoc with the cause of human liberty through the money power of which the Jew is the main head. If you would take the Jew element out of the power of money to effect the status of the laborers, it would be so paralyzed that we would think it almost dead.

Well, Christian brothers (the Jew would call you heathen), do you believe the doctrins of the Egyptians? No. Or the Assyrians? No. Or the Babylonians? No. Or the Chaldeans? No. And why not? Because they are not in harmony with human needs and cannot supply them. They disregard individual rights and encourage tyrannical priesthoods to enslave mankind. That is a very good reason. Do the Jews disregard equal personal rights by claiming themselvs to be God ordained to enslave the remainder of mankind? Yes; that is their religion. Did they not act like barbarians—rob, murder, enslave, and disregard the most sacred rights of mankind, if the Bible tells the truth? Yes; and when they became civilized, they got their wealth by guile, scheming, and fraudulent means instead of outright brigandage, and when they adapted themselvs to the enlightened epoch they only refined their schemes for deception.

You adhere to the Jewish superstition and call it holy, when it has been shown to be your worst enemy. You accept it without investigation and in so doing rivet the chains that enslave you.

Rise in your might and call a hoe a hoe and an ax an ax, and call a tyrannical oligarchy by its proper name—the enemy to the best interests of mankind—and be sure that so long as the Jew adheres to the covenant with Abraham he is one of the Jewish oligarchy and will oppress you whenever his selfish interests dictate such a course.

Campaign Literature.

It is of the first importance that Freethought literature be widely distributed. The people must be educated. It is impossible to reach all by means of lectures. We must supplement the lectures with books, pamphlets, and papers. We can find hearers by the thousand; but we ought to find readers by the million. Earnest Freethinkers should make it a specialty to buy and distribute books. A book is a power. It is always at work. It costs but little. It influences like the sunshine. It is pretty difficult to get angry with a book. It is like a fact, and cannot be easily put down.

It is a part of our work as a national organization to keep Freethought literature in constant circulation. We would like to hav pamphlets setting forth our principles all over the land—in every prominent place—in hotels, railroad stations, reading rooms, etc. To do this, however, requires money; but money cannot be put to a better use. A little of it goes a long way. One book can reach many persons. We desire to keep the movement initiated by the last Freethinkers' Congress advancing, so that the thousand persons reached there may multiply to hundreds of thousands of persons reached elsewhere.

We hope that friends who believe in this kind of work will help us. We giv them something in return, which will be of service to them in their homes and communities, and bring them into companionship with the Freethinkers of the whole country. Our new pamphlet, "The Federation and the Union," will be out at the earliest possible moment. It will contain one hundred pages of excellent reading matter. It will show the progress of Freethought, its facts and arguments. It will be an inspiriting book. It will be a splendid campaign document. It will contain the speeches, letters, reports, etc., of the late Congress in regard to our great work, the total separation of church and state. Such a book is well worth twenty-five cents a copy. But the object is to send it broadcast, and therefore it will be given to subscribers at less than cost—eight copies for $1; eighteen copies for $2; and fifty copies for $5. The National Association will depend upon its friends to aid in this matter, so that the cost all round shall be very little and a great work be accomplished. Send all contributions for this pamphlet, "Federation and Union," to 234 South Water street, Chicago, Ill.

Our fathers did not quite love God nor quite hate the Devil—but they were afraid of both. They really wished to enjoy themselvs with God in the next world and with the Devil in this. They believed that the course of Nature was affected by their conduct; that floods and storms, diseases, earthquakes, and tempests were sent as punishments, and that all good phenomena were rewards. —Robert G. Ingersoll, in THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895.

Letters of Friends.

Has Read Every Column.

JAVA VILLAGE, N. Y., Nov. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $1 for four copies of R. G. Ingersoll's late lecture on the holy Bible.

I hav read every column of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over ten years with great interest, and I mean no flattery when I say that I like it the best of any of the ten papers I now take in my family.

CHARLES BARBER.

All Reaching for It.

PARIS, TEX., Oct. 31, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find seventy-five cents for three copies of "Holy Bible," by Ingersoll. I hav received S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and am delighted with what I hav read of it. Other persons hav been so anxious to read it that I hav had but very little chance to read any myself.

J. F. MILES.

Happy to Keep His Promis.

CRANBERRY CENTER, WIS., Nov. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I feel somewhat rejoiced in that I am able to come up to my promis to you about thirty days ago; therefore, please find inclosed $3, for which giv me credit on my subscription to your much esteemed TRUTH SEEKER. May it seek for truth long after I am gone!

Respectfully yours, J. W. KRUSCHKE.

A Question for Mr. Richardson.

GIBBON, NEB., Nov. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In Colorado, the workingman's candidate for governor was defeated by the woman vote, and the woman vote was controled by the church organizations. Contemplating such a phase of Christian Republicanism we wonder if our friend Richardson will join the Women's Christian Temperance Union?

Respectfully, C. PUTNAM.

It Is Cheap, but Splendid.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Oct. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The books I ordered from you a few weeks ago came safely to hand on time. Also "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I consider a splendid work, a book which ought to be in the hands of every Freethinker. I hav read it nearly through. Brother Putnam deserves our thanks for giving us such a splendid work, and so cheap, too.

N. D. GOODELL.

Putnam Has Done a Great Work.

CARLETON, NEB., Nov. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3 for my subscription, and $2 for the Campaign Fund, and $1 for the Kansas martyr, Wise. I hav read through the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought;" am just delighted over it. Brother Putnam has done a great work. I hope he will take it more easy now, and not work too hard. We want to prolong his life as long as possible, and all of you as well.

BENNET ANDERSON.

Every Page Bristles with Facts.

ELMORO, COL., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The old TRUTH SEEKER is a regular Sunday visitor at my home, and a very welcome one at that. I hav been out of a job since last June, and hav just succeeded in getting one. I hav been pretty busy for two weeks reading "Four Hundred Years of Freethought;" it don't make any difference where you open that book, it is bristling with facts on every page, and I wouldn't take $25 for my copy, if it was impossible for me to replace it.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

JOHN SCHUYLER.

Step by Step to Complete Liberty.

ST. CHARLES, MINN., Oct. 20, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Franklin Steiner was here last week and gave us three splendid lectures. Two ministers thought to down him, but to their surprise and to the surprise of many others, were completely nonplused. His easy, gentlemanly manner of dealing with them won him hosts of friends. The sympathy of many Christians present seemed to be with him. We expect to hav him here three months next fall, and will no doubt draw quite a number into our ranks. Some of the Christians here are getting very liberal indeed. The Congregational minister who had been here three years, I think, has gone to another part of the state, and is now preaching for the Unitarians. He is a thinker and reasoner, and probably his next step will be into the Freethought ranks. He informed me the day before leaving here that he should preach Unitarianism. I told him I was glad to hear it, as the Unitarians had but one step to take to get to our ground. Freethought is bound to make great progress in the next ten years. Yours for the truth,

B. PEABODY.

After Twelve Years He Comes to Us.

ALLISON, MO., Oct. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Some twelve years ago I first saw THE TRUTH SEEKER and the impression that it made on me is never to be forgotten. I believe D. M. Bennett published it then. I hav never seen the paper since until a few days ago a politician called at my store and in conversation mentioned that he was a Freethinker. I thought, "Keep that to yourself in superstitious Missouri." I assured him that whatever ticket he might be on he could depend on one vote. I had nearly given up the idea of ever getting a chance to vote my convictions. But the gentleman informed me that there were several candidates of an "intellectual" cast of countenance on the various tickets this fall. Trusting that the conventions knew what kind of timber they were nominating, I shall vote for every one—i. e., if I can find out who they are.

Inclosed please find $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am doing what I can to get subscribers.

M. T. JERSEY.

Thanks to the Generous Greenhill.

CLINTON, IA., Nov. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am a subscriber to the dear TRUTH SEEKER, thanks to Mr. James A. Greenhill, for it was he who gave me the first copy of it, and afterward gave me one year's subscription.

I am well pleased with the paper; it has completely turned me away from the churches. Last month Mr. James A. Greenhill gave me a very nice present, and what do you, Mr. Editor, think that was? Nothing smaller than Samuel P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I was surprised at first; I could not find a word for myself. I grabbed his hand and thanked him heartily for that costly present. I hav looked through it at the pictures and I found one of my countrymen, Bjornstjerne Bjornson. About the book, I can say that it is not a history of Four Hundred Years of Freethought alone, but a Four Hundred Years of Freethinkers album also. And it is the most magnificent work on Freethought I ever saw. I shall now begin at the beginning and read it through with respect. Yours for Freethought,

JONAS R. ELLISON.

Thought, Then Wisdom.

HAMILTON, N. Y., Nov. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You may extend my subscription another year. I want the paper as long as I liv. I hav lived upward of eighty years and bid fair to reach the century mark. I was brought up in a Christian family and during all that time I doubted the truth of what I was taught and always must. I watch with interest the progress of Freethought. Christianity has reached its hight and is on the decline. Science will destroy it, if nothing else will.

I think you had a good Congress in Chicago and that the outlook for Freethought and for truth is good.

The sending out of the life and teachings of Paine causes a disturbance among the churches. They say the thing ought to be stopped, as it unsettles the mind, not only of the young, but of the old as well. I hope the work will be kept up, as it is doing much good.

I will send by and by a list of the publications I want. I want them to giv away to those who never read or see such thoughts as they contain. You may send me now John Peck's works. They create thought, which leads to wisdom.

CARLTON RICE.

Mortuary—Dr. W. P. Badger.

ATCHISON, KAN., Nov. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. W. P. Badger, a veteran Freethinker of this vicinity, died at his home at Muscotah last Saturday, of consumption. He was born in Vermont, Dec. 15, 1817, and came to Kansas for his health in 1857. His health was much improved and his life prolonged many years by the change. Dr. Badger had a varied and interesting career. He was a member of the territorial legislature in 1858, and agent for the Kickapoo Indians for four years. During the war he was adjutant of the Thirteenth Kansas, and acquitted himself with bravery. He was the first mayor of the little town of Muscotah, and virtually the father of the place. He kept a hotel at Muscotah for years, and many Freethought pilgrims will remember his hospitality. Dr. Badger was a nephew of Governor Badger, of New Hampshire, and his widow is a sister of Ex-Senator Kellogg, of Louisiana. Dr. Badger was an unflinching and uncompromising Freethinker, and accomplished much good for the cause in his locality. He was a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal journals, and always kept a supply of Liberal literature around his premises. He was a good, honest man, and his death is a loss to the cause of mental liberty.

Yours, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Does Not Want to Run the Paper.

VAN BUREN, ARK., Nov. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 to renew my subscription. I would hav been glad if I could hav sent you the money for several books that you advertise, but money is too scarce here this year for me to get anything but the paper, and I am downright glad to be able to get that and pay for it. I wanted Putnam's new book and "Godly Women of the Bible." I read that as it was published in the paper several years ago and thought it struck the religious folks some pretty hard blows, and as soon as I am able I shall send for the book and read it again.

I will not stop to tell you how you should run your paper; I get three dollars' worth out of it every year and hav been getting that much out of it for nearly or quite twenty years, and it has always bristled with good things. The past year your editorials on the taxation of church property and the separation of church and state, when you wrote against the proposed amendment to our national Constitution were exceptionally good. In fact, I can get three dollars' worth out of any department of the paper in a year; the pictures alone are worth all that in a year.

Hoping that all your present subscribers will be able and willing to renew and that you may get many new ones, I remain, Yours respectfully, JAS. R. NEAL.

Man-Afraid-of-His-Wife.

CANTRIL, IA., Nov. 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Some of my Christian friends, according to their own statements, hav received Paine's "Age of Reason" and they appear not to be so noisy as they used to be; the fires of hell seem to be smoldering down; I think likely they hav struck bottom. I heard one Disciple preacher say at the close of his sermon that some one had been so kind as to send him from New York a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason" and he supposed he would never know who did it. All he had to say was that he had not read much of it, for it was so awful hard he could not stand much at a time. The trouble is, I think, he cannot answer it, and that is what hurts.

Mr. I. P. Davis and I hav to stand here alone in Cantril. There are others who think just as we do, but when it comes to talk about having some Liberal giv us a lecture here, then it is they begin to dodge and make excuses and say: "My wife is a Methodist"—or Baptist or Presbyterian—"and if she knew of my giving anything for a Liberal lecture I would be obliged to seek a divorce." I told a man the other day that if that was the case, then his wife thought more of the church than she did of him. My Christian friends are a good deal like the Jews; they never pray except when in trouble, and then it is for vengeance, victory, and riches.

Please send me "Religion and the Bible," two copies "Holy Bible," "The Candle From Under the Bushel," "Thumbscrew and Rack," ALEX FIX.

Always Some Practical Suggestions.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Nov. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: At this season of the year Freethinkers can lay the foundation for much future good work by helping to organize literary or debating societies in their vicinity. Debates being necessarily educational in their character, the school authorities will generally grant permission to hold them of evenings in the schoolhouses, thus saving room rent.

By taking a prominent part in organizing them, Freethinkers can generally secure sufficient control over them to select their questions for discussion, and by occasionally interspersing some which lead in Freethought directions, can greatly enlighten the community. By cautiously and gradually passing, week after week, from less radical to more radical Freethought ground, many of the audience may, in a year two, be converted to Free thought. Furthermore, the training received in such societies thoroughly fits them for usefulness in the Freethought cause.

This season of leisure, when inclement weather prevents out-door work, is also auspicious for getting trial subscribers to Freethought journals, for circulating the "Age of Reason" and other Freethought books, and for various other kinds of Freethought missionary work. Let each Freethinker do something for the cause, and do it now, himself choosing the way in which he thinks he can best work, and the progress of our cause will be greatly augmented.

D. WEBSTER GROH.

Are Free Trade Politicians Moral?

CASTANA, IA., Nov. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It is too bad! After answering Mr. Groh's nineteen questions harmoniously and flattering myself that those answers were altogether lovely, it now turns out that one of them was an unaccountable blunder. Napoleon [?] did not refer to this kind when he said "a blunder is a crime;" still, the situation is solemn, if not dangerous, because Mr. Groh was first astonished and then amazed. However, he recovered sufficiently to say, "Mr. Hays and Mr. Day should get together," which was good advice. All Mr. Hays has to do is to stand still while I make the race. Nobody ever said that a duty on imported goods was not a customs tax. A tariff is a "list." How can a list be a tax? A tariff can no more be a tax than a menu can be a dinner. Mr. Hays and I are already close together. (Discrimination is a jewel.)

"Hence Mr. Day's absurd and reckless allegation that all trust men are free trade tariff reformers," etc. That little word all is sweeping, but, according to my knowledge and belief, all of the Standard Oil trust men, all the sugar trust men, together with all other well-known trust men, are solidly in favor of the politics of tariff reform. It requires no effort to cry out "absurd" and "reckless;" why not try the virtue of some pertinent facts?

"Trusts are formed by cornering the market on certain classes of goods, and are facilitated and fostered by tariffs in exact ratio, as it is easier to corner the product of a single nation than that of the entire world." Why easier? One would naturally conclude that goods from all parts of the world, coming through a few custom houses, and mainly through one, would easily be "cornered" by a few wealthy importers. Tin, sugar, and coffee are in evidence. Our manufacturers find it very difficult to corner domestic products, except such as come under the operation of the patent or mining laws. "Is free trade immoral?" is not the question; it should be: Are free trade politicians moral?

PRESTON DAY.

A Minister's Evolution.

DES MOINES, IA., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. H. O. Bruden, of Des Moines, Ia., lately advertised that he would preach a series of sermons on "The Bible in the Light of the Highest Criticism," and he began the course last Sunday night by talking upon the question, "Who Wrote the Bible?" I heard the same gentleman giv some lectures on the divinity of the Bible six years ago, when he strongly maintained the generally accepted orthodox views. As in those six years great advances hav been made in Bible investigation and the long cherished views of that book completely overthrown by Christian critics, I was anxious to know how the Rev. Mr. Bruden had been affected by the situation. Mr. Bruden is a Disciple and preaches in the largest church in the city, and he is frequently spoken of as "the most popular minister." To say that I was surprised does not express my feelings when I heard him advocate the most radical conclusions possible with the keeping of his pulpit. If anything, he was more aggressiv in his advanced views than either Dr. Briggs or Professor Harper. His references to some of the orthodox Bible scholars were by no means complimentary, and had any of them been present they would hav wished themselvs anywhere else. He does not believe that all of the Bible is inspired. He admits that we do not know who wrote a great portion of it, and particularly the Pentateuch and other books of the Old Testament. He made one mistake here by saying that all of the Bible was written between 700 B. C. and 100 A. D. But we could forgiv him for this when he said that he cannot indorse the bloody wars of the Old Testament and that some parts of that book are not fit to read. He never reads it himself, he says, except as a student. God, he admitted, was only connected with the Bible in a second-handed manner. The Bible, he says, is not an authority, but Christ. How he can make Christ his authority and not the Bible is something he will hav to settle for himself. The moss-backed Methodist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist, and other orthodox ministers of Des Moines, must feel very blue to know that their Bible is assailed as regards both authenticity and morality in the largest church in the city. We may add that Dr. Bruden is the only minister who has his church full on a Sunday night or even a Sunday morning. The fact that he preaches such sermons as the one I hav mentioned and that he takes special pains to provide entertainment for his hearers, accounts for it. The church is sometimes called "Bruden's Opera" by profane persons. FRANKLIN STEINER.

No Extra Attractions Needed.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12, 294.

MR. EDITOR: Sunday morning, November 11th, I went to hear the noted Unitarian, the Rev. Robert Collyer. He teaches his congregation to believe in God, the father, maker of heaven and earth, thus turning down the ghost and son divisions of the trinity. I had to admire his virtuous countenance, framed by snowy locks, and also admired his heresy as far as it extends. Besides that I saw nor heard nothing worthy of note, except his musical voice, though it is somewhat monotonous as he rattles along and lulls the worshipers into a semi-doze.

In the evening, the arch-heretic of the century again struck this churchly town. Many other heretics, big and little, and pew holders heretically inclined, assembled at the Star theater to giv him a royal welcome. Promises of the appearance of musical celebrities and elaborately prepared programs were not required to fill the house from the stage and boxes to the gallery, and even the aisles. The people quietly assembled and, at the appointed time, our Freethought general appeared, and, as usual, without introduction, at once began his lecture. While he was exposing, as only he can expose, the source and character of the Hebrew-Christian Jehovah, it was also the time when many prayers from learned pulpits were being offered to the same Jehovah, and listened to by small groups of worshipers, any one of which would constitute about one-half or less of the number seated in the gallery, to say nothing about the balcony, boxes, stage, and main auditorium. One thing the prayer-makers should especially ask for is to be given the drawing powers of Colonel Ingersoll.

He makes no reference to his many slanderers, but proceeds to propound theological enigmas for them to solve. He shows that the most glorious triumphs of the race hav been won in spite of the teachings of the Bible. The audience bought many copies of his writings, and this lecture cannot fail to giv Liberal views another impetus in this city. His new lecture, "The Bible," could be obtained at twenty-five cents per copy, but people preferred to pay prices ranging all the way from fifty cents to $2.50 or more per seat to hear his voice as well as see him. By the strength of his gestures, he appeared to be thirty instead of sixty, and judging of the healthfulness of heresy from his personal appearance, there is no reason why he should not be with us for many years to come to gladden the hearts of men, terrify the orthodox, liberalize our minds, and make us more gentle and kind toward one another. Prolonged applause frequently interrupted his address. and at the close he was recalled to the stage, when be merely bowed his acknowledgments.

Freethinkers may make mistakes and not be right in some things, but as surely as there is science and human reason, they are more sane and more nearly right than their theological antagonists, consequently they need never allow themselvs to waver in their purposes or hopes. The Freethought army will increase just in proportion to the dissemination of thought and truth, and when finally our descendants do really come to treat one another as human, and as having equal rights, the one man of this age to whom the greatest glory will be given, will be the man we all love, Robert G. Ingersoll.

Would Woman Suffrage Now Make for Liberty?

CHILLICOTHE, O., Nov. 12, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: For some time I had contemplated giving the friends of liberty and progression my opinion (for what it is worth) on woman suffrage; but when Mrs. Schwartz's article appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it so thoroughly agreed with my own views that I thought it unnecessary. But since sister Harker has criticised it, I feel like criticising hers just a little. Not but what Mrs. Schwartz is perfectly capable of defending her own views; but my own are so similar, I feel she is treading on my corns. Sister Harker says she "fails to find conditions as her friend has depicted them," that such women as sister Schwartz describes are exceptions, not the rule.

My friend, are you aware that you liv in one of the most Liberal states in the Union? All the Western states are Liberal. The West is the home of Liberalism, while the East is that of conservatism. Come to Chillicothe, O., and you will not be able to find one Liberal journal or publication on that subject for sale in the city; and it is a place of about fifteen thousand inhabitants. The principal stock of the book-stores consists of cheap sensational novels, and it just suits the people. An expensiv copy of the Bible and these trashy books are all they desire. Tradesmen always keep what sells; and, when you look about our book-stores, you are not at all puzzled to discover what it is. They keep very few scientific works. You generally hav to order what you want in that line. I frequently lend books from my library; but can never lend a scientific book or paper. Those who are Liberal enough to read such literature claim they are too dry and uninteresting. A few weeks ago I loaned "Robert Elsmere," a book that has been very popular and had a large sale. The book has much merit to recommend it and then the clergy recommended it by denouncing it and forbidding their flocks to read it. The person to whom I loaned it returned it after keeping it for weeks, and said it was too deep for her. She had read it about half through, and stopped. She had read to where the solid part of the book came in, and stopped. This lady is fifty years of age, fairly educated, and of more than ordinary intelligence. I cannot lend a Liberal book, and if women know I read them, they want nothing to do with me. Now, my friends, is that encouraging? This state of affairs prevails not only in Ohio, but throughout the East and South. In dress I see but very little reform. Stays and corsets are still worn by all women. Probably you may now and then find a freak of nature, like Dr. Mary Walker; but generally those who hav not slender waists try to make them so. As for tight shoes, there is about as much squeezing as ever. The last time I was in a shoe-store (about a month ago), a lady was trying on shoes, pulling, sweating, and fussing, the dealer chalking her heel trying to get a shoe on her about two sizes too small. I still see placards in the drug-store windows announcing the best preparation for ladies' complexions. I know they buy, for their faces look as if they had been in the flour barrel. I agree with you that "woman's sphere has broadened in the last fifty years." They hav more book learning than formerly, more practical knowledge. They don't piece so many quilts, knit so much lace, or nurse poodle dogs so much; probably it is the pugs they nurse now. It is a disgrace to be seen carrying your six-weeks' old baby on the street, but the hight of fashion is to lead or carry a dog. For all woman's increase in knowledge, I should not care to trust my life and liberty in her hands. The men are making a bad enough mess of it; but put the ballot in the priest-governed women's hands, and farewell to what little liberty we hav. The "strong undercurrent of Liberalism" of which you speak has permeated only the educated few. It has not reached the moving, throbbing mass of humanity, and, my friend, if you think the ancient mythology is becoming fossilized or frozen, just come to the East, and it is my opinion you will change your mind, and that speedily.

You say that had your friend heard the derogatory remarks made by the church people as to the policy of bringing religion into politics, she would hav been greatly encouraged. Well, my friend, had you been in Ohio, and heard the president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and one of their most famous lecturers cant about Jesus, heard her tell how they wrestled and prayed to hav Jesus recognized in their Constitution, advocate prayer, and the return of the Bible to the public schools; and then, had you taken their strength into consideration; you probably would hav felt about as blue as you ever did in your life. You Western people are too sanguin. A visit to the East or South would take it out of you with a vengeance.

Are you aware, my friend, that if the Prohibition party comes into power, your mouth and mine will be shut tight as wax? And are you not also aware that nearly all women are Prohibitionists, made so by their experience with intemperate husbands, sons, and brothers? I believe in woman's rights; but I do not believe in going back to the Dark Ages to giv them to her. Some appear to think that the ballot is a sure panacea for all woman's ills. That is another mistake. It is not a cure-all for man's; on the contrary, it is one of the greatest evils that exist. The government is so corrupt that only moneyed men are eligible to office. Think you women would change this? No, the wives and daughters of rich men would then be elected, and men would starve and women sell their virtue for bread, as they must do to-day. You say, sister Harker, that the women of Colorado vote intelligently and independently of the ministers. I don't doubt that; but they were free, independent before the ballot was put into their hands. Think you old Frances Willard and her crew would vote intelligently, independently of the clergy? And you must remember that the Women's Christian Temperance Union is largely represented wherever the Christian religion has any influence. Another mistake you make, my friend, when you say the clergy are not in favor of woman suffrage. They are in favor of it; for the women are the power behind their throne. It is the influence of women that keeps the church alive. Men are too radical. They hav found out that religion is one of the unnecessary evils of this existence. Many are still dragged to the sanctuary by wives, sisters, and mothers, but they are fast slipping through the priestly grasp. The clergy would rather keep woman in ignorance and deprive her of her rights: but they dare not. Women are their only hope. You think your friend "cannot surely apprehend any danger from the religious serpent at the polls when she recognizes its size when compared with our strength." Why, my friend, we hav no strength. We hav but a handful when compared with them. They are wealthy, in untaxed property, while we are almost as poor as the Nazarene. We hav perhaps a dozen lecturers in the field, and they hav their thousands of impudent, sleek preachers. We hav on an average three or four organizations in each state, while they hav a dozen to every ten miles square.

Our only stronghold is our intrenchment behind the Constitution; and they are doing their best to dislodge us from that position, and no doubt would hav accomplished their designs had it not been for the valiant work of Mr. Macdonald, Putnam, and others. You giv us the statistics of the strength of the enemy; if you are right, my experience goes for nothing. I know many who are not in the church; but I know of more who are not outspoken Liberals, but who believe in the Bible, and consider the morals of the church all that is to be desired. You sav a word against the church, and especially against the Bible, and they will mount their stilts immediately.

Only those of the educated, progressiv class feel the encroachments of the church. To the mind of a conservativ there is no oppression about it. You hav to be educated to perceive it. You might as well point out the beauties of nature to a blind man as to point out the tyranny of the church or the errors in the Bible to one who has never troubled himself to think or investigate the matter. The indifferents —those outside the church—do not think. They don't even trouble about the welfare of their souls, which the members of the church do.

That the Christian religion is declining, I admit; but the process is so gradual that it is scarcely perceptible. So little advancement has been made by the church that our liberty is in jeopardy, if not our lives.

I am a woman, and I naturally desire the elevation of my own sex, but not at the sacrifice of liberty. We hav had a hard struggle for what little we possess. Our benefactors hav been ostracized, imprisoned, burned, and tortured in every manner fiendish brains could invent; and now, shall the sacrifice of their lives and liberty be naught? Are we going to put the whip in our enemy's hand, and then bare our backs to receive the lash?

Let woman suffrage become a fact all over the Union at once, and the theocrat's power will be unlimited. God and Jesus Christ will be put in the Constitution; the Bible be put back into the public schools, and then will begin the reign of terror for the Infidel. Are you aware, my friend, that the fluid in a real Christian's veins is not human blood, but vitriol? They hate all other religions; but the Infidel they hate with a bitter, relentless hatred. They never lose an opportunity to insult us. A woman, speaking on temperance, and woman suffrage last summer, said that "a godless woman made her shudder," and suggested that people with "such wicked, heathenish hearts go off to unknown lands, and set up a colony of their kind, where they would not contaminate the virtuous."

Now, my friend, would you like to put your life and liberty in that woman's hands? She is not the exception, but the rule. I was the godless woman at which she made her coarse fling, the only woman in the audience holding those views, and I had had a special invitation to this meeting on account of my belief in woman suffrage. That woman, who claimed to be holding the banner of liberty aloft, had not enough of common decency to respect the opinions of another, and that other one of her own sex, for whom she professed to be laboring. You may class me with Cardinal Gibbons if you like; but I fancy I will not be in any worse company than yourself. There are more Christian suffragists than Infidel. The Infidel sees where it is tending.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Disappointment.

Little May came in from school,
All her features were aglow.
" Miss Trevilla wants us all
Mother, dearest, may I go?

" 'Cause she wants to form a band,"
Ran her happy little song.
Mother turned to see the clock—
" Very well; but don't be long."

Too well trained to answer " Why?"
May looked up in sad surprise
Mother, busy, did not see
Tears were standing in her eyes.

Alice, waiting at the gate,
Woudered at the long delay.
Slowly out upon the porch
Came the disappointed May.

" Hurry, May, or we'll be late.
Why, you're crying. What is wrong?"
Broken hearted, May replied,
" Mother says I can't belong."

Thanksgiving.

Thanksgiving days are of ancient origin. Away back in Egypt, after the harvests were gathered in and everything housed for the winter, it was the custom to observe a day of feasting and to hav a good time all around. They mixed some religion with the feasting and laid offerings upon the altar of Isis, as they supposed he protected the harvest and gave them good crops. The Greeks and the Romans too made feasts in honor of the god of harvests, who was called Demeter. They held out-of-door sports and games, made wreaths of holly and red berries and adorned their household gods with them.

Three thousand years ago the Jews celebrated thanksgiving by a great feast, which was called "the feast of Tabernacle." It was kept up a whole week, and everyone was instructed to eat, drink, and be merry. Jerusalem was the place where people congregated about this time of the year, and there were music, dancing, and processions. Little houses were constructed for the people who flocked into the city, and there were great displays of fruits and flowers. The little children were jubilant. Everyone was well fed and happiness prevailed. Worship was held in the houses, and banquets were made every day, while sacrifices were offered to the imaginary gods overhead.

New England received thanksgiving observance from Old England. When the harvests were gathered the people in the "old country" held a festival and it was known as the "Harvest Home." There was dancing and racing, jumping, and wrestling matches, pitching quoits, and indulging in the same games that are practiced to-day. At the close there was a feast of good things—birds, meats, plum puddings, cakes, and cheese. So our New England forefathers thought they must keep up the good old custom, and after gathering in the first harvest, which consisted of about twenty acres of corn and six acres of barley and peas, they made a great banquet. The men went hunting and secured wild fowl and animals which roamed in the thick woods. It was a sumptuous repast, for wild turkeys, ducks, and venison make good dinners any time. Their Indian neighbors were invited, it is said, and Massasoit and ninety warriors accepted the invitation to dinner. The next year there was a great drought and no harvests to speak of. Then the pilgrims prayed and kept it up for ten long hours. That night it rained and of course they thought it was in answer to their prayers. Bradford was governor of the New England colonies then and he ordered a day of thanksgiving right off.

Washington in 1789 proclaimed a day of national thanksgiving, and the second similar proclamation was ordered in 1795. Since President Lincoln's time the day has been national in its observance.

There seems to hav been always, from the pagans down to the present time, a desire at the close of the year to celebrate harvest time by a day of general rejoicing and banqueting, at which time turkeys, chickens, and geese are sacrificed; pumpkin pies, as well as mince and apple pies, cranberries, and other goodies come in for a share of attention. Prayers are generally ordered in the proclamation, but visions of the good dinner in process of cooking usually destroys the force of the petitions, which are, as a rule, mere words.

It should be our pleasant duty to see that no one is neglected at this harvest festival, and our own dinner will be more enjoyable by supplying, so far as we are able, others with something good to eat.

Sometimes, when we hav met with losses and reverses, it seems as if there was very little to make us glad and happy. But we can get a ray of sunshine here and there and rejoice that things are no worse than they are.

From the time of our old Revolution,
When we threw off the yoke of the king,
Has descended this phrase to remember,
To remember, to say, and to sing.
'Tis a phrase that is full of a lesson,
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
It can cheer us when days are the darkest—
" That things are no worse, O my sire!"

'Twas King George's prime minister said it,
To the king, who had questioned in heat
What he meant by appointing thanksgiving
In such days of ill-luck and defeat.
" What's the cause of your day of thanksgiving?
Tell me, pray," cried the king in his ire.
Said the minister: " This is the reason—
That things are no worse, O my sire."

There has nothing come down in the story
Of the answer returned by the king;
But I think on his throne he sat silent
And confessed it a sensible thing.

For there's never a burden so heavy
That it might not be heavier still—
There is never so bitter a sorrow
That the cup could not fuller fill.

And what of care and of sadness
Our life and our duties may bring,
There is always the cause for thanksgiving
Which the minister told to the king.
'Tis a lesson to sing and remember,
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
Can cheer us when days are the darkest—
" That things are no worse, O my sire."

The God Idea.

Man in all stages of development has possessed the faculty of ideality, which is developed in degree and direction corresponding to his general moral and mental development. This faculty, in its earliest development, desired tangible ideals; so it created numerous gods and goddesses, each embodying qualities which man then most admired. Later on in its development we hav all these qualities concentrated in what is abstractly called "one God."

But this god is as numerous as the minds which conceive and idealize it. Because difference in mind necessitates difference in ideals. Therefore we hav a tolerant and an intolerant God, a merciful and a merciless God, a prejudiced and a generous God. Question a man as to the nature of his God and his answer will be an infallible index to his own nature. God is simply the highest ideal which each man creates, each person's God being but the reflection of his own moral and mental qualities. Incidentally he makes this ideal accountable for what he cannot understand.

We hav seen what the God idea means in its general sense; let us see what it should mean to Freethinkers in particular. Christ is reported to hav said that we cannot put new wine into old bottles. But Freethinkers may keep the old term "God," and put new and better meaning into it. Let it stand as the Freethinker's ideal of every desirable mental, moral, and physical quality, an ideal not to be worshiped from afar, but to be realized in himself.

He need not dispense with conventional forms, but he should put new meaning into them. Ruskin says, "There is a true church wherever one hand meets another helpfully;" so he may worship in church at any time. Let every day see him striving to realize in himself his ideal; then truly shall he see himself in God.

Correspondence.

Milford, Mass., Nov. 16, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: I saw in the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker of Nov. 10 a letter from Lillian G. Bond, in which she says that she does not think that she is a Freethinker. I think she is, but does not know it.

In a letter which my mother wrote me on my last birthday, she said: "Freethinker does not mean that you believe or do not believe any one thing, except that you are free to think for yourself.

"A Freethinker believes we hav a right to think on any subject, and need not take anything as true because it is in any book or taught by any church.

"Now the thing to do is, to prove that being free to think is an advantage to us, and that we can liv better and be better with free minds than we would be if we merely accepted what someone said."

Miss Boyd says that the smartest people she knows are Freethinkers, and I think this shows that thinking for ourselvs will make us smart men and women.

Yours truly, Bertha F. Johnson.

RELIGION AND THE BIBLE. By F. D. Cummings. 12mo., pp. 314; price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. New York: The Truth Seeker Co.

This book is the product of years of thought, study, and candid examination. The old myths one by one faded from the author's mind before the penetrating and all-diffusing light of reason and common sense.

In the fifteen chapters presented the author givs his honest opinion regarding God, man, and the devil; shows that the Bible flatly and often contradicts its statements; that the expectations of the Hebrews were not fulfilled in the coming of Jesus; that Jesus is no more the son of God than any other man; that the Christ spirit exists in other men; that the teachings of Socrates, Plato, Buddha, and others, are superior to the teachings of Jesus.

In the Bible Mr. Cummings sees a mixture of good and ill. He finds words of mercy and love, also words more cruel and relentless than the grave.

This book will well repay perusal. Especially is it adapted to the needs of those who are thinking themselvs out of the mazes of religious superstitions. To such it is an excellent help. It is interesting from beginning to end and a valuable addition to every library. It contains 314 pages, is well printed and well bound, and is alike creditable to author and publisher.

THE BETTER WORLD. By Dr. E. B. Southwick. 12mo., pp. 375; price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1. New York: The Truth Seeker Company.

This is such an odd book you cannot help laughing when you read, and when you hav read a few chapters, and think you will read no more, you will find yourself reading straight on till you reach the end of the last chapter.

The author endeavors to portray an ideal community where men and women are equal in every respect, and the women are more than equal; where there are no lawyers, doctors, preachers, or professors; where they always do right and never do wrong. The people are described as having fingers growing from their noses, a curious sight to behold. They learn from each other, and every one works for the universal good. There are original ideas of education, geology, chemistry, philosophy, and hints on medical science, and the science of health.

In this dreamland, Dr. Southwick found a congenial mate who accompanied him on his excursions. The interest in these fancies of a better world, situated in the land of Nowhere, is well maintained, but whether human beings, such as we see about us, could be happy in such a world is still an open question. Every one of the 375 pages is interesting, and the book contains much wit and wisdom mingled with its curiously interwoven facts and fancies. It is published by the Truth Seeker Company, in good style and low price, bring it within reach of everybody.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

"The Better World," by E. B. Southwick, M.D., is a bit of highly imaginativ fiction that places the reader in touch with a peculiar people who are simply loaded down with virtues. The story may please those who long for the unattainable, and who hope that the millennium will arrive in their time. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York.—Wisconsin.

"The Better World," by E. B. Southwick, M.D., is a fanciful visit of a doctor to a better world, showing a people in the enjoyment of life as an intelligent, matter-of-fact community should; a race of beings to whom selfishness, avarice, and fear are unknown; a nation of people far advanced in civilization and in all the sciences, all free and equal, and enjoying the same privileges and the same rights. Men and women are equal in every respect. They work together, play and study together, and what one learns is told to all. They hav no doctors, lawyers, preachers, nor professors; and by observing a regular diet and exercise, are never sick, and as they always do right, they need no law to enforce justice. They all work, so each has little to do, and hav no wealth, seeing no value in money. If those reading this book can learn how to improve their own situation, the object of the work will be attained.

The Truth Seeker Company of New York hav also issued the forty-third work of their library, entitled "Religion and the Bible," by F. D. Cummings. This volume is presented to the public as the result of a number of years of thought and examination. It dissects the apparent errors and contradictions in the Bible and also in other religions, and givs the author's ideas of the meaning to be attached to them, and also to the source of the "errors." For sale by the publishers.—Baltimore American.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religions mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

MINISTERS wonder how I can be wicked enough to attack the Bible. I will tell them: This book, the Bible, has persecuted, even unto death, the wisest and best. ALL the fighters, from the unscrupulous politician of the low type, who consents to trick or flatter for the advantage of himself or his party, up to the dynamiter who seeks to terrorize society for the sake of views of which he himself has but a slight understanding, are all fighting together in one vast army to render true progress impossible. Progress can never be won by the weapons of trickery, flattery, or terrorism. The use of all such weapons means the wearisome passage from one set of evils to another. — Hon. Auberon Herbert.

EVERY step of progress that the world has made has been from scaffold to scaffold and from stake to stake. It would hardly be exaggeration to say that all the great truths relating to society and government hav been first in the solemn protests of martyred patriotism, or the loud cries of crushed and starving labor. The law has been always wrong. Government began in tyranny and force, began in the feudalism of the soldier and the bigotry of the priest; and the ideas of justice and humanity hav been fighting their way like a thunderstorm against the organized selfishness of human nature.—Wendell Phillips.

IT [asceticism] has despised the beautiful. It has taught that love of scenery, love of the exquisit human form, love of fiction, of the drama, of music, of pictures, of statuary, of decoration, are mere worldly gauds. It has elevated a false ideal of what it calls "the spiritual." It has made men believe that to be much engaged in the rapt contemplation of its own imaginary deities, its saints and martyrdoms, its glories and its heavens, is the highest thing in human existence. It has preferred the syllable Om, or that blessed word Mesopotamia, to Pheidias and Michael Angelo. As a consequence, the most religious life has been as a rule the lowest, the barest, the squalidest, the least beautiful. All really ennobling and elevating agencies hav been steadily refused by it. The Hindoo fakir, the Catholic monk, the Thibetan devotee, the English Puritan, are alike in this, that they hate and despise every object on earth that can enrich the life of man with sublime and glorious images. To the British Dissenter poetry is wicked, the theater is w cked; the nude in art is dangerous; painting and sculpture are stumbling blocks music is worldly; nothing is sacred save the preaching in Little Bethel and the singing of hymns around the untuned piano on Sunday evening.—Grant Allen.

SHALL THE BIBLE BE READ
IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS?
By R. B. Westbrook, A.M.
Third Thousand.

$679,694,439.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed – probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. - - - - -	$1.00

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE Lord takes care of his own; but the church trustees still put lightning rods on the steeple.—Puck.

IF all the men who expect to go to heaven do go, it will be a mighty depressing place for some of us who may get there by chance.—Puck

LITTLE JENNIE: "Say, mamma, is this earth God's footstool?" Mamma: "Yes, dear." Little Jennie: "My! He must hav awful big feet."

MRS. JONES: "There goes Mr. Gray. He's an octogenarian." Mrs. Robinson: "Are you sure of that? I hav always understood he was a Unitarian."—Boston Transcript.

"WHAT's that big building over there, Wallie?" asked the visitor, pointing to the monastery that stood near Wallie's home. "That," said Wallie, proudly, at the thought of telling something they didn't know; "that is the monstrosity."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "Can you imagin anything more wonderful than this miracle of the whale swallowing Johah?" Johnny: "Yes, I sir, can!" Sunday-school Teacher: "Well, what is it?" Johnny: "Jonah swallowing the whale, sir."

A TEXAS Sunday-school teacher asked a pupil how many sacraments there were. "There ain't any more left." "Why, what do you mean?" "Well, I hear that our sick neighbor received the last sacrament yesterday, so there can't be any left."

"FREDDIE, when you said your prayers last night didn't you ask God to make you a good boy?" "Yes, mamma." "Well, you've been as bad as ever to-day." "But, mamma, you can't blame me if God doesn't do just what I ask him."—Life's Calendar.

FATHER RYAN (to parishioner): "It's a long time since I hav seen you at confession, Pat." Pat: "Yis, father, but fur the lahst six months Oi hav had nothin' to confiss." Father Ryan: "That is impossible, Pat. Even the angels would hav sinned in that time. I go to confession three simes a week, and find plenty to confess." Pat: "The more shame to you, father."—Boston Investigator.

A SMALL New Yorker had been having a day of unmitigated outrageousness, such as all children who do not die young are likely to hav at times; and when he was ready for bed his mother said to him: "When you say your prayers, Georgie, ask God to make you a better boy. You hav been very naughty to-day." The youngster accordingly put up his petitions in the usual form, and then before closing with "Amen," he added: "And please, God, make me a good boy." He paused a second, and then, to the utter consternation of his mother, concluded with unabated gravity: "Nevertheless, not my will, O Lord, but thine be done!"—Providence Journal.

HIS MERCY ENDURETH FOREVER.

The infinit nothing, Jehovah the Ghost,
Condensed to a sentient, unfortunate host,
Just all for the pleasure of seeing them roast—
For his mercy endureth forever.

Creation he cunningly planned to contain
Disproofs of "design," to a man with a brain;
And damns those who see them to infinit pain—
For his mercy endureth forever.

When Eve in the orchard the apples did pluck,
The God who tabooed them ran madly amuck;
He blasted and cursed, and his curses hav stuck—
For his mercy endureth forever.

The Lord was enraged with the blood-guiltless Cain
For offering harmless fruit, cabbage, and grain,
Instead of an animal writing in pain—
For his mercy endureth forever,

God published a tale of a girl and a ghost,
Of devils in pigs, and his son on a post,
And ordered our race to belive it or roast—
For his mercy endureth forever.

This scheme of redemption is only a sham,
No sensible man can believe in the lamb;
God means all his sensible creatures to damn—
For his mercy endureth forever.

. . . . . .

The blackest conception of all that's accurst;
The vilest reflection of man at his worst,
Was Yahveh the bloated, whom science has burst,
And reduced to a by-word forever.

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

The opinion was read by Judge Brewer, and amounts to a decision that the government can do no wrong. Justices Harlan and Shiras dissented.

HOW RELIGION WARPS HUMAN REASON (OR JUDGMENT).

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing h at this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WILL CONTAIN AN ARTICLE BY

HELEN H. GARDENER,

Entitled, "WHAT ARE WOMEN HERE FOR?"

Are Americans Merely Spectators?

A contributor to Secular Thought is responsible for the assertions quoted below:

"The din of the conflict of faith and reason, of science and theology, is everywhere audible; but Europe is the chief seat of this battle. In this conflict, we Americans, although part and parcel of Christendom, occupy the position of spectators and outsiders rather than that of combatants. The reason of non-belligerency is not far to seek. Religion has always with us been more a matter of private judgment and private opinion. It has not been dictated and imposed so much by authority. It has not been interwrought into the state and social and political organization. Hence, the decay of a religious faith here will not be accompanied with any violence to or laceration of the body politic."

These are remarkable statements, yes, more than remarkable when we take into consideration the fact that they are made by a Freethinker. If Europe is just now the chief seat of the battle between science and theology, between faith and reason, it is because there the opponents of faith and theology are more numerous, more aggressiv, and more courageous than they are here. On the Continent there are many avowed Freethinkers among the men of politics and the scientists, and even in conservativ England a majority of the scientists reject the old creeds, and at least one well-known Freethinker sits in the cabinet. Where are our Freethinking politicians, and among our scientists how many are there who stand out in the light as do the representativ scientists of England, France, and Germany? Secular funerals are very common on the continent, especially in France, where a great many public men hav been interred without the aid of priest or preacher. In America, what public man, since Michael C. Kerr was laid to rest, has had a secular funeral? Religion not inwrought into our state, and social and political organizations? Why is it, then, that the church eceives vast revenues from the state, in various ways not necessary to particularize here? Why is it that the World's Fair was ordered closed on Sunday and that the Cotton Palace at Waco is now closed on that day because the preachers demanded both? Why is it that the church is able to support one hundred and fifteen thousand preachers and a multitude of other employees, while not more than a dozen Freethought lecturers are able to make a scanty living in their profession? Why is it that the church is gaining every year a firmer foothold in the laws? Why is it that intelligent Europeans who come among us express their amazement at the fact that our political, professional, and business classes are so subservient to the church? Why is it that in nineteen towns out of every twenty in the country the average business and professional man, if a Freethinker in sentiment, dares not say so publicly, and generally finds it to his advantage to giv to the church? Why is it that the church is able to increase her membership, her wealth, her political power, her social prestige as she is constantly doing? The man who makes the statements we hav quoted has traveled all over this country as a lecturer, and is therefore in a posito know better than to indulge in such misleading assertions. Of course there are many factors in the social and educational development of our country which are encouraging, and giv us good grounds to hope that liberty and justice will eventually win their way in America, but it will not be without a desperate struggle with the hosts of ignorance and tyranny. If anything, the struggle is to be more closely contested here than in England or on the Continent. It will not be a walk-over for us, by any means, and it will be all the more severe and prolonged a conflict in proportion as our people giv credence to the siren songs of those who tell them that we hav no direct interest in the battle between theology and science, between liberty and despotism; that we are merely spectators of an Old World war, and shall not need to enlist ourselvs. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

An Excited and Illogical Rabbi.

As is usual, the lecture of Colonel Ingersoll in Cincinnati greatly disturbed the official representativs of religion. Among those who let "their angry passions rise" was Rabbi Isaac M. Wise. He delivered two "replies" to Mr. Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible, but as we hav not seen the report of the first of these ebullitions we do not know how he acquitted himself in that, but if he did no better in it than in the one we hav seen, the friends of supernaturalism hav no reason to felicitate themselvs upon his defense of their creed. Rabbi Wise has in times past been accounted more or less Liberal himself, but there is little evidence of it in the discourse of which we hav before us a quite extended report. While deprecating the attitude and methods of Colonel Ingersoll's Christian critics he does not avoid the faults of which he accuses them. He says that they sent their "fiery volleys" after the Infidel, but only "scolded and denounced him, without any attempt at sober argument." Well, here are some of the things which the grave rabbi says about the colonel, and we must submit that, taken altogether, they sound very much like scolding and seem to be lacking in the element of "sober argument:"

He tells his congregation that Colonel Ingersoll "spoke as Ingersoll speaks, always did—not as he thinks, but as those others think whose goods he retails. He is not guilty of any self-thought, proposition, or argument. He could not venture an argument, because he deals in stolen goods exclusivly. He negates, denies, scorns, ridicules, with a crude humoresque between and betwixt, and his audience laughs. The laugh and the $1.50 are all he wants, all he asks for." Ingersoll's audiences, says Rabbi Wise, are the ones for which he "coins, makes to order," the lectures which he delivers. The people who compose these audiences, and who pay one dollar or more to hear "a rehash of old and stale stuff," do not belong to the laboring classes; they do not belong to the "class of students, truth seekers, or the friends of intellectual pastime," for "no brainy person could possibly feel the desire to listen for an hour or longer to Mr. Ingersoll's recitation of rotten eggs." They could not be the lunatics of the city, for "our probate judge" "sends them to the proper asylum," nor the criminals, for they "are behind lock and bars." [The inference here is that the lunatics and criminals would hav been in the audience if they had not been under restraint.] His conclusion is that those who go to hear Colonel Ingersoll are the "well-to-do, soft-brained, merry-making, amusement hunters, unprincipled fanatics, who pay for the pleasure in specie of hearing their neighbors' religion chastised and derided.'" They are "stultified dilettantes, too lazy to read and think." The size of the audiences indicates that those "who hav no more principle, sense of honor, and self-respect in their characters than to go to the devil, if his tricks and antics amuse them, must be considerable in our good city, and this is lamentable. Respectable people patronize no obscene shows."

The lecture is "venturesome rigmarole," "ordinary and faulty in language and diction." The "idol," "St. Robert Ingersoll," indulges in "impudence," and "never produces an argument." Rabbi Wise cannot properly reply to the Freethinker for the reason, as he tells us, that he "speaks in a sanctuary, and to respectable audiences."

And in the face of all this Mr. Wise finds fault with the Christian preachers because they merely "scold" Colonel Ingersoll!

After this very courteous exordium, Rabbi Wise proceeds to indicate somewhat in detail what he alleges are the intellectual limitations of Colonel Ingersoll. The rabbi looks upon the "Ingersoll literature" as something of a patchwork quilt, made up chiefly from cyclopedias, some of which, as the Britannica, contain "errors and fallacies enough to supply a dozen of Ingersolls." The two "main patches," we are informed, "are from two scientific disciplins, the Natural Sciences and the Modern Bible Criticism," and neither of these has been studied by Mr. Ingersoll, according to Rabbi Wise.

It does not seem to hav occurred to the reverend critic that the masses of the Christian public know little or nothing about the Higher Criticism or about the details of modern science, and that they accept the Bible as the word of an all-wise and all-good God. Such being the case, it is enough that in popular lectures the patent absurdities, contradictions, and awful barbarities of the Bible be pointed out and the general development of the so-called sacred word indicated. Those who hav the inclination and leisure to pursue the subject further can do so by studying the works of critics and scholars and attending the lectures of those who hav made a life work of biblical exegesis. Such books and such lectures will carry the results of painstaking investigation to hundreds where the lectures of Colonel Ingersoll and his co-workers will carry the same results, in a somewhat more popular form, to tens of thousands. Both of these classes of liberal propagandists are useful, and there is no rivalry between them. Certainly it is true that Colonel Ingersoll has not given his life to the study of the Bible and its commentaries, but it by no means follows that he is in error in his deductions concerning its origin and teachings. If Rabbi Wise is right, then no man or woman is justified in refusing to accept the claims made for the Bible unless that person has made a thorough study of the Bible and all literature relating to it. This would limit the number of Freethinkers in the world to some few hundreds, which would, no doubt, be very gratifying to the priests, preachers, and rabbis. But the whole world is entitled to share in the benefits of critical scholarship, even if comparativly few hav the time to master all its details. If only those who thoroughly understand steam power and electrical energy were to be benefited by or to accept the results of discoveries in those departments of practical science which owe their existence to the applications of steam and electrical energy, civilization would be vastly, immeasurably, different from what it is at present.

There is more in this contention of Rabbi Wise's than he appears to see. If no one is to be permitted to affirm that the Bible is a purely human production unless he has spent forty or fifty years in examining into its history, what is to be done with the hundreds of millions of Christians and Jews who believe that it is the word of God, and who hav made no study whatever of the subject? Must one be accounted presumptuous if he thinks that the Bible, like all other books, is the work of man, while he who thinks that God wrote it is to be welcomed as a modest scholar? Aside from the alleged sacred books, we are convinced by our experience and the experience of our predecessors that all literature of every sort has come from the brain and hand of man. The Bible worshiper asserts that the Bible did not hav this origin; in other words, he assumes that the Bible is the one exception to the otherwise universal rule. Making this affirmation, the burden of proof is his. The Freethinker is not under a logical obligation to prove that God did not write it or inspire its writing, which is the same thing. It is the business of the supernaturalist to prove that God wrote it. All that the Rationalist and Freethinker hav to do is to show the fallacies and the insufficiencies which abound in the arguments of the Bible apologists. This is the task of Colonel Ingersoll and other Freethought lecturers and writers. It may or may not be true that he or they sometimes giv too little or too much credence to the statements and conclusions of this or the other historical or scientific specialist, but it is true that the supernaturalists hav not demonstrated that the Bible is of divine authorship; it is true that they hav not disposed of the natural and reasonable presumption that the Bible is of human authorship, like all other books; it is true that the more thoroughly the question is studied the more clear does it become that the Bible is the human record of the experiences and thoughts of a certain portion of our race, and that the claimed-to-be extra-natural marvels described therein are of the same kind as those of which we read in the sacred books of other religions and in the literatures built up on those sacred books—marvels that science and critical investigation relegate to the domain of natural phenomena not understood in the old days, or to the realms of allegory and downright lying.

The most satisfactory disposition of the Bible is its explanation by the scientist and the scholar, and they are doing their work in a very thorough manner. But the essential thing is to get out of the minds of the people the preposterous notion that the book is above criticism, and that they are under an ethical obligation to believe that it is the word of an omnipotent God. While a man believes this it is impossible to obtain from him an unprejudiced examination of moral and social problems. While he is under the spell of the infallibility delusion he will not ask, "Is it true?" but, "Does the Bible say so?" Such an attitude is an utterly hopeless one for the reformer and the humanitarian, and you might as well argue with the dead as with a man who thinks that what you advocate is contrary to the teachings of his fetich. Colonel Ingersoll keenly realizes the truth of this, and he is determined to do what he can—and he can do much—to open the eyes of his fellows to the madness of believing that the Bible is the thought—the perfect thought—of an all-knowing and all-good God.

We shall hav something more to say about the arguments of Rabbi Wise.

We hav before alluded to the Catholic antagonism to the religious reforms proposed in Hungary. The Catholic Review, while declaring, anent the political questions agitating this country, that "religious liberty is of more worth than tariff taxes or any other issue," characterizes the religious liberty bills pending in Hungary as the work of the Masonic bodies, and says that the Archduke Joseph's opposition to the measures shows that "at least one member of the imperial family does not wear the yoke of the lodge of Lucifer." This is tantamount to saying that in Hungary religious freedom is from the devil. In this country, according to our Catholic contemporary, it is from heaven. It occurs to us that this very effectually unmasks the Catholic Review.

Colonel Ingersoll's Quartet of New Books.

Colonel Ingersoll is delivering his new lecture, "About the Holy Bible," to immense audiences in the East and West. It is a phenomenal success and is now ready in pamphlet form.

His lectures on Shakspere and Lincoln are also ready. No words of praise, deserved as they are, can add anything to the mere statement that they are Ingersoll's. They are printed in handsome shape, in paper covers. All of our many readers will want copies of both for themselvs, and more for their children and friends, and some for missionary work among Christians. The titles of these lectures are not terror-inspiring to faithful souls, and reading these eloquent productions will create an appetite for more from the same source. The three pamphlets are twenty-five cents each.

Another pamphlet which everybody will want is this: "Is Suicide a Sin?" The work contains Colonel Ingersoll's two letters to the New York World, together with the replies of famous clergymen and others, a verdict from a jury of eminent men of New York, curious facts about suicides, celebrated essays and opinions of noted men, and an original chapter on the "Great Suicides of History." Price, in heavy paper, with late portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll, twenty-five cents.

Can any good come out of the Pennsylvania Nazareth? It would seem so, for the Ministers' Association of the United Presbyterian church at their October meeting in Pittsburg debated the question of church exemption from taxation, and decided that such exemption is wrong. Those who spoke also took occasion to censure those ministers who ask discounts from their tradesmen because they are clergymen. This is certainly refreshing, and now we shall not be surprised to hear that a Presbyterian minister has denounced the enactment of Sunday laws and placed himself on record against the retention of the Bible in the schools. Gentlemen, we are glad to welcome you to the service of justice, even though it is nearly the eleventh hour. But you cannot hav a full day's pay, and, when the wrong is finally righted and the churches hav ceased to be deadheads, you must not put in the claim that "Christianity did it all."

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we hav to get behind with others. We hav no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to giv others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we hav said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

How rapidly the people of the country are being educated in the principles of the theocrats is not generally known to Liberals, and this is not to be wondered at when we remember that only a small fraction of the anti-orthodox people of the country take Freethought papers, and as they do not read the organs of the theocrats they must necessarily be in the dark concerning the machinations of the enemies of secular institutions. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor is rapidly making recruits for the God-in-the-Constitution party. It is very much interested in the so-called "Christian Citizenship" movement. The Christian Reformer tells us that that society "is pushing this department of work with commendable zeal." At their recent convention in Pennsylvania, the Endeavorers of that state elected as their president Rev. J. T. McCrory, D. D., who until recently was one of the editors of the Christian Statesman, and who, it is needless to say, is an ardent advocate of the Christianization of the Constitution and laws of the nation. His special theme as Christian Endeavor lecturer will be "Christian Citizenship." This is indeed setting the wolf to guard the fold.

With the rarest of exceptions, the Christian minister sets out to "reform" the world by force, when he takes any interest at all in reformatory work. He does not think of studying social problems. He assumes that all evils are the result of the "fall." Hence we find Rev. Dr. McArthur talking as though the girls who are the chief victims of the social evil were the cause of it. Hear him:

"I favor localizing it on an island in the midst of the ocean. I would then dip the island for a while, and, after giving the women some time to repent, I would dip the island again, and hold it under for a while longer."

Of course this is rhetorical bombast, but why not a word about the ethical, social, and economic causes back of the social evil, and why not a word about the male customers without whom these women he wants to drown could not ply their trade for a day? Is he too dull to understand that no business can liv without patronage and that supply follows demand? Let him murder every woman of the pave to-day, and in ten years—the environments otherwise of men and women remaining as they are—the places of the slaughtered ones would be more than filled. But who should expect a comprehension of social problems from the promoters of other-worldism? They that follow the average ministerial "reformer" fall into the ditch with him.

It is the old story over again in Manitoba. There the Catholics hav been defeated in their attempt to get a part of the public school fund for their religious schools, and now the Protestants are taking steps to prevent the secularization of the public schools. In the Presbyterian synod the question came to the fore and, as we learn from Secular Thought, with this result:

"Dr. King gave notice of a motion that the synod deems it s asonable and important to affirm its satisfaction at the fact that an unsectarian system of education has been instituted in Manitoba, and that the synod would deprecate any change in the present system of operation which would forbid the use of the scriptures at the opening or closing of the schools when the trustees so desire."

That is to say, when the Catholics get some of the school money the public school system is sectarian, but it is not sectarian to use the Bible in the schools. Catholicism is sectarian, but Protestantism is not sectarian. That is logical and fair, indeed. What can exceed the impudence of the cleric who in the same breath talks of the beauty of unsectarian schools and proposes to keep those schools sectarian by continuing the use of a sectarian text-book—the Bible—therein? Yet we hav several large and activ organizations in the United States which are working hard for just this kind of "unsectarian" instruction. One of them is the God-in-the-Constitution party. Another is the Junior Order of American Mechanics. Others bear equally misleading names.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 17th we commented on the case of Henry Krech, of Tacoma, who runs a barber shop in the Hotel Fife. He chooses to exercise his rights as an American citizen by keeping his shop open on Sunday, and the fact that he does so is prima facie evidence that many of his fellow-citizens desire to hav the place open, and that they express this desire by patronizing Mr. Krech. In a decent civilization this would be taken as a matter of course, and no one would make a fuss about it. But the other barbers of Tacoma, or, at least, the majority of them, do not want to keep open on the first day of the week, and so they are determined that no one else shall do what they do not want to do. It is the old dog-in-the-manger story. Mr. Krech has often felt their wrath, having been arrested several times, and always convicted. At last he got into the Supreme Court of the state on appeal, and that tribunal has decided that he can shave and cut hair on the "Sabbath." The Tacoma News says that it is understood that the decision is rendered "on some technical point." While this is not the best report to get, it can truly be said that many a judicial victory for liberty has been won on a technical point. All honor to Henry Krech for his good fight for the right. It is not every man who will stand up in his own defense. If all would do so there would very soon be some thousands of meddling preachers and Christian Temperance women looking for new jobs.

On the whole, it is fair to assume that Jesus knew what he was saying when he declared that he came to bring a sword. Christianity appears to be adapted to the fighting races. And the church is determined that the war spirit shall not die out if it can possibly keep it alive. The world's humanitarian leaders are striving to put arbitration in the place of war, and of course there are some nominal Christians among these peace lovers, but it seems that it is not within their power to drive the war lust out of the blood of the great masses of the Christians. The churches are doing what they can to train up their young in such a manner as to qualify them for the work of wholesale slaughter when they reach the fighting age. We see in the papers constant allusions to Presbyterian cadets and Catholic cadets, to Episcopalian cadets and Congregational cadets, to Lutheran cadets and Baptist cadets. Twenty-seven churches in Detroit hav twenty-seven companies, thirteen of which are armed with rifles and one with swords. Nineteen of these companies are Protestants and eight are Catholics. On Thanksgiving day, the day to secure the religious observance of which the president and governors issue unconstitutional proclamations, the Boys' Baptist Brigade of New York had a parade and general review in Brooklyn. The time was well chosen; when old Christians are offering thanks to the "Prince of Peace" it is eminently fitting that young Christians should be instructed in the art of murder, so that they will be enabled to keep the supply of old Christians within reasonable limits during the next thirty years.

On December 18th, 19th, and 20th there will be a National Reform Convention held in New Castle, Pennsylvania. It is called for the purpose of advancing the movement for the strengthening of the abominable Sunday law of that priest-ruled state. Among the other questions to be considered are the Bible in the schools, "Christian" marriage and divorce, and "Christian" temperance issues. There is in the call the usual talk about the sovereignty of God, the rulership of Christ over the nation, and the binding authority of the Bible. We quote here the last paragraph of the precious document:

"This call has been signed already by all the pastors and many of the leading business men of New Castle, by many of the pastors of Pittsburg and Allegheny, not one of all to whom it was presented having declined to sign it, and is being signed by so many of the principal men of Western Pennsylvania and vicinity that it is impracticable to print the names to the call."

We should like to know how many of these business men who hav signed the call hav done so because they accept the principles which the convention is intended to advance, and how many signed it because they feared to lose patronage if they did not attach their names to the paper. In this connection it might be pertinent to ask the writer from whom we hav quoted, in the first article on the first editorial page, some very peculiar assertions, whether Americans are to be nothing but "spectators" in this struggle in Pennsylvania? Be this as it may, the Freethought Letter Writing Corps was not called on for service last week, and now we shall expect the members to devote themselvs for the next two weeks to the enlightenment of the editors of the Courant, News, Democrat, Guardian, and Volunteer, all published in New Castle, Pennsylvania. You can each write three letters, one for last week and one each for this and the next. Thus you will reach three papers. Of course more letters can be written if you are so disposed, and we hope that you will be so disposed. Present the Secular principles briefly but clearly and in particular show up the origin, the needlessness, and the injustice of Sunday laws.

An Armenian Christian, narrating the story of the horrible massacre of Armenians by Turkish soldiers and Kurds, said to a newspaper correspondent:

"But why prolong the sickening tale? There must be a God in Heaven who will do right in these matters, or some of us would lose faith."

How will this God "do right"? By torturing in hell the murderers of the Armenians? Would it not hav been an economy of ethical instruction if he had made the Turks so that they would hav had no desire to commit this atrocious crime? If God can torture them forever could he not hav made them decent in the first place? But suppose God "does right" by making the Christians happy forever with him in "heaven," what then? Would they not hav reached that abode of bliss if they had not been outraged and slaughtered? Certainly, according to the Christian creed, this must be so, but where does the compensation come in if they are not all booked for heaven because they were outraged and cruelly massacred? Being sure of eternal life anyway, nothing is gained for them by this horrible cutting off in infancy, youth, and middle age, while their destroyers will get there too all right if they "repent" in time, and in that contingency the murdered Armenians will not hav even the consolation of vengeance. Look at it in any way we can in reason, and there is no explanation in the God superstition of the massacre in Armenia.

The legislativ season is here. Congress is already at work, and some of the state legislatures are also in session. Soon all will be, and this is the opportunity for the political Christians. During the next six months these meddlers will be more activ than ever before. We want each of our readers to constitute him- or herself a committee of one to keep watch of the enemies of the secular state. Report to us immediately every movement of the theocrats. Look out for new Sunday laws and attempts to more rigorously enforce old ones; watch for appropriations to the church and to institutions under the control of the church; gather all the facts that you can in relation to the exemption of church property from taxation; be vigilant in regard to religious teaching in the schools; note what is said and done about the employment and payment of chaplains; do not fail to keep informed and to inform us as to the attacks which the anti-naturalists are sure to make on the agencies of expression and transmission. Do not assume that the Editor will find out all about these things through the daily papers; there are hundreds of those journals, and there are only seven days in the week; something of vital importance to our cause may escape his eye and yours may catch it in the nick of time; it will be better for him to hav his attention called to it repeatedly than not to see it at all. So send along the items. In this connection we will request all the members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps and all others who will now engage to write one letter each week to the target selected by the Captain to send us their names and addresses, not for publication, but that we may know how many there are, and so be better enabled to direct their activities. Let us make the coming year memorable in the annals of Secularism.

In Troy, New York, a movement is on foot intended to make all citizens do as the priests and the Women's Christian Temperance Union think is best for them—and the church. Whatever the anti-naturalists hold to be improper must disappear from sight; newsboys must cease to cry papers on Sunday morning, and the people must not hav the opportunity to buy what they desire if what they desire is not what their Christian neighbors desire. In Omaha the barbers hav induced the police to order all barber shops shut on Sunday, which is proof positiv that some of the barbers wanted to hav the shops remain open. If all had wished to hav them close there would hav been no need for the interference of the police. In this city the boss barbers and the journeymen barbers cannot agree in their work of repression, and so they now hav two associations, that of the bosses working for a law to shut at 1 P. M. on Sunday, and that of the journeymen for a law. to close up at 10 A. M. on that day. Both associations will hav committees at Albany when the legislature meets, and they will do their worst to get that body to meddle in a matter of business that does not in the least concern it, and with which, therefore, it has no business to meddle. Let the shops that want to keep open do so, and those which want to close exercise their right so to do. No law is necessary to secure to the journeyman one day of rest in the week, but if there were, it would not be a statute forbidding all work in a barber shops on Sunday. Let six days constitute a week's work and then the workmen can arrange among themselvs what day off each shall take. This is the only common-sense solution of the problem—if there is such a problem—and it is the only one in harmony with free institutions. Of course, it should be distinctly understood that while six days constitute a working week, any man can work all seven if he chooses. A man should no more be forbidden to work on Sunday or punished if he does work than he should be forbidden to work on the Fourth of July, or punished if he does work on that day. The primary trouble is that some millions of our people hav got into the habit of running to the state every time they want to outdo their rivals, instead of depending on their own resources. They are like the cry-baby who goes whimpering to his mother whenever he stubs his toe or is outclassed by his playmate.

There does not seem to be that perfect unanimity of opinion among the official and semi-official guardians of our morals that might reasonably be expected from those who apparently proceed upon the assumption that they are the interpreters and executors of the will of the alleged divine author of the ethical code. Lady Henry Somerset is now trying, in conjunction with Frances Willard and her society, to prevent the exhibition of Living Pictures in the theaters of this city. Superintendent Byrnes sent Captain Schmittberger and a number of policemen around to the various places where the Living Pictures are part of the entertainment, with instructions to report if the exhibitions were indecent. Think of the innocence of the assumption that a Tammany official is especially qualified for such a task! As Nym Crinkle observes, "What is there in this view of the matter to prevent a detectiv from visiting the Academy of Design and pronouncing judgment on a Venus by Chase, or a Leda by Millais?" Captain Schmittberger reports that there is nothing wrong with the Pictures, and a certain notorious preacher is said to agree with him. On the other hand, the notorious preacher says that the exposure made by the women of the Four Hundred in the boxes of the Metropolitan Opera House is scandalously indecent, and with him agrees Elizabeth B. Grannis, who is the head of the Social Purity League of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. She also thinks that the Living Pictures are not immodest. But Mrs. Grannis's official superior, Frances Willard, is sure that the Pictures are doing a great deal to continue the social evil! Of course there was no social evil before we had Living Pictures in New York! That is the way these anti-naturalists play with the scattering filaments on the extreme outer fringe of the most appalling social problem of the ages. Referring to the dresses of the Four Hundred, Mrs. Grannis says that when we look at a beautiful neck "something should be left to the imagination." That is precisely the trouble; we hav been leaving so much to the imagination that the imagination has rioted in corruption. Mystery in religion and mystery in art and ethics are the twin curses of humanity.

The Sermon on the Mount.

One after another the extravagant claims made for Jesus hav been combated from the outside, and now we see doubt arising within the very churches themselvs. Rational criticism has carried the outposts of religion, and the inner defenses seem, even to many believers, to be in danger of giving way, while the historical reality of Jesus, the central figure itself, seems more and more threatened. In the midst of these doubts and distractions belief tends increasingly to a reliance on the alleged moral teachings of Jesus, as being, after all is said and done, the great fortress of the faith. Hence we hear a great deal about the sublime morality of the Sermon on the Mount. Even the so-called Freethinker, Renan, grows sentimental over it, as when (Life of Jesus, p. 87) he says: "The morality of the gospels remains, nevertheless, the highest creation of human conscience, the most beautiful code of perfect life that any moralist has traced."

I dispute this assumption as a whole and in all its particulars, whether made by a genuin Christian or advanced by a man like Renan, who to a great extent was a Rationalist only for the purposes of literary effect, and largely to giv a background of color to his picturesque and often unfounded exaggerations about the life of Jesus.

The main source of information as to the alleged moral teachings of Jesus is the so-called Sermon on the Mount (Mat. v, vi, vii). There is one peculiarity about this discourse—only Matthew says that Jesus delivered any sermon on the mount. Neither of the three other gospels says so. Luke givs a small portion of the matter of the sermon, but he contradicts Matthew flatly as to the location, for he says that "Jesus came down and stood in the plain." The occasion is evidently the same, as both are preceded by a description of the multitude who followed: (Mat. iv, 25), "And there followed him great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from beyond the Jordan." (Luke vi, 17), "A great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jerusalem, and from the sea coast of Tyre and Sidon (that is beyond the Jordan)."

If this discourse is so important, as Christians profess to believe, the sum of all the teachings of Jesus and the sufficient source of all morality, it is curious that Mark and John knew nothing about it and that Luke should dismiss it with such a short report. Luke, omitting the larger part of the matter, takes only one page to tell what occupies three pages in Matthew, and to find any parallel to much of Matthew we hav to go to other chapters of Luke and to other occasions. In addition to which they disagree as to whether it was given on a mountain or in a plain.

Jesus begins with an enumeration of those whom he calls "blessed." The "blessed" are people who, so far from being blessed, are in most of the cases, in any real sense of the word, the very opposit. He calls "blessed" the "poor," the "poor in spirit," they that mourn, the meek, they that weep, they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, they that hunger, they that are persecuted and reviled, the pure in heart, and the peacemakers, etc. These are the "blessed," who are so in a way characteristic of Jesus, and here as in most things in which he may be said to be original, his teaching is harmful in theory and has been so in practice.

"Blessed are the poor," "the poor in spirit," has been the excuse for ages of tyranny—the rod laid on the backs of nations, with the aid of the church, to weaken and degrade mankind and to keep it so. What ages hav passed, during which this teaching has enabled kings to plunder their people, whilst the church looked on, shared in the plunder, and in return taught the people that it was their duty to be satisfied "with that station in life in which it had pleased God to place them," and to honor the God and church which helped to plunder them!

When was it ever true that "Blessed are they that mourn? Blessed are the meek, the poor, the persecuted?"

See these "blessed" ones in slums, poverty, misery, and distress; the high in spirit, the energetic, grasping and presuming, with the wealth of the world, fine houses and plenty at their command; and, for commentary, "those to whom it is given to understand the kingdom of God," absorbing their share of the good things of this world whilst claiming to be the successors of those apostles who, when Jesus sent them out to preach to the world, were instructed to "provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves."

To each of these states Jesus alleges a reason for their blessedness. The poor in spirit are blessed because the kingdom of heaven is theirs, the poor because the kingdom of God is theirs, the mourners because they shall be comforted, the weepers laugh, the meek because they shall inherit the earth, the hungry and thirsty because they shall be filled—all in the kingdom of heaven. That is, that those who are suffering and degraded in this world are to hav their "reward" in the kingdom of heaven, not for any good that there was in them, but solely because they lacked any reward here. In the story of Dives and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 25) Jesus makes Abraham tell Dives, who is in hell: "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things and likewise Lazarus evil things, but now he is comforted and thou art tormented." Dives is in hell, not because he was a bad man, but because he was comfortable on earth! Those who hav any part in the good things of this world are to be considered as having had all that they are entitled to here, and consequently everything is to go wrong with them hereafter; they "shall be cast intoouter darkness,' where "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Mat. viii, 12; xxii, 13; Mark xxv, 30).

Listen:

Woe unto you that are rich! for ye hav received your consolation (Luke vi, 24).

Woe unto you that are full! for ye shall hunger (Luke vi, 25).

Woe unto you that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep (Luke vi, 26).

We were told by the old law in Ecclesiastes (iii, 17) that "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked," and surely an ennobling and just conception of God could picture him only as judging mankind on the merits of each individual. Jesus, with the fanaticism born of his time and his own peculiarly low conception of divine justice, degrades the best Jewish conception of God to an immeasurably low depth, and makes the divine judge judge individuals according to their material conditions and surroundings on earth, and awards the heavenly kingdom as a compensation for lowness of condition here, not for any merit in the individual; whilst the person who had had some share of good estate here is sent to feed his brimstone flames in eternal damnation for that alone, and not for any personal demerit.

If we examin each of the above statements as to who the blessed are, we shall find that the first portion of it, in nearly every instance, is not original with Jesus, he derived it entirely from the Old Testament; but the second part of each statement, in so far as it denounces judgment and awards punishment solely because a person had some degree of comfort on earth, is peculiar to Jesus; the gross immorality of it, the degraded conception he had of his heavenly father, is his own. The Old Testament, in all conscience, is full enough of low and degrading conceptions of God, but he is also sometimes pictured as having "loving kindness" towards men; and his loving kindness which he promises in Isaiah, Proverbs, Psalms, and elsewhere in the Old Testament is for the poor, broken in spirit, contrite, the meek, the righteous, to whom he promises rewards because they hav been righteous and "hearkened" to him, and his judgments are threatened against the well-to-do and prosperous because they had not done as he had commanded—not, as with Jesus, solely because they were prosperous.

The mass of the people in Jesus's time were poor, miserable, and suffering because of bad government; one does not need to be inspired to know that. Jesus is said to hav been a divine person, sent from God, all-knowing, and the best advice he can giv is to tell the poor and miserable that they are to think themselvs blessed because they are so accursed here—it will be made all right to them in the "sweet by and bye." Five hundred and fifty-one years before Jesus was born, with a divine or Holy Ghost for one of his parents, there was born in China, of mere earthly parents, a mere earthly man-child, with no pretense to anything divine in his nature. What a blessed thing it was for Confucius that he was not born with a Holy Ghost for one of his parents! It enabled him to hav common sense, human and humane ideas about some of the troubles of his time. He was not divine or inspired, but was able to say, "When a country is well-governed, poverty and a mean condition are things to be ashamed of. When a country is ill-governed, riches and honor are things to be ashamed of." He said, "The requisits of good government are that there should be sufficiency of food, sufficiency of military equipment, and confidence of the people in their ruler." And being asked, "If it cannot be helped and one of those must be dispensed with, which of the three should be foregone first?" Confucius replied, "The military equipment." Asked if one of the remaining two must be dispensed with, which of them should be foregone? Confucius answered, "Part with the food. From of old, death has been the lot of all men; but if the people hav no faith in their rulers, there is no standing for the state."

Three hundred and seventy-one years before Jesus was born, another merely human Chinaman was born—Mencius. He had a most remarkable mother, too. She brought him up with great care and good sense, and he was never known, though only a Chinaman and not divine, to abuse her, as Jesus did his mother. Mencius was called upon for advice on the miseries of the people and their political troubles. Not being inspired, this is how he talked. To a king whose people were suffering he said:

Your dogs and swine eat the food of men, and you do not know to make any restrictiv arrangements. There are people dying from famin on the roads, and you do not know to issue the stores of your granaries for them. When people die you say "It is not owing to me, it is owing to the year." In what does this differ from stabbing a man and killing him and then saying, "It was not I, it was the weapon?" Let your majesty cease to lay the blame on the year, and instantly from all the empire the people will come to you. . . . Is there any difference between killing a man with a stick and with a sword? The king said "There is no difference." "Is there any difference between doing it with a sword and with the style of government?" "There is no difference;" was the reply, and then Mencius givs him other sound advice, as "to be sparing in the use of punishment and fines, to make taxes and levies light, to encourage agriculture, industry," etc. Again (p. 28): "If your majesty will now make pleasure a thing common to the people and yourself the imperial sway awaits you." (P. 30): "If the people generally are not able to enjoy themselvs they condemn their superiors." Another time to King Seuen of T'se, Mencius said (p. 34): "Suppose that the chief criminal judge could not regulate the officers under him, how would you deal with him? The king said, "Dismiss him." Mencius again said, "If within the four borders of your kingdom there is not good government what is to be done?" The king looked to the right and left and spoke of other matters.

Mencius said on another occasion:

Calamity and happiness are of men's own seeking, as is illustrated by the passage of the Ta'e Kea: "When heaven sends down calamities, it is still possible to escape from them; when we occasion the calamities ourselvs it is not possible any longer to liv."

Decidedly, the counsels of these Chinamen are to be preferred to the "divine" ones of Jesus. It never was and never will be true that poverty of spirit or of purse, mourning and weeping, hunger and thirst, etc., are blessings; and it is criminal to teach so. The more men try to avert such calamities, the more moral they will be. In these matters Jesus was an immoral teacher; Confucius and Mencius were wise ones.

Mat. v, 9: Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God.

Undoubtedly the peacemaker ought to be called blessed—he was so called before Jesus' time. "To the counselors of peace is joy" (Prov. xii, 20). If Jesus thought so highly of the peacemaker, why did he not imitate him? He says of himself:

Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household (Mat. x, 34-36). Suppose ye that I am come to giv peace on earth? I tell you nay; but rather division (Luke xii, 51). If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple (Luke, xiv, 26).

Truly a strange man to say, "Blessed are the peacemakers."

Mat. v, 13: Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt hav lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is henceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot.

This is the kind of overstrained, exaggerated metaphor that pleases the attendants at little Bethels. As a matter of fact, the metaphor is false, because salt cannot lose its savor. When we are shown a case in which salt has lost its savor, it will be time to tell wherewith it shall be salted.

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works" (Mat. v, 16). Good advice if meant in the sense that we should not be ashamed to do good. "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be seen of them" (Luke vi, 1). Also good if meant to advise modesty in doing alms; but both maxims are human wisdom discoverable by any sensible man. Put in the way Jesus puts them, it is to be observed, in passing, that they contradict each other.

Mat. v, 20: "For I say unto you that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." Here, again, is a merited reproach to the mere outward observance of forms, whilst their meaning is neglected. The reproach is a human one that has been reiterated by men in all ages, and it did not need that a god should be slaughtered in order that we might hear it again. It is a trite commentary upon the failure of Christ's teaching among his own people that if he were to return to earth to-day he would be bound to deliver the maxim in something like this form: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of them that worship in my name, ye shall in no wise be worthy to enter the kingdom of heaven." The Rising Generation.

Henrik Ibsen, in his remarkable dramatic study, entitled "The Master Builder," puts in the mouth of his leading character, Halvard Solness, the frank expression that he fears to promote his apprentice Ragmar because he has no doubt that the younger man will ultimately push him from the high position to which he has attained and which it is his ardent desire to hold as long as his life lasts. This is the conservativ spirit the world over; not always expressed so frankly and fully as by the ideal character in the play of the Norwegian poet, but always tacitly implied. In all departments of life the old are in perpetual dread of the "Rising Generation," and this truth is manifest in the highest degree in our social and political and religious life. Let us illustrate our meaning by a glance at the religious world in its present unsettled and transitionary condition. Everywhere there is manifested a spirit of unrest; the clergy are not blind to this fact; they are satisfied that wonderful changes are being wrought by outside forces in the opinions and sentiments of their flocks, but they are unable to calculate precisely to what definit result they are all leading. With wonderful unanimity the clergy of the old school from time to time arise in all their strength to denounce the revolutionary notions of the rising generation, but in time their denunciations and anathemas lose their force, for it is seen that the younger spirits are advancing, firmly and resolutely pushing their elder brethren from the positions to which in ages of fear and superstition they hav been elevated. First their pretensions are attacked, then the dogmas they teach. The "Rising Generation" indeed has discovered at last that the supposed god-given religion called Christianity does not consist of a fixed and settled set of dogmas which are true through all time, but that the main features of Christianity are of a changeable character and need to be revised from time to time. Moreover, the "Rising Generation," from the scientific side, traverse all the fundamental dogmas of the church. They deny that man is born a "depraved creature," inheriting all the alleged sins of Adam. They affirm that if all men were inherently depraved, to attempt to educate and improve them would be a gross waste of time and result in nothing but failure; and they further affirm that if men, in fact, were "miserable sinners," and all their thoughts were "evil continually," as theologians are never tired of asserting, the world could not show such splendid examples of unselfish heroic conduct as hav been witnessed in all ages of the world's history. Consequently, they affirm that, instead of man being a fallen being, he is a rising one, and they support their statements by an appeal to every branch of physical science, as well as the facts of history.

Indeed, the rising generation find that they are supported in their views by eminent scientists, who still claim to be Christians, like Professor Drummond in his recent work entitled "The Ascent of Man," and by the Rev. Professor John Symes in his discussion with me at Northampton, wherein he declared that he accepted the doctrin of evolution and considered "that Darwin was a much greater authority on biology than Moses." The Rising Generation also deny the doctrin of the Atonement, and declare that the death of the innocent could in no sense blot out the sins of the guilty. They recognize that a deed once performed cannot be undone. As a celebrated statesman once said: "You cannot unpull a man's nose." Once a crime is committed, nothing in the world can undo it. It is written indelibly upon the book of nature, from which no leaves can be torn and nothing can be expunged. Moreover, it is manifestly unjust for the innocent to suffer in the place of the guilty. All the rhetorical skill that the "old parliamentary hand," Mr. Gladstone, can command in his article on "The Atonement" in the Nineteenth Century fails to convince any rational creature that the death of the innocent Jesus could blot out the crimes of any pious scoundrel, or that there would be any justice in it if it could. And so the fundamental articles of the Christian faith are found to be false and the Rising Generation demand their revision. That the old school of theologians will resist we know; that they will wriggle furiously for some time we may rest assured, but they will hav to giv way in the end.

The objections of the rising generation are of a perfectly radical character. They go right to the root. They repudiate altogether the old Jewish conception of God—a sort of elongated "ghost-like man," who is supposed to exist somewhere in the universe, but whose exact whereabouts cannot be discovered; and they hav equally discarded belief in his satanic majesty, "God the devil," who was supposed to be occupied as perpetual stoker in hell until recent science made known that brimstone puts fire out, and so the devil's occupation, like Othello's, is gone forever.

And having once begun the work of revolt against the old and the false, the rising generation must continue the task. They must be persistent in their efforts; they must chop away without ceasing at the old tree of superstition; they will hav to remove a heap of lumber before they can pull up the poisonous roots. For a long time yet the old will cling tenaciously to the dying superstition, and hug with grim intensity the effete rags of their faith; but all will hav to go at last.

And then the new faith of the rising generation will hav its turn; but that too will hav to undergo change or suffer destruction, for we must all learn to appreciate the glorious fact that there is no finality to truth. Let us then urge on the cause of the rising generation and sing with Whittier:

O brave reformers! not in vain
Your generous trust in human kind;
The good which bloodshed could not gain,
Your peaceful zeal shall find.

The weapons which your hands hav found
Are those which mind itself has wrought:
Light, truth, and love; your battle-ground,
The free, broad field of thought.

Churchly Purpose and Performance.

Religion has entered politics in Norway. The reactionary party calls the republicans "Freethinkers" and "Blasphemers."

According to the latest statistics there were deposited on the altar of religion, as offerings during the time between the year 1500 and 1581 765.200 men; 12,000 women and girls were ravished, and 128,256 houses burned, and this in France alone.

It is a common saying that "Paris is France," but it is certain that all of France is not like Paris. The proposal to erect a statue to Renan at Treguier, his birth-place, has had to be abandoned for the present, owing to the religious intolerance of the municipal council of the town.

Of the Russian Stundists it is said that their character is as opposed "to the use of force as to using deception," and even their enemies recognize that they are "temperate, wise, industrious, devoted to work and to the enlightenment of their minds by reading." And yet, in spite of all this, the orthodox Christians of Russia will not permit them to liv in peace anywhere, and their persecution grows more and more oppressiv year by year.

The Seventh Day Adventists at Basel, in Switzerland, are having much trouble with the authorities in regard to Sunday work. They rest on Saturday and run their large printing establishment on Sunday, and this brings them into direct conflict with the laws. At first the fines imposed were merely nominal, but the punishments hav been increasing in severity, until sometime since when the director's household goods were sold to pay the fine.

Dr. Völkel, of Germany, has been indicted for blasphemy seventeen times and convicted twice. He will probably visit the United States during the coming year. ∴ A German Lutheran priest has recently been sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment at hard labor and ten years' loss of honor. He has, for a period of several years, robbed poor and rich alike to the tune of 1,000,000 marks. Had he been a layman his sentence would hav been thirty years. He has "got religion" again since entering prison.

Upon the order of a priest the body of a suspected Freethinker was exhumed in the night and placed outside the cemetery at Vereda Nueva, Cuba. The authorities interfered, but in vain. On the island of Cuba the church rules. ∴ Not being able to pay the exorbitant price demanded by several different priests at Cidra, Porto Rico, the family of a deceased woman wanted a secular funeral. The priests refused admittance to all to the grave-yards, and the body had to be carted around for two days before it finally found a resting-place in "unholy" ground.

The advantage of a good constitution is again demonstrated, this time in the republic of Venezuela, where the bushwhacker president, Crespo, responding to a congratulatory address from the Archbishop of Venezuela and the clergy of Caracas, says that as the son of Catholic parents he will giv the clergy of that church all the liberty of action that he can, and he regrets that the constitution of the republic does not permit him to make it hot for the heretics. But suppose that Venezuela had such a constitution as the theocrats want want to impose on the people of the United States—how quickly and easily Crespo could set his Inquisition in motion! Dr. McAllister, of the National Reform Association, would make a splendid Crespo, the only difference between the two being that while Crespo would torture Protestants and Freethinkers, McAllister would torture Catholics and Freethinkers. Listen to McAllister: "Those who oppose this work now will discover when this amendment is made to the Constitution that if they do not see fit to fall in with the majority, they must abide the consequences or seek some congenial clime." What the "consequences" would be we can easily imagin. ∴ J. Norwood is a vender of the "holy" Protestant Bible Society in Valera, Venezuela. The priests had him hauled up for selling and distributing "obscene and immoral" literature. The books were confiscated. The attention of Comstock and the United States postal department is called to this decision. ∴ The persecution of Freethinkers in Peru has now assumed such a magnitude that on several occasions blood has been shed on both sides. It is not so bad in the larger cities, but in small towns it is dangerous to property and life to be taken for a Freethinker. ∴ Dr. Felicismo López, editor of El Dearío de Avisos, Guayaquil, Ecuador, and member of the senate of that republic, has been excommunicated, and as a result lost his seat in the senate. When he left the senate chamber he was greeted with cries of "Long liv Dr. López!" "Down with the priests." "Shame on the senate of 1894."

In July, 1840, John Thorogood was imprisoned at Chelmsford, Eng., for refusing to pay church rates. He spent twenty-two months in prison rather than pay five shillings and sixpence. We hav progressed a little but not much from the stage of civilization marked by the imprisonment of John Thorogood. In almost every state in America the property of the citizen may be sold to pay the tax levied for the support of the church. Let any taxpayer refuse to pay his assessment because the exemption of church property from taxation compels him to help build churches and pay the salaries of the ministers, and he will find there is no help for it—he will hav to pay for the support of religion. Under existing law all the forces of the state and national government are in reserve to compel him to pay tribute to the church. ∴ The Hon. Cecil Rhodes, Premier of Cape Colony, has given to the Baptist church of South Africa nine thousand acres of land in Mashonaland and Matabeleland for missionary purposes. Once more are the heathen spoiled for the glory of God and the enrichment of his ministers. Rhodes's campaign, in which he acquired the land he so generously givs to the Lord's anointed, was one of the bloodiest in all the "record of England's unjust wars." But he knows what attorneys to retain to make the worse for him appear the better part. ∴ When the Matabele campaign closed the number of wounded prisoners on hand was only eight, when, in the course of ordinary war, there should hav been hundreds. Rhodes's marauders handed prisoners over to the nativ auxiliaries, their hereditary enemies, who, after torturing them as much as they wished, disposed of them in approved savage fashion. ∴ At a temperance mass meeting held in Leighton Buzzard, Eng., Rev. R. Watkin Jones, Wesleyan, told of the disastrous effects of Sunday-school training. He said that "a few years ago, in an Edinburgh prison, there were 569 prisoners, and 408 of them had received instruction in Sunday-schools. · · · At Glasgow it was reported that 62 out of 68 prisoners had received Sunday-school instruction. · · · In Leeds, out of 2,000 prisoners, 1,500 had received instruction in Sunday-schools. · · · After that, a very extensiv inquiry was made by chaplains and others connected with the principal prisons of England and Wales, and their report showed that out of 10,000 prisoners, 6,500 had received instruction in Sunday-schools · · · some of them had been Sunday-school teachers." ∴ At Finsbury Park, London, Christian manners are at their best. When the Secularist lecturer, Mr. Rosetti, called attention to a few scripture texts, there was a loud call that they be read. Mr. Rosetti said that it was impossible to read them in a mixed assembly. Then the disturbance grew so bad that the chairman was obliged to close the meeting. Shortly afterward the police escorted two of the Christian opponents out of the park, and later took one to the lock-up. He pleaded in defense that he "had mistaken a Christian gentleman for an Atheist." He thought that his zeal for religion should excuse his little mistake. The magistrate told him that Atheists had a right to speak as well as others, and fined him ten shillings. ∴ Henry Knight, of Luton, Eng., was fined for selling nuts to boys on Sunday. He pleaded that he had suffered a long illness from rescuing a child from drowning, and had, as a consequence, been for some time dependent upon his wife, and so he was anxious to earn something for himself. Yet the Christian magistrate fined him! Now he asks why the War Cry is sold in the streets on Sunday. Evidently he does not yet know very much about Christian law and Christian ideas of fair play. ∴ Great is missionaryism! Samuel Storey said in the House of Commons: "Whereever the missionaries have gone in Uganda there has followed warfare, bloodshed, cruelty, anger, and all the passions that inflame humanity and disgrace Christian people." In the Anglican Conference the Rev. R. P. Ashe pointed out that the Church Missionary Society, with a revenue of a quarter of a million pounds a year, had failed to establish a native church in any part of the world. In Fiji, according to Lord Stanmore, the entire life of the Christianized nativs is "one piece of unreal acting." The Freethinker says: "It is 'punishable by fine and imprisonment' to wear nativ clothing, to make nativ cloth, to smoke tobacco, to wear long hair or a garland of flowers, to wrestle or play at ball, to build a nativ-fashioned house, not to wear shirt and trousers, and in certain localities coat and shoes also. It is even a crime to bathe on Sunday. 'To my knowledge,' says Lord Stanmore, 'women hav been flogged for no other offense.'" Beautiful religion! Let us put God into the Constitution! ∴ The Friends are a small body in England, but very wealthy. Recently one of them died, leaving an estate valued at more than $5,000,000. On the other hand, Mr. Joseph Smith, the Quaker bookseller, devoted a large part of his life to the compiling of a bibliography of all works written by Quakers or concerning Quakerism, and he was left by his brethren to starve in an obscure street in one of the poorest quarters in London.

John Peck's performance on "A Queer God and His Queer Book," in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895, is worth the price of admission. There is only one John Peck in the world, and we've got him.

Observations.

Mr. John Burns, the Labor member of the English Parliament, is now giving Americans an opportunity to see what a British legislator looks like, and incidentally he is instructing us on the Labor question. The reception committee having provided me with a ticket, I was enabled to attend the Cooper Union meeting last Monday evening, where Burns and his friend Holmes and his colleague Benn addressed the multitude. I had considerable curiosity to know what an English Labor leader would hav to say. I hav heard the American agitators, and hav not often been able to extract mental sustenance from their discourse. As a general thing they care little for any other effect than to make the crowd yell. Last Monday night at Cooper Union the audience did its turn at cackling over Burns's appearance on the platform, and I supposed that when he came to speak he would tickle the animals again; but he did not. As soon as he could make himself heard he said: "Cheerin' won't solve the industrial problem." He addressed his hearers as "fellow-citizens." which they took as a joke and cackled over. Then Mr. Burns assured them that he spoke advisedly. Said he, "The world is my country, and to do good, in an humble way, is my religion." That statement quenched the enthusiasm momentarily and gave Mr. Burns opportunity to say: "The day of the labor agitator is past. It is time, also, to quit dreaming. When a man with a sudden rush of brains to the head wants to giv you a plan whereby all social difficulties may be adjusted at once, don't waste your time listening to him;" or words to that effect.

By remarks like the foregoing Mr. Burns convinced me that he really meant business; that his mission here is not to wave a flag in one hand, a union label in the other, and cleave the welkin with howls. The burden of his address was organization of workingmen according to trade, without regard to race, color, or creed. This, he claimed, would enable the laboring men and women not only to maintain living rates of wages, but also to secure the repeal of unjust laws. Men were to be educated in trades unions for municipal offices, and in municipal offices for larger legislativ functions. This, in brief, is Mr. Burns's plan for promoting industrial equality.

I doubt if Mr. Burns has his counterpart among the industrial reformers of America. He is more like Henry George than like any other that I now call to mind, but he has no universal panacea for application to the outside of the body politic, as Mr. George has. Though a Socialist, he does not advocate immediate reconstruction of all governments. He alludes occasionally to the somewhat effete notion that when the people are the source of government, the responsibility for the character of that government rests in a measure upon the populace itself. He argues also that if the laborers, through the organization of unions, will work out their own redemption from industrial slavery, the government will cut a small figure as a ruler, but be an important factor in the general coöperation.

Some of the Socialists who were present did not appear to indorse all the proceedings or all of the speech of Mr. Burns. They first asserted themselvs by hissing the chairman, Samuel Gompers, who is a trades unionist instead of a Socialist. In fact, every time Mr. Gompers appeared at the desk he was similarly greeted. The same parties also endeavored to howl down Mr. Benn, one of the English delegates, and to bring Socialist De Leon to the front. At this writing the unity of labor, which it is the purpose of Mr. Burns and his colleags to effect, and which is the terror of Mr. Herbert Spencer, still tarries below the horizon.

The New York Herald is polling its readers on the question of "The Saloon on Sunday." I am shut out from voting by the form of the ballot, which puts the elector on record as in favor of Sunday laws or else in favor of saloons. The opposition ballot reads:

> I desire to record my vote in opposition to the opening of saloons during certain legal hours on Sunday.

And the ballot for the other side is as follows:

> I desire to record my vote in favor of the opening of saloons during certain legal hours on Sunday.

That is not a fair statement of the issue. The problem is a theological one, and not one of rum or no rum. A voter may oppose, on moral grounds, the opening of saloons during either legal or illegal hours, on Sunday or any other day, and still not desire to close them by law; or he may favor open saloons at all hours of the day and night throughout the week. Only the advocates of Sunday laws and the saloon men can consistently vote the Herald's ballots. Neither an open saloon nor an open church arouses my hostility to the extent of exciting a desire to arrest the proprietor, so long as nothing stronger than thirst or curiosity is invoked to impel me to enter either of them. If a man's conscience permits or necessity forces him to sell rum or to dispense superstition to those who want that sort of truck, I do not recognize the authority of the politicians to interfere between him and his customers. The party owning or renting a store or building is the one to decide when its doors shall be open or closed.

My ballot would therefore read as follows: "I desire to record my vote in favor of abolishing Sunday laws and leaving the opening of saloons, churches, and other places of business to the janitors employed by their several proprietors." The law has no more to do with locking the doors than with cleaning the spittoons.

People who supposed that the Vigilant with a twisted centerboard was an American institution hav been laboring under delusion; for the English people hav furnished us one in the person of Lady Somerset, who will join our vigilante, Mrs. Martin, in her crusade against photographs, billboards, and living pictures. This distinguished moral nymphomaniac (as the doctors diagnose cases showing her symptoms) recently effected the closing of a concert hall in London where more attractiv females than Lady Somerset were to be seen, with the result of throwing several hundred respectable persons out of employment. Mrs. Somerset then turned her attention to America. What direction the attractiv women took is not known, but wherever they are, it may be safely predicted that the virtuous people of London will find them and giv them another chance to exert their blighting influence. Exactly where morality received the benefit through this virtuous Somerset —as you might call such a flop—cannot be seen at this distance; for the women concerned were not reformed, but scattered, and they are sure to congregate elsewhere, while the crowd whom they drew to the concert hall now closed is equally sure to follow them. This suggests an aspect of the case that Lady Somersault has neglected to view. The congregation of an attractiv and benevolent female is in itself harmless, and therefore can be safely tolerated, especially if the public knows where she is and is thereby enabled to avoid her. The danger sign is up; everybody knows where the thin ice is, where the edge of the roof is located, where the water is deep; but ice and roofs and deep water are things not to be gotten rid of, and to warn people of their danger and keep them away is about the best we can do. To show how sensible people can do in a similar case, the Freethinker does not advocate the closing of the churches and forcing the preachers out upon the highways and byways to spread their mischief. He prefers to see it confined to the churches, for almost anybody can tell a meeting-house when he sees it, and need not go in unless he wants to, and he deserves no sympathy if he does so. The method has to some extent the effect of starving the preachers out; hence they seek our schools and other public institutions as fields of work; and here it is legitimate to meet them and force them back. Suppose the Lady Somersaults and other moral contortionists should adopt that system—that is, let the attractiv and benevolent female congregate if she will, but warn the public against her, and throw the responsibility on the person who, in the face of their warnings, persists in being demoralized? This, it seems to me, would be a fair and square contest between morality and its opposit, and would giv the better cause a permanent victory on its merits. The moralists paint vice as alluring and pleasant in its promises, but disappointing in its fulfillment. However that may be, the things that a man can't help seeing and hearing before he comes to forty year must convince him that what passes under the name of virtue has abuses and terrors difficult to exceed. It may be frankly suggested that men who went to the Empire Garden abused nobody but themselvs while on the excursion, and that the same could not always be said of those that stayed away. Possibly, too, the minds of these Lady Somersets are a trifle affected by jealousy not unmixed with envy. The result of official crusades on the excluded class in New York has been to corrupt those who engaged in it, and nobody has been reformed.

There is another woman reformer in this city who deserves encouragement, as compared with the Martins and Summersaults. That is Mrs. Elizabeth Grannis, who has begun the reform at the top of society by criticising the foolish women who wear low-necked dresses. I cannot repeat the language which she has published, but she holds that the attractions of Westchester county and other dairy regions should not be emulated by attendants at the opera and other public places. Women who do this, says Mrs. Grannis, not only court the danger of taking a severe cold in the neck, but are responsible for sending young men off to places where the view may be indefinitly extended. In this way the upper crust of society contributes to the demoralization of the lower strata. Mrs. Grannis also testified that the effect of the dress upon the wearer herself is similar. Great minds before mine hav exhausted themselvs in the endeavor to find a good reason why women should dress in that manner when fashion has always allowed them to wear clothes to their chins. We cannot suspect them of designedly producing the effect ascribed by Mrs. Grannis. Women—that is, women other than the moral reformers—think of other things, as I am informed and believe. Possibly a decolleté dress is a mere vanity, to feed which they are ready to endanger the morals of young men; but they are wrong in doing so, for the young man is a tender and impressionable thing, and with such encouragement might become as bad as he wants us to think he is.

News and Notes.

The Ohio Liberal Society still keeps the torch of liberty at the front. President Light and Secretary Allen are persistent workers. There is plenty of local talent to aid; and whenever a speaker comes from abroad he has a splendid welcome. I was greeted with a full house on Sunday, November 25th. I lectured on the "Mistakes and Superstitions of Jesus," a very fruitful subject when you come to study it. It is very difficult to discover the real Jesus. He vanishes among the stars when you try to find him, like the divinities of Greece. But the Jesus of the gospels—the church Jesus—is a very extraordinary affair, as remarkable for his weaknesses and defects as for his merits. He certainly made a great many mistakes and was a very ignorant and superstitious man. I tried to find some Christians to defend Jesus—to stand up for him—but no one did so. I had logic and history on my side, as against pure sentimentalism on the other. The criticism, in the main, agreed with my estimate of Jesus, although some seemed still desirous of keeping the halo around his head. He meant well even if he was deluded, it was said. The discussion dashed off now and then into the unsounded depths of Anarchy and Socialism; for there is no doubt that Jesus was himself an Anarchist and Communist, but not by any means a scientific or philosophic reformer. Jesus acted more from feeling than through an illuminated intellect. He was a rebel, and as such still excites a certain sort of admiration. One of my critics found fault with Ingersoll because he did not defend the Anarchists when on trial for their life. I replied that it was impossible for any one to decide these questions of duty but Ingersoll himself. His honesty, his bravery, his devotion to truth cannot be questioned. There are many ways to serve humanity, and each must choose for himself. There is no infallible rule for a reformer. No one knows exactly the best way to do. If Ingersoll did all that was expected of him by many, he would hav to be God Almighty several times over. But Ingersoll is a man with the limitations of a man, and his splendid genius does not make him greater than humanity. He is with us and of us, and he can only do his share of the work along the common pathway. It is preposterous for any one to mark out a line of duty for Ingersoll, as if he were some enormous machine that every little crank has the privilege to turn. Ingersoll is a man, and like a man he must make his own choice. If he makes mistakes he makes them honestly, and the greatest hav done the same thing.

A wonderful commotion he has created among the clergy of Cincinnati. Some of them want him arrested for blasphemy. Every pulpit has poured out its vials of wrath. One Howard Saxby—priest or politician, I know not which, has written himself down an ass—the very Dogberry of critics. Well, it is a good thing to stir up all this bad blood in the veins of orthodoxy. It brings the virus to the surface, and then there is a chance of its being cured. Ingersoll is the best doctor that Christianity has ever had. It has mightily improved since his surgeon's knife has been applied. The clergy ought to be thankful to Ingersoll for enabling them to get rid of so much superstition and giving to Christianity a decent appearance.

The Liberal Society has blazed a good pathway for its winter work. It is expected that Remsburg, Steiner, Mrs. Krekel, and Mrs. Freeman will be here. Mr. Wilmot is going to giv his ideas of "The Orthodox Devil"; Rabbi Wise will tell "Why he is not a Christian." The society has secured a new and elegant hall, and this is filled from evening to evening and a wide variety of subjects are handled by able lecturers.

I shall spend the month of December in the north, hoping that I shall not be overtaken by a Dakota blizzard. Afterwards I shall be in Arizona, at Prescott and other places; San Marcial and Santa Fé, New Mexico. I expect to lecture at Trinidad, Colorado, during February. I especially desire that Liberal friends in Colorado—Denver and vicinity—will arrange for one or more lectures. I want to be kept busy.

Mrs. Freeman will lecture at the East during the coming winter, in Cincinnati, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, etc. This is the first trip of the secretary to the Atlantic coast, and I hav no doubt it will be a successful one, and help to consolidate our forces for future work. I hope that every Liberal society in the East will secure the services of Mrs. Freeman. Steiner will also come, and Remsburg is leading the way. Let there be a grand rally all around for the advance of the Liberal cause.

Some gain has been made. The leaven of reform has already appeared in the meeting of the Milwaukee Protestant ministers. Nearly all of them declared they were in favor of the state taxing all church property.

This is a sign of the times,

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

For Reason and Liberty.

The intent of Christianity, as avowed by the leading exponents of that doctrin, is to save the "immortal soul," and this, also, is the purport of the scriptures. If, then, there is no "immortal soul," Christianity and the Bible are without an object, are intent upon the accomplishment of no definit purpose, and, consequently, hav no right to claim the slightest consideration.

The jejune and unedifying homilies of the holy fathers, and others of their ilk, are replete with long and elaborate accounts of the most approved devices for securing the soul's salvation, but in no instance do they giv (and, indeed, they rarely attempt it) an intelligible and reasonable definition of the chief end and object of their solicitude.

A commonly accepted theory is that the soul is the "mind, the understanding, the intellectual principle." The statement that the mind is immortal merits the most emphatic denial.

The existence of the mind depends upon the existence of the brain, and the strength of the former is marked by the healthy development of the latter. This is a fact too well authenticated to admit of doubt, having been fully demonstrated by recent experiments. When a portion of the brain is injured, a faculty of the mind is also injured; and when a portion of the brain is removed, a corresponding faculty of the mind is removed. Now, when it is so removed, is it not the hight of absurdity to suppose that the missing faculty has winged its flight to some far-off region of ecstatic bliss, there to sing in glory among the "angels," throughout eternity, while the remainder of the mind is left to a lone existence upon this dreary world below, patiently awaiting the "calling of the master?" The question implies the answer. And would it not be equally absurd to suppose that, when the entire brain is deprived of life, the mind will emigrate to a brighter world than this?

Let us imagin a man of brilliant intellect. Grant that his intellect is his soul and is immortal. He becomes a lunatic, a raving maniac. He loses every vestige of reason, and the most learned scientist is unable to discover the faintest trace of intellect, where it once reigned supreme. Manifestly, it is gone. Whither has it gone? "To heaven," sturdily answers the churchman. Soon the lunatic is restored to health; reason returns, and his intellect is with him once more. Are souls allowed a free pass to hell, heaven, or purgatory, and return, while the body is yet upon earth? It may be true, but I dare say my Christian friends will not allege it to be in conformity with the teachings of the scriptures.

A second theory is that "the soul is the conscience, the better part of man's nature, which lives forever." A more pueril and unstable idea could scarcely be conceived. It may suffice for children and monks, but bearded men require something that savors, at least, of ordinary intelligence. It is impossible to draw a distinction between the conscience and the mind, save that the former is a faculty of the latter.

Like other mental faculties, conscience is susceptible of education and development. Neglected, as in the rude intellect of the barbarian, it grovels in the dust, and is a stranger to the higher qualifications of that of the cultured man; cultivated, it is brought nearer to the ideal of perfection. The mind conceives original ideas and grasps others not its own. It is this reasoning power which discriminates between right and wrong. What is conscience but the internal judgment of right and wrong? Man is not by nature indued with a knowledge of the rectitude or injustice of his actions. If he is so indued, why does it not become apparent before he has received any intellectual training? The fact is, he must learn right and wrong. Virtue is a study. Where totally lacking, this faculty has been supplied by proper mental cultivation. Vice, not virtue, is inherent in the human character. Bad traits may be eliminated from the character and good ones ingrafted in their stead. No man shuns vice instinctivly, but does it at the dictation of his better judgment, which is the result of training. An aversion to wrong and a love of right may be created, and undoubtedly are created, by man within himself, just as he may acquire a knowledge of mathematics, history, etc. Some Christians claim that this faculty is created by God, but by God it will take them a long time to comprehend the difference between right and wrong, unless they place some dependence upon their own intellectual exertions.

The conscience has no existence distinct from the mind, and if the mind is not immortal, it certainly cannot be said that the conscience is so.

A third class, whose saint-like credulity greatly exceeds their reasoning capacity, affirm that the "immortal soul" is the life. No one has ever been able to satisfactorily demonstrate wherein the fundamental principle of life in man differs from the life of other animals. All animal life is essentially the same, differing only in minor particulars. If the simple element of life is the soul, it is indeed difficult to conjecture how one animal can enjoy the possession of a soul, to the exclusion of all others. Will some shaven sage of the cloister favor us with an explanation? If a mammal of the genus homo has an immortal soul, why may not a mammal of the genus troglodytes be accorded a like attribute? The underlying principle of life is essentially the same in the one as in the other; their digestiv, respiratory, and reproductiv organs are resemblant in all respects, and there is a striking similarity in all the features of their anatomy. It is obviously inconsistent to say that animal life constitutes the soul, and in the next breath say that there is only one animal which has a soul. If, in the premises, they had taken the position that all animals hav souls, their theory might, possibly, hav been tenable; but as it is, it can hav no foundation in reason or in fact.

Still another class maintain that the soul is "that imperceptible, inconceivable, incomprehensible part of man, given him by the breath of God" They admit that they cannot describe it, know nothing of it, and are unable to conceive of its remotest attribute. If they know absolutely nothing of it, and cannot understand anything at all about it, having no evidence of it (save the insinuations of a few incoherent and unreliable Jewish documents), what right, I ask, hav they to assert its existence? In answer to this it is urged that there are many things which we do not understand, yet recognize their existence; electricity, for example. The problem, "What is electricity?" is yet unsolved. But, unlike the soul, we hav unmistakable evidences of its existence. We see the electric spark, feel its shock, and know its power. No such thing can be said of the soul, of whose existence we hav no proof, save the idle conjectures of fancy and a superstitious veneration of a few ancient writings the authenticity of which has always been questioned.

When a man dies, he remains dead a long, long time. Perhaps he may liv again, but having no reasons for believing this we are justified in doubting it. Observation teaches us that all men who liv will die; but we are not prepared to say that dead men will liv again. Deaths are common, but resurrections are few—yes, very few, and far between. What the future will be no man can tell. How foolish it is, then, for man to persecute his fellows for not believing things of which all are ignorant. Every sect frantically endeavors to compel the soul to be saved in its own particular manner, when, in fact, it is a matter of very grave doubt whether or not there is a soul to save. It rather seems to me that the better plan would be to alleviate the sufferings and ameliorate the condition of the present, physical man, and cease this howling warfare of sects and creeds, "all about an elephant which none of them hav seen." Theological disputations hav generally ended in chains and slavery to the vanquished.

Let the rights of men be vindicated. The intellect has too long been held in thralldom. Why longer bow in abject servility to a superstition which has retarded civilization and drenched the earth with human blood? It must not, it shall not be. Right and reason will be our gods, and Liberty our creed.

Putnam, 234 South Water street, Chicago.

One-half of the human race cannot progress alone. In the effort to do so it has thrown itself into a tangle that has filled its madhouses, its hospitals and its homes, alas! with dwarfed, half-developed human pawns who are the legitimate fruit of the conditions under which they are born and under which they develop.—Helen H. Gardener, in Truth Seeker Annual for 1895.

"Book of Books" as a Missionary.

SKOWHEGAN, ME., Nov. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Your book of books, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," has come into our house, and we think it shows great success on Putnam's part as a searcher for historic facts.

I hav already sent it on its missionary tours, and expect it to make better converts than the evangelical missionaries.

DR. F. S. BIGELOW.

Freethought Shall Rule the World.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., Nov. 12, 294.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished the perusal of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I think it is the best book I hav ever read. It shines like the sun in every corner, and givs the most eloquent epitome of universal human history. It proves that it is Freethought, and not the gods or devils, which rule the world. Honor to its author, and all prosperity.

With best wishes, yours ever,

VICTOR LAINE.

Doesn't Want to Wait So Long.

JACKSON, TENN., Nov. 14, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: What has old man Calder done that he does not get any paper this week? I would rather go without breakfast any day in the week than miss my TRUTH SEEKER. If you issue the paper on Thursday, it takes a hell of a long time to come to Jackson. I scarcely ever get it before Tuesday. Inclosed you will find a dime, for which you will please forward as soon as you can one copy of your paper for November 10th. As soon as the pay car comes this month I will send you a small order.

JOHN A. CALDER.

More Than Satisfactory.

NEWPORT, O., Nov. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know that the three copies of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ordered by me were all received in good shape, and are more than satisfactory.

I think Heston's "A Thanksgiving Reminder," in your paper of November 24th, should be tacked up in every public office and other public place in this country. It ought to be enlarged to life size and adorn every pulpit and every church door in this country on the 29th of this month.

Hard Times, but the Paper "Gets There."

OMAHA, NEB., Nov. 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I think I will be able to raise a subscriber in Council Bluffs. Inclosed please find fifty cents for three months, and send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Mr. Russell.

I am doing all I can to get subscribers for the best and most fearless Freethought publication I hav ever read. All complain of hard times, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is "getting there" "all the same."

With best wishes, I am truly yours.

JOHN MCARDLE.

Lights the Pathway of Life.

EAST JORDAN, MICH., Nov. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I must hav your paper, and you will find inclosed $1.50 to apply on same. Your splendid paper is the only ray of light that ever reaches here; there never has been a Freethought speech here. I think if we could hav one it would do much good. I went to the Methodist Episcopal church last night, and the pulpit-pounder told us that Infidelity had never cast one ray of light on the dark shadow of death. He may be right, but it does throw lots of light on the road we are traveling.

W. R. STEWART.

Willing to Pay Their Way.

TAMPA, FLA., Nov. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for renewal and one new subscriber. I said I would get a subscriber before I sent again for your paper. I hav received Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is a great book, and is well worth twice its price. I am well satisfied with the book. Tampa is growing up into a city very rapidly, and with it all creeds seem to flourish, even to the Seventh-Day Adventist. They hav had a campmeeting here, and gained a good many members from other churches, and it seems they hav settled right here to stay. They hav built a church, and say they will pay taxes on it, as all churches should do. That is honest. We are having very fine weather, plenty to do, and lots of money. It makes us quite happy.

C. W. WELLS.

From a Red-Hot Republican.

KENT, O., Nov. 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: From THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th I learn that "Illinois, Wisconsin, New Jersey, New York, Missouri, and Delaware hav gone into the Republican Camp." To that half truth why did you not add West Virginia, Indiana, Kansas, Colorado, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, which the Democrats conceded lost to them. Did you wish to let them down easy? Even the Memphis Appeal says that nothing is left to Democracy but Mississippi and heaven, and might hav added hell and Texas or "perfidy and dishonor." Yours for the whole truth,

M. H. HEIGHTON.

Has Interested a Minister.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Oct. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for four months' subscription to your paper. I shall say and do what little I can while I liv to make mankind truly free. An old minister of this place has become interested in the principles of Freethought and would like to get some ancient history, one that treats of events as far back as can be reached. I referred him to several. But you may be able to suggest something in this line that would be of great benefit to him; some ancient history treating on ancient worship, the origin of all religions. I gave him a great deal of information on that point, and while he seems to hav great confidence in me, he would like to read it himself. I had some such books, but I loaned them, and some were never returned.

Who Will Giv Him Work?

NEW YORK, Nov. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You will permit me, a stranger, to trouble you by a few lines.

I should like to ask you if you could giv me any advice how to get some work, or if you know somebody that wants help, no matter what kind of work it may be, if I am able to do it. I am a cabinet maker by trade; came from Winona, Minn., about two years ago to New York. I belonged with the Freethinkers there and took the Freidenker from Milwaukee for six years. I could not since get a steady place in these dull times. I am here, and my means are all gone. I cannot call on any religious society for work. I hav much confidence in you that you will giv me advice how to get work, to earn a little to support my wife and family. I am not very well posted in this language; you will excuse that, but I hope you will understand what I mean to say.

An Error of Date Corrected.

CLINTON, IA., Nov. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In the little item in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, on the transit of Mercury, you let a little error creep in. It took place on the 10th, not the 11th, and although I had made calculation for over two years to see it, I got left. The day here was cloudy, the sun not appearing at all. I felt greatly disappointed, as I had invited the members of the schools to come to my observatory, and the time of the day was so remarkably favorable, from 10 A.M. till half-past 3 P.M., five and one half hours. The next transit will take place Nov. 14, 1907. The one after on Nov. 7, 1914. The third on May 7, 1924. They occur at intervals of thirteen, seven, ten, three, ten, and three years, and always in May or November. The last was on May 9, 1891. The May transit shows the planet going angling downwards. The November transit goes angling upwards, and always from left to right.

The Chief Pillar of the Church.

CHRYSTOVAL, ARIZ., Nov. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I think the following extract from Chevalier des Mousseaux, "Mœurs et Pratiques des Demons," will answer your correspondent, Wm. L. Marsh, as to questions 4 and 7. It must be remembered that this is the voice of the Roman church:

The devil is the chief pillar of faith. He is one of the grand personages whose life is closely allied with that of the church; and without his speech which issued out so triumphantly from the mouth of the serpent, his medium, the fall of man could not have taken place. Thus, if it was not for him, the savior, the crucified, the redeemer, would be but the most ridiculous of supernumeries and the cross an insult to good sense.

When reason and common sense shall succeed in making an end of the Devil (with a big D) the battle with ignorance, superstition, and bigotry will be more than half won. According to the above extract the Devil is a more important personage to the church than even God himself. "He is the chief pillar of faith," therefore God is a second-rate figurehead. With a proper understanding of law and matter, the only two elements of which man absolutely knows anything, both the Devil and God will be eliminated from human consideration.

Likes to Be Scalped Occasionally.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., Nov. 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Iowa never got it where the chicken got the ax until this summer. In this part of Iowa our hay, corn, potato, and buckwheat crops were almost entire failures. Small fruit was also cooked before ripening. You may think it wonderful that in the face of all this I am possessed of even a dollar. The Lord chasteneth those he loveth, and in giving his darlings the devil he has overlooked me, so in consequence I can come to the center. Inclosed is $2 to chalk me ahead on subscription and fifty cents for our Bob's "The Holy Bible," also "Church Property" and "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle." It may be that all of us do not take kindly to all George E. Macdonald says, but we hanker after it; so please do not let the cranks head him off. If every Infidel's views were identical with mine on all subjects, I should hav no use for any publications of that kind. Hoping that George will continue to rattle our dry bones in his own original way, and that in doing so he will neither pity, spare, nor hav mercy, I am,

Yours sincerely, MEL. PIERCE.

Money of Freethinkers Wasted on Preachers.

BODIE, CAL., Nov. 15, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find inclosed $5.75, for Ingersoll's "Holy Bible," "Shakspere," and "Lincoln," "Is Suicide a Sin?" and for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Our mining camp has been relieved for the last five months of the company of a Methodist expounder of the so-called holy writ. All who hav represented the Methodist Episcopal church in this section heretofore hav come among us poor and needy, as the prodigal son is represented to hav been, and at the expiration of their allotted time they hav gone with plenty of the filthy lucre, their families well clothed and provided with all the necessaries of life, these donations coming from the hands of a liberal-minded, Freethinking community. Eighty per cent are of that persuasion.

A holy father keeps his residence in our midst, but he will not assist a lost soul on the road to the everlasting. All souls are lost that do not belong to his church. Therefore some one has to perform the last sad rites at the grave of the departed, or let them be placed in the earth unnoticed and uncared for even by sympathetic human brotherhood. Five human beings hav crossed the dark river of death during this vacancy in the Methodist Episcopal church, and I hav been called upon to officiate in the closing scenes, which efforts hav given satisfaction to the living, and I am quite sure to the dead, for they hav been consigned to that nature from whence they sprang. No objections hav reached my ears even from church members of any persuasion, although many Catholics and some Protestants were in attendance. Three of these funerals were conducted from the Methodist Episcopal church.

Conduciv to Welfare in This World.

COWICHAN LAKE, B. C., Oct. 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote you some time ago to stop my copy of the paper (my letter probably miscarried), it seeming to be too expensiv for these times. However, I'm better satisfied now that it came, because there is much in it that seems (in my opinion) to be more conduciv to a person's welfare in this world as well as the next than the ofttimes devoid of common-sense, meaningless drivel of the supposed sky-pilots. Then, again, there's Putnam's new book with its splendid collection of portraits, biography, etc. There ought to be within its covers a vast field of interest and study for the student of human nature. There are many people mentioned whose pictures I shall be glad to see.

There is a splendid sermon given in the issue of October 13. I read it only about twenty times with increased relish every succeeding time. The passages from which the text is taken used to prove quite entertaining to me in days gone by, when I used to be supposed (false supposition) to be preparing for a residence in the clouds; but this last expatiation by the gifted and eloquent —— ——, his captivating way of handling the sacred subject leaves an impression that will last for some time.

I am much interested in Ingersoll's writings; will remit you this coming year for several books.

My opinion is that you do a lot of good.

CHARLES A. BAYLOR.

A Witless Evangelist.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Nov. 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: John de Witt, the "commercial traveler and drummer-evangelist," haranged the Young Men's Christian Association last Sunday. He said that as he was buying a paper from a stand in New York his grip, containing all his clothing and toilet articles, was stolen from the table where he had set it down by his side, and he had to buy a collar and borrow a comb to make himself presentable. But he was glad, as he hoped that the Bible in his bag would convert some one. He cautioned zealous Christians not to tackle Infidels and Atheists without being thoroughly prepared by reading the "word of God" and getting filled with the Holy Ghost; "for," said he, "they are hard to manage, and if you pitch into an Atheist when you are not thus armed he has the best of the argument and will make you sit down on the ice so suddenly you will see more stars than appear from an observatory; at least if you hav the curiosity to try it, don't do it in a crowd, for it is the Atheist's delight to humiliate you and he will do it every time. I am armed with the word of God, and with that I once met the great Infidel orator, Bob Ingersoll, and floored him, as has been published in the papers all over the country, and in thousands of H. L. Hastings's anti-Infidel tracts. It was on the station platform at Cleveland, O." With beating heart he offered the bold pagan a tract entitled, "Twelve Things Which Won't Win Salvation." Ingersoll read the title ard thrust it back, saying:

"I don't want heaven."

"No," said the drummer-evangelist, "it don't say heaven, but salvation."

Ingersoll took it again, and read:

"First, a lovely character will not win salvation."

"What!" said he, "if a lovely character won't win salvation, I don't want it. I would rather go to hell."

"But," continued the drummer-evangelist, "I soon put him in a hole, for I kept up conversation, and mentioning Dixon, whom Mr. Ingersoll had sued for saying something about him which he did not like, he flew into a passion and marched up and down the platform, the maddest man I ever met. 'There,' said I, 'you hav proved by your own manner that you are not entitled to salvation by your own test.'"

The next point attempted by this Davidic slinger of gospel slang (for nearly every second word was from the jargon of the slums, and scarcely a grammatical sentence occurred in his whole talk) was the inability of Infidels to back up their assertions and to quote scripture correctly. Said he, "I once offered an unbeliever fifty dollars to show a real self-contradiction in the Bible, and the money lay safe in my pocket, for it could not be produced. Again I offered ten dollars if he would quote one verse correctly and tell me what verse and chapter it was. This smashed him. It is impossible to quote and specify scripture correctly without the aid of the Holy Ghost."

I ached to quote Matt. vii, 1: "Judge not that ye be not judged, for by that judgment ye judge ye shall be judged," but opportunity was not given for remarks, and I did not wish to gét into a muss with those who were not worth the breath to blow away a fly. Elder Farman, Seventh-Day Adventist, I heard preach in Lowell a week before, and he said that there were many men who could quote scripture from beginning to end and half way back again who would not be saved because they had not the Holy Ghost in them. Who, I ask, shall be a guide to salvation when gospel gushers thus disagree? Certainly I shall not choose for my sky-pilot a traveler so witless as to lose his own grip from under his elbow. JOHN P. GUILD.

To Whose Advantage is Protection?

HOWICK, QUE., Nov. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Since the question of free trade has been in discussion I hav many a time grabbed my pen to take exception to the arguments advanced in favor of protection and as often hav I flung it back into the rack and relapsed into silence, thinking that protection writers able to use as good language as they do can hardly be supposed to be wanting the necessary intelligence to comprehend the problem; hence I concluded that the defect is in their will or in my own intellect. If my understanding is correct, "protection" is their creed and protection they must hav, right or wrong. Of late years I hav discovered that there are political bigots and fanatics as well as religious ones. I know some who believe in protection only because it is a plank of the Republican platform and the question whether it is right or wrong is to them too sacred to be entered upon. They can no more consider it than a good Christian will consider the blasphemous question: "Is there a God?" Like all defenders of bad causes, the protectionists hav a good flow of language, but in all their letters they exhaust their ability in threats and promises and when they get to the (supposed to be) argumentativ portion of the letter their mental power has dwindled to nothing.

To me the case seems so clear that I wonder at anyone outside of an insane asylum, not a producer of the protected goods, being a protectionist, when I realize the fact that I am not incarcerated in one of those institutions of safety.

When a citizen of the United States buys anything in a foreign country he, or the party of whom he buys it, must pay a tax on the same. This enables the home producer to demand that much more of a price for the same kind of goods. Is not this already an injustice, no matter who pays the duty on the foreign goods? Does not the home producer realize a profit at the expense of the buyer?

Then how anyone can make out that the whole amount of duties paid at the boundary line comes out of the foreigner who sold the goods is beyond my comprehension; but we will suppose that he does, and what difference does it make? Are the United States completely surrounded by fools too stupid to make the same rule work both ways? Or will the coming protectionist make the stupid foreigner pay the duty both ways? If he cannot do that, as you export about as much as you import, the one must balance the other. That does away with the possibility of a general benefit to the country. Then the duties collected on the boundary line do no material good to anyone except by giving good positions to the collectors on both sides of the line. Mr. Peck has shown that the amount collected does not much more than meet the expense of collecting. Then if any class of citizens is benefited by protection, it must be at the expense of another class of citizens of the same country. I am not surprised to find the producers of protected goods in favor of protection, but it beats me to find laborers upholding it. The cunning producer attributes all the good that exists to protection. "Compare your wages with European wages," he says. To this Mr. Groh gives a good answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 27th. Still I may add to it that the difference in the wages is not great when the price paid for the necessaries of life is considered. Besides this, Europe is over-populated and the people are yet obeying the orders of their clergy —to produce as large families as possible. The result is a large number of them must emigrate, not in search of higher wages, but to find employment. "High wages caused by protection" seems to me quite ridiculous. In substance, the employer says: "Pay me a high price for my goods and I will pay you high wages." How in the name of common sense the laborer can expect that the employer will giv him back more than he received from him in the first place is a puzzle to me. I do not even expect him to return it all. We hav shown that protection brings no profits from outside. Like the saloon-keeper and his wife taking turn about as "tender" and "customer," the bottles must eventually be emptied, leaving no money in the till.

Wages are regulated by the supply and demand, and as there is no duty on laborers, when immigration fails to supply, the manufacturer goes after it. Some years ago I went on a visit to Fall River. I was there a week and I noticed that every morning, after the factories had their full supplies there was a large number of laborers left at the door and the city had opened public soup houses to prevent the unemployed from starving. When I returned home, to my great surprise I found agents of the factories hiring people and paying their fare to Fall River.

If a Freethinker is so situated that protection is to his benefit I would not blame him for enjoying it as long as it lasts, but it seems to me it ill becomes an honest man, intelligent enough to be a Freethinker, to advocate such a miserable cause.

This is only one of many injustices that exist and it is no wonder when we consider that law-making has always been in the hands of the rich. One by one they must all go as the laborer becomes intelligent. But the process is very slow. The greatest trouble is, not to put down the leaders, but to wean the oxen from cherishing their yoke. CHARLES LAPERCHE.

Unconscious Cerebration.

SAGINAW, MICH., Nov. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Unconscious cerebration, discussed by Dr. Maudsley and others, has imparted to it an interest—I might say a constantly increasing interest—so much so that this question is often suggested: What special phenomena are included in what is called unconscious cerebration. The phenomena to which this question refers are doubtless the work of the mental and sensorial apparatus which fails to reach consciousness at the time the work is being done or accomplished. It seems as though the field of unconscious cerebration is quite unimportant in early life; this, at any rate, is a reasonable presumption. Sensorial reports and consciousness in early life are so closely allied that when one stops the other does likewise. That is to say, they act in such ready coördinated responsivness that consciousness seldom fails to grasp all sensorial reports and this renders unconscious cerebration doubtful, and makes plausible the conjecture that unconscious cerebration mostly comes in the life of man when his mental organic processes are so highly stimulated that consciousness fails to hold its own and hence fails to cognize what is passing. It is in a state of rest and nutrition. The mental and sensorial apparatus is furnishing material for unconscious cerebration, and hence it is reasonable to assume that the brain grants place to unconscious cerebration which is in excess of place granted to conscious cerebration. The field of unconscious cerebration is relativly increasing over that of conscious cerebration as a consequence of the greater complexity in experience which forces greater mental and sensorial work. Much of our every-day life in the complexity of our experience is done through unconscious cerebration. Consciousness often plays but a small part amid the material surrounding it. Many performances take place in the sensorial and mental field without attending consciousness and are done as well as if watched by consciousness. The organic process of thought, through which thought comes, has but little to do with consciousness. Dr. Maudsley says: "The formation of an idea is an organic process that takes place by imperceptible degrees beyond the range of consciousness itself. · · · In like manner the catenation of a group or series of ideas is an organic process of which consciousness has no knowledge." Herein we hav the key to a large class of phehomena and herein lies the ability to play off on the multitude many delusions. Millions of registrations hav taken place upon the brain tissues to which consciousness was not aroused. And herein lies the reason that it comes to pass under certain brain stimulations that these unconscious registrations float into consciousness and consciousness is called upon to recognize strangers who demand attention. Sometimes only a face, in the terms of speech or song. Faces seen, words are spoken, and in many other forms visitors appear, all of whom were registered in or through unconscious cerebration. These numerous visitors hav taken consciousness by surprise, and here comes an explanation—to many the only one: These are ghostly visitors having taken quiet possession of consciousness. But then we remember that these visitors to whom we hav referred hav found their way into consciousness in the way we hav suggested through unconscious cerebration and hav won recognition through brain stimulation. This brain stimulation has conditions such as usually lie outside of the normal. Hence it is reasonable to assume that all cannot hav these peculiar experiences. These impressiv experiences can come to only a certain class in whom specialized molecular arrangements exist. Really, almost the entire field of delusion may find its data in unconscious cerebration. Doubtless many a ghostly visitant will lose his reputation when seen in the light of unconscious cerebration. But those thus possessed will hardly see the force of this reasoning. People who hav these experiences are doubtless honest and sincere. I hav endeavored to show only a reasonable method in the light of which an explanation of the phenomena which we hav considered may be rendered. I do not deny or controvert the fact that these experiences may demand another method than the one which I hav suggested. I confess that there are scientists who admit the theory of unconscious cerebration, such as I maintain, but do not consider it competent to account for this special ghostly experience. I would suggest that it sometimes comes to pass that prearranged opinions necessarily come of an accidental arrangement, molecular arrangement or adjustment to see and sense things outside of the normal state of the organic process through which the furniture of consciousness is to be considered.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Gods of Superstition and Gods of Reason.

NEW YORK, Nov. 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The only god I can conceive of is the "Infinity of Time." It had no beginning; it will never hav end; just as is asserted of the "Christian" God, it develops the seed into the tree and the embryo into the child; just as is claimed for the "Christian" God. It produced and produces and will ever produce itself. It is all over the universe at the same time, and always present in every nook and area. Just as is averred of the "Christian" God. It cannot be interfered with or annihilated; but it cannot hav moods or revenge, worshipers or priests, neither can it hav sons or produce an "immaculate" conception. It cannot produce or alleviate pain, nor eradicate carbuncles. It wants no priests or prayers. It is infinity. It is no human invention.

It has transformed the mighty elements of force and matter into the universe; it has molded planets and stars in its almighty crucible, and lastly, and least of all, it has changed the surface of the world. Time works evolution, and evolution does the work attributed by Christians to "God." Now what necessity or possibility is there of a "personal" God? The elements of matter which compose every bone in every body and every drop of blood in every animal system, must hav always existed and will ever exist in a much different form. The elements of force which are expressed by our movements must ever hav existed, but also in a different form; for there is not one iota more force and matter in the universe now than there was at the time which I will designate by minus infinity, and plus infinity will possess not one iota more than minus infinity, but it will exist in a far different shape and form, owing to transformation and evolution, the workings of time and nature hand in hand.

The ignorant world to-day thinks that immense rainfall is a gain to the world. They do not know that there is not one drop more or less water now than there was a million million years ago. The sun borrows but always givs back, the medium being the fleecy cloud. So we see that from the infinit bulk of force and matter which existed in minus infinity time through evolution has wrought the universe and this tiny world so perfect in its mechanism; the five ages of man were but infinitly small stepping-stones in this almighty transformation. When time and evolution formulated the present universe, the sun received an immense percentage of force and matter; it radiated and will radiate this force and matter, and through its beams impart power and life to its attending planets, and even to a very small degree to the stars. It will radiate, but not to infinity, for it will die out in time and gradually, just as all the fiery planets did, but the force and matter which it once had will hav been radiated into space and imparted to the planets, and as space is infinit, not one iota will hav been lost. Such is the economy of nature. A steam engin is propelled by steam; steam is derived from fire, fire from coal, coal from nature, which has saved it through ages, and we use it; but coal is the power of the sun concentrated, and to release that power combustion is essential. We may also obtain the color as it was imparted millions of years ago (not, as the Bible says, 6,565 years). Thus again we see the economy of nature. She has saved all the power which seemed useless and is perpetually saving; every motion of a man's arm is not force or power lost, but, producing miniature whirlwinds, effects the whole universe forever in an infinitly small degree. The food we eat is never wasted, but produces an exact proportion of tissue and muscle. When we die our bodies are not wasted, for they mingle with the soil and stimulate vegetation indirectly forever. So we see not one infinitesimal part of force and matter is wasted in this grand system, and time alone unites changes with the original force and matter. The world, so long as history has chronicled its happenings, has never been troubled by the whims of a personal God, but time has ever been omnipotent. The conception of a personal God is an unnatural one and does not accord with infinity. There is no room in this matter-of-fact, cause-and-effect, lack-of-miracle universe for personal gods, invented seemingly to extract offering and moneys from trusting mortals, to support a corrupt priesthood and encourage preposterous superstitions. But if the cancer of superstition and the poison of bigotry hav made such inroads on human reason, why, then, worship "God," but do not support priests and ministers, liars and hypocrits, as middlemen, for if possibly, or rather impossibly, there is such a thing as a personal God, who heeds your prayers, he would surely rather hear them direct from your hearts than through the hypocritical mumblings of paid sorcerers and indolent sycophants. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Spider's Oration.

Come, children, who fancy we spiders are fools.
And view the lace houses we build without tools.
I'm just about finishing one at the lattice.
Come quick, and I'll operate for you, all gratis.
And where do you think are my shutttle and loom?
You see no machinery here in the room,
No silk thread nor cotton, and yet you all see
This wonderful fabric is woven by me.

It's all in my little round abdomen here,
No steam apparatus to burst, never fear!
It's hard to explain to you just how I do it.
Look sharp, and perhaps your bright eyes will see through it.
The costume Cinderella wore at her first ball
Was wrought by an ancestor, robe, veil, and all.
With hues of the rainbow the fabric was blended.
She captured the prince, but you know how it ended.

What would a fine lady not giv to possess
A spider-web drapery o'er a silk dress!
The weaver, if human, would win a great name,
While artisan spiders no merit may claim
For the unobtrusiv and skillful and wise,
We try to relieve you of troublesome flies.
We're hunted and scouted with duster and broom,
And all our fine tapestry swept from the room.

When questions, "What spiders were made for?" arise,
Some wiseacre answers, "They're made to catch flies!"
"And what were flies made for?" he answers again,
"To feed hungry spiders. I'm sure this is plain."
Now this is chop logic, or reason in rings.
Observe how I amputate this beetle's wings.
There! done like an M.D., with minus a tool,
Now, hav I not proved you the spider's no fool?

I've shown him a weaver the best in the nation,
An architect planning his own habitation,
A maker of traps to catch fishes with wings,
A surgeon accomplishing wonderful things,
A skilled decorator of mansion and c t,
A plain, honest worker content with his lot.
And last, you'll admit, little children—I know it,
I've proved him an orator, scholar, and poet.

The Inquirendo Club.

VIII.

"Do you see these colors?" asked Professor Morse, at the next meeting, holding up to view a small piece of anthracite coal, and upon the members answering in the affirmativ, he continued: "Well, these are known to scientists as chemical compounds. Can you tell me what they really are?"

"Imprisoned sunlight," answered Ernestine, promptly.

Her uncle turned toward her with smiling eyes. "Very true, Miss Ernestine. But can you tell me why it is imprisoned?"

"Probably not so well as you could," returned Ernestine. "But I think it is owing to revolutions in the formation of the crust of the earth."

"Yes," said her uncle; "very good. But these colors are also compounds of bodies which are perfectly colorless! It is the combining with acids which renders their coloring power evident. To illustrate: Take a colorless liquid and pour a little over white blotting paper. Then warm the blotting paper over a lamp, and the color becomes apparent. This is because the base of the colored compound does not possess any color whatever, and it is only when this base is, by drying, converted into a salt that the color appears. Again, take a colorless solution called rosaniline, which you hav only to heat to convert into a salt, and a beautiful bright-red color is seen. A very small quantity of this placed on a piece of white paper will in a minute or so turn the colorless paper into a bright crimson. This, then, is the singular property of these colors.

"Take a piece of anthracite coal, a substance consisting almost exclusivly of carbon, and we can, by resorting to coal tar, extract beautiful white substances. For instance, the white crystalline body called carbolic acid, so largely used for disinfecting purposes; this beautiful white crystalline substance, naphthaline, also benzole, all come from this dirty-looking substance called tar.

"I dare say it sounds incredible to you that such pure white substances can be obained from black coal, but we can easily test its merit by a simple little experiment with a substance well known to all—sugar. Take a little white sugar and dissolve it in an equal amount of hot water. Then pour in some strong sulphuric acid, and the sugar will be converted into charcoal." The Professor tried the experiment for the edification of his young auditors, who were intensely interested, and the grown people also.

"You know," he continued, "that carbon is everywhere in nature. Now, observe this little experiment with turpentine. I pour a little of the colorless liquid on this bit of paper, and then plunge it into this cylinder of chlorine gas, when the carbon in the turpentine will become visible." And true to his assertion, they saw a cloud of black vapor instantly ascend.

"And so I might go on all the evening, proving to you how important a part acids play in chemical constituents to produce colors. Probably you all know what madder roots are. They are imported from foreign countries in large quantities for the sake of the beautiful and valuable dye that can be got from them. And thus the natural question arises, what is it in the madder which givs it these peculiar beautiful colors? It is a red, crystalline substance lately discovered by Dr. Schunck, of Manchester, who gave it the name of alizarine as the coloring principle. And Dr. Schunck showed that it is to this alizarine that is to be ascribed the power which madder possesses of producing these distinct and beautiful tints, which we know are either madder pinks or madder purples, as well as the brighter color which we all know as turkey red.

"It was very desirable for the chemists to be able to produce these madder colors from coal oil, instead of relying upon the importation of the plants, for in this country we prefer the less brilliant colors of the madder to those of the aniline. So two young German chemists, Messrs. Graebe and Liebermann, set to work to perform this chemical synthesis, succeeding at length, after important experiments, the nature of which I cannot take time to explain. But this is the first case of a coloring matter contained in a plant having been artificially made. The beautiful colors derived from crude aniline do not exist in nature; they are altogether new."

"What is aniline?" asked Ralph.

"A heavy, colorless liquid," answered his father, "which can, however, produce the most beautiful colors. By adding a drop or two of aniline to a globe full of water, and mixing in some hypochloride of sodium, you would presently see the color of the water changed to a splendid violet, containing the well-known color mauve, which was discovered by Mr. Perkins in 1856. Many colors can be got from it, but as these compounds all come originally from this little lump of coal, you will, perhaps, hav some idea of what chemical analysis can do.

"I hav not by any means exhausted the the subject of coal colors, though I hav my allotted time, and some day in the future we will renew the subject."

The Professor glanced at his watch, but was detained a few moments from departing by a poem written upon the subject by Ernestine.

THE STORY IN THE COALS.

The winter wind blew wildly,
Twilight descended chill,
Like robes of fleecy whiteness
Gleamed the snow in the window-sill.

Within by the glowing fire-light
A wistful, childish form
Crouched, listening in the shadow
To the ravings of the storm;

Watching the coals a-burning,
As if those childish eyes
Could see some wondrous story
As the gas-blue flames arise.

And the brilliant coals burn warmly
In the broad old fire-place,
As it dances and gleams athwart
The dreamy little face.

What tale are the coals imparting
To the child a-listening there?
Does it breathe phantasms wondrous
In its healthful, ruddy glare?

And why does that face so childish
Grow dark in the gloom of night—
Grow luminous in the shadow
With a sudden wondering light?

Because it lacked just a few moments of their appointed time for adjournment.

THE EVOLUTION OF WOMEN: An Inquiry Into the Dogma of Her Inferiority to Man. By Eliza Burt Gamble. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Cloth, 12mo., 356 pp. Price, $1.50.

Part I. of Mrs. Gamble's book is devoted to "the Theory of Evolution," and embraces Development of the Organism, the Origin of Sexual Differences, the Female Superior to the Male, the Development of the Social Instincts and the Moral Sense, the Supremacy of the Male. Part II. describes "Prehistoric Society," and embraces the Method of Investigation, the Relation of the Sexes Among Early Mankind, the Gens—Status of Woman under Gentile Institutions, the Origin of Marriage, Bachofen's Theory to Account for the Early Supremacy of Women, Wife-Capture—Mr. McLennan's Theory, Wife-Capture—the Theory of Sir John Lubbock. In Part III. "Early Historic Society" is described, the description embracing Early Historic Society, Development of the Gens, Women in Early Historic Times, Ancient Sparta, Athenian Women, Roman Law, and the Stoic Philosophy.

In her preface the author says that after a careful study of written history she became convinced that the female organization is in no way inferior to that of the male. A subsequent collocation of the facts established by naturalists "relativ to the development of mankind from lower orders of life," and a careful reading of Darwin's "Descent of Man" led her (in 1886) to entertain the belief "that the theory of evolution, as enunciated by scientists, furnished much evidence going to show that the female among all the orders of life, man included, represents a higher stage of development than the male." This belief is amplified and defended in the volume before us. It is held that "the history of life on the earth presents an unbroken chain of evidence going to prove the importance of the female," while the persistence of the contrary doctrine is explained by the fact that in the ages when physical force ruled the world the idea of male superiority became firmly grounded, and during the following ages of "metaphysical speculation and theological dogmatism," and in the total lack of "exact knowledge concerning the subject," the male of the human species, meeting no opposition to his claim that he was "an infinitly superior creature," continued to so regard and vaunt himself. It was, "and to a certain extent still is, sufficient for the theologian and metaphysician that God made man first." This attitude of the theologian does not greatly surprise the author, but she discovers, as she says, that the most advanced scientific men are not able to wholly rid themselvs of the inherited prejudices of the past ages of faith and darkness, and so it is rare to find a discussion of the sex question in which those prejudices cannot be traced.

With many other thoughtful observers, the writer of this book holds that "no fact is more patent, at the present time, than that sex constitutes the underlying principle throughout nature." She also points out that in the human family, as among all other animals in which there has been a separation of sex, there "has been established a division of labor," and "the consequent specialization of organs, and the differentiation of parts, form the true line of demarcation in the march of the two diverging columns" of sex.

The earliest forms of life were androgynous—that is, the two elements necessary for reproduction were confined within one and the same individual. Later, a division of labor arose, the two functions became detached, and the reproductiv processes were thereafter carried on "only through the commingling of elements prepared by or developed within two separate and distinct individuals." Scientists hold that the greater differentiation, or specialization of parts, denotes higher organization, and consequently the division of labor by which the germ is prepared by one individual and the sperm by another, "constitutes an important step in the line of progress." Audubon, Darwin, and other naturalists show that among the forms of unisexual life below man the female selects her partner, and this has resulted in the greater adornment of the male and the development in him of many secondary sexual characters. Mrs. Gamble reaches the conclusion that the differentiation of sex must hav necessarily resulted in making the female more complex in organization than the male, and therefore superior to him, she having developed special organs for the ante-natal and post-natal sustenance and defense of her offspring. She quotes Professor Brooks as saying that, "among animals and plants, as well as in mankind, a favorable environment causes an excess of female births and an unfavorable environment an excess of male births. It is claimed that in cities and well-to-do towns there is an excess of female births and in the country and among the poor more boys are born, and also immediately following epidemics, wars, and famins. It is likewise claimed on scientific authority that there are more reversions to lower types among males than among females. The fact of the presence in males throughout the vetebrate kingdom of rudiments of the organs of reproduction properly belonging to females is regarded as another evidence of the fact that some "remote progenitor of this kingdom must hav been hermaphrodite, or androgynous, especially as it has been ascertained that at a very early embryonic period both sexes possess true male and female glands."

Our author displays a little too much feeling for a true student of science, and is too ready to asperse the motivs of Mr. Darwin and other scientific observers. She is mistaken when she attributes all the suffering of woman in parturition and subsequently to the "unchecked disruptiv forces developed in man." The sedentary habits of the modern woman, her confinement to indoor occupations, where she is shut out from fresh air and has not the exercise that is necessary, together with the poor quality of her food and its tendency to congest the system, are responsible for the larger part of the sufferings she undergoes as the mother of the race. Savage women escape very much of this suffering, and yet they are the slaves of husbands, and subject to their "disruptiv forces" to an almost immeasurably greater extent than are the classes of women in civilized society who are the most pitiable victims of their special functions.

Under the "matriarchate" the husband became a member of the family of the wife, and whén the existing system came into vogue—where the wife leaves her home to follow the husband—woman absolutely lost her independence, as the matter is viewed by Mrs. Gamble. The origin of the present system she attributes to the capture of females by other tribes, within the pale of which, as "aliens and dependents, they were shorn of their power and influence." McLennan thinks that it was the institution of property that caused the institution of kinship through females to die out. Sir J. Lubbock holds that "the origin of marriage was independent of all sacred and social conditions," and that it was "founded not on the rights of the woman, but of the man," and that on woman's part there was not even a pretense of consent. Mrs. Gamble asserts that civilization has been possible only because of the checks interposed by woman against the "animal nature of the male." But she claims, and with good reason, that in the lower forms of vertebrate life the female always has the right of veto of the advances of the male, while in the human family she long ago lost that right. How, then, is it to be explained that the lower races hav not profited by the restraining influence which it is asserted is the cause of human civilization? The trouble is that Mrs. Gamble is tempted to generalize too broadly on too narrow a basis of fact. It would be nearer the truth to say that civilization has advanced in spite of the modern supremacy of the male and that, having through the operation of other causes, largely, reached a certain stage of development, woman is now gradually asserting in practice her right to self-ownership. If at a very much earlier stage of civilization woman had complete control of her person, it would seem that she lost that control through influences chiefly extraneous to sex relations, per se, and this view is confirmed by the fact that she is slowly regaining that control through similar extra-sexual influences. The liability to fall a victim to any system of prostitution diminishes in the direct ratio of the acquirement of the means of independent livelihood. When every laborer has been admitted to be "worthy of his [or her] hire," then woman's economic dependence on man will cease and with it will go her enforced submission to his wishes.

F. D. Cummings, who asserts that he has studied the Bible assiduously for years, has given the reading public the results of his study in a book entitled "Religion and the Bible," published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. An idea of what readers will find in the book may be gleaned from this declaration by the author in the introductory chapter: "When I commenced, I believed the Bible to be true from Genesis to Revelation. The story of the creation, fall, redemption, miraculous birth, miracle, Jonah and the whale—all were true. And then I commenced to think—and then I read and thought a good deal more; and little by little, one by one, the myths of old hav vanished and their place is filled by the ideas I try to present to you in this book." Mr. Cummings does not go quite as far as Robert Ingsrsoll in his plucking of the Bible; he has saved some religion from the wreck.—Evening Wisconsin.

Theological, Not Grammatical.

BYRON, ILL., Nov. 21, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I beg to take issue with Mr. George Macdonald as to the "good grammar" of capitalizing "god," I contending that it is pre-eminently a theological rule instituted by the church to exalt a myth into a personal deity. That it is not a proper name like Jupiter or Jehovah you will find by referring to Webster, amongst whose scripture proper names you will not find the word "god." This should settle that question beyond further controversy and prove my assertion that it is not only ungrammatical to capitalize "god," but also an exclusivly ecclesiastical rule which it is inconsistent for Materialists to indorse by adopting it.

I presume it is only force of habit or of getting into the orthodox rut through educational influences which induces many Freethinkers to persist therein, but if they would giv the matter serious consideration they would see the incongruity of falling in line with the dictates of the church which they hav entirely repudiated. For the same reason that Christianity spells "god" with a capital g we should write "Nature" with a large N, i.e., because we acknowledge it as the primary source of all existences. This does not involve deification, since we do not prostrate ourselvs before it as the Christian does before his mythical god, the main point being to indicate to the world at large that we also acknowledge a cause of all phenomena and to emphasize it by writing it with a capital n. The effect of this rule, if it is generally adopted by Freethinkers (and it is only a question of time when it will be) in relegating the Christian's god to the category of ancient mythology, and of raising Nature in the estimation it deserves to be held in, is incalculable and will greatly expedite our purpose of disenthralling mankind of the God superstition.

Would also correct Mr. Macdonald's assertion that Mrs. Power of the Ironclad Age permitted a jour printer to capitalize "god," the fact being that he took that responsibility without her knowledge and consent, for which she gave him the bounce the next day. HERMANN WETTSTEIN.

P. S.—If "god" is capitalized in the above and "Nature" printed with a small "n," the reader is requested not to hold Mr. Wettstein responsible for it. H. W.

A COUPLE of tourists staying at Loch Ness had a fancy, one fine Sunday, to go for a row on the Loch. They met the boatman just leaving his house, dressed in a suit of glossy black, and with an extra large Bible under his arm. "We want to go for a row," said one of the tourists. "Dae ye not know it's the Sawbath?" was the reply. "Ye'll no get a boat frae me the day; forbye, I'll hae ye to know I'm an elder of the kirk. No; I'll not let ye the boat, but I'll tell ye what I'll do for ye. Dae ye see yon green boatie doon among the rushes?" "Yes." "Weel, she's ready, with the oars inside. THE Hungarians, Poles, Italians, and other cheap laborers who come into the coal regions are regarded with great disfavor by the resident population. I was walking near the railroad with an Irish laborer returning from work one evening, when I saw one of the despised class walking on the tracks. I turned to my companion and said: "Pat, you had better run down there and make that fellow understand that he is in danger. Make him get off those tracks." "Shure, sor, he's nothin' but a Hungarian," said Pat. "But he has a soul," I retorted. Pat chuckled. "The only sowl he has is on his fut." "Well, Pat, he belongs to your church; he's probably a Romanist." "Indade, thin, the sooner he's in purgathory, the sooner he'll be out," replied Patrick.—Harper's Drawer.

THIS is the style of a country parson of the last century. After the service is read he begins: "I publish banns of marriage between Cornelius Hale, bachelor, and Tamzin Craddock, spinster, both of this parish. If any of you know cause or just impediment why these two simpletons should not be joined together in wedlock, ye are to declare it. This is the second time of asking, and I hope, before the third, seeing that Tamzin is in my own service, and well off, and Cornelius can't keep himself sober, let alone a wife, they'll hav got into a more reasonable state of mind. There'll be no sermon to-day, because I had to sit up all night with my cow that is sick, and I can't afford to lose her these hard times. But it doesn't matter, for I've not seen one bit of improvement in the parish (especially among the farmers) since my last; and as that did not bring them to their senses, I don't know what will."—London Freethinker.

THINKERS agree that the law of the survival of the fittest works to exterminate all thieves, especially chicken thieves. But if we hav understood Rev. A. A King, of the Hackensack neighborhood, correctly, it is only through the operation of the Higher Law that the millennium will come. We refer, of course, to what Mr. King has said when in his official capacity he has urged us to offer our chickens freely to those who are hungry enough to try to steal them, and also to giv our cloaks to those who attempt to take our coats. This is what Rev. Mr. King advocates as a theorist, but in practice he has just filled with large-sized bird-shot the entire back of a person who was attempting to suspend the operations of the great law that none but the fit shall hav the chickens. In Hackensack and elsewhere theory is a sublime thing, but in practice Cromwell has taught Hackensack to trust the Higher Law only as long as the powder keeps dry.—New York World.

PARAPHRASE.

Praise God from whom all cyclones blow;
Praise him when rivers overflow;
Praise him who whirls down house and steeple,
Who sinks the ship and drowns the people.
Praise God for dreadful Johnstown flood,
For scenes of famin, plague, and blood;
Praise him who men by thousands drowned,
But saved an image safe and sound!

Praise God when tidal waves do come,
O'erwhelming stanch ships nearing home;
Praise him when fell tornadoes sweep
Their swift destruction o'er the deep.

Praise God for poor Dakota's drouth,
For fires and floods in West and South;
Praise him who sends the killing frost,
And Louisville's dread holocaust.

Praise God for sorrow, pain, and woe,
For railroad wreck, av'lanch of snow;
For parsons who, with book and bell,
Demand your cash or threaten hell.

Praise God for war, for strife and pain,
For earthquake shock, for tyrant's reign.
Praise him for rack and stake; and then
Let all men cry aloud, Amen!

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

Gems of Thought.

THE loving worm, within its clod,
Were diviner than a loveless God
Amid his worlds. —Robert Browning.

AN enlightened bad man often makes a better citizen than a narrow-minded, well-meaning one.—Grant Allen.

ALL reformers are handicapped by temporizers who study results they cannot foresee, and forget principles which never fail.—William Lloyd Garrison,

THE realization of moral good no more means obedience to imposed laws than the realization of the beautiful in a work of art means the carrying out of certain rules. —Ernest Renan.

I DESIRE to emphasize the fact that the extent to which the lawless restraint of personal liberty may go is less important than the public sentiment which tolerates any invasion whatever.—T. M. Cooley.

WHAT is science? To see the absurdity of the prejudice against it, we need only remark that science is simply a higher development of common knowledge, and that if science is repudiated, all knowledge must be repudiated along with it.—Herbert Spencer.

To the average party man the lesson of instant resignation to events is easily learned and always offered. But to the party man not of the average the party is honored only at its best, and must ever be pointed towards that ideal or fail of applause and adherence.—Horace L. Traubel.

MANIKINS swear by great names, and, from the grave, are despotically ruled by the scepters of great ghosts. For a thousand years the intellect of Europe was tied to the skirts of the ghost of Aristotle; and even yet millions in Europe are in bondage to the ghost of Moses, although Moses himself was a ghost. Phantoms ourselvs, we bow abjectly at the feet of the shadow of a shadow.—Saladin.

IN dealing with the state we ought to remember that its institutions are not aboriginal, though they existed before we were born; that they are not superior to the citizen; that every one of them was once the act of a single man; every law and usage was a man's expedient to meet a particular case; that they are all imitable, all alterable; we may make as good; we may make better.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

IF, in point of fact, supernatural rewards and punishments hav been generally in favor of morality, it is because men hav generally been moral. Our dreams are the effect, not the cause, of our qualities. At a certain stage of thought they were necessary consequences; but the stream cannot mount above its source, and the motivs which prompt to morality only lose their power by expression in terms of dreamland.—Leslie Stephen.

IT is surely strange that not one of the verities of Christian supernaturalism has been established. No chain is stronger than its weakest link. In the Christian chain every link is broken, shadowy, unreal. How many natural men hav prayed that one solid, unequivocal, supernatural link could be produced—a deity, or an "evil one," or a soul, or a heaven, or a hell? The production, beyond cavil, of even one poor ghost would be the greatest event in history.—Furneaux Jordan.

THE time is past for repression. Despotism has done its work; but the day of despotism is gone, and the only remedy is a full and fair investigation. Things will never right themselvs if they are let alone. It is idle to say peace when there is no peace; and the concealed imposthume is more dangerous than an open wound. The church authorities still refuse to look their difficulties in the face; they prescribe for mental troubles the established doses of Paley and Pearson; they refuse dangerous questions as sinful, and tread the round of commonplace in placid comfort. But it will not avail.—J. A. Froude.

A MAN journeyed to a far country, where he found the people to be much wiser than his own people. On his return home he so related. But this greatly offended his own people, who reviled him and cast stones at him. Then a second traveler went, and brought back the same report. Him they threw into prison. Then a third traveler went, who came back saying that these foreign people were greatly superior in all ways. Him they hanged. Then they chose one to go and report truly, giving him much money wherewith to travel. He pretended to go, but he abode quietly in his own house, and ate and drank. And after a time he appeared in the streets, and declared that the three travelers were all liars, and that those foreigners were as barbarians. Whereat they applauded, and gav him much honor, and made him one of their chief rulers.—Berry Benson, in Century.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

THE strike rioters at Ridgeway, Pa., who last January burned coal tipples and placed bombs under buildings, hav just been sentenced. Three were given seven years each solitary confinement at hard labor, and fined $1 each, with costs of prosecution; two the same fine and five years each, and two were fined and given sentences of three years each. The fifty or more miners who violated the injunction of Judge Maher by marching along the highway in a body were acquitted. The others, who forfeited their recognizances and left for Italy, were found guilty.

THE health authorities of Brooklyn hav ordered the surface car companies to scrub their cars every third day with a solution of bichloride of mercury, and the liquid must remain on the floor over night. Stairways and platforms of elevated roads must be scrubbed once a week with a solution of carbolic acid and then with soap and water. The cocoa mats on the floors of cars must be replaced by wooden slats or mats, which must be scrubbed with the disinfecting solution used on the floors. Floors of ferryboats must be swept every hour with the aid of damp sawdust to prevent dust from rising.

THE Trans-Mississippi Congress, recently in session in St. Louis, favored free coinage at the rate of 16 to 1 by a vote of 164 to 72. Among the other demands made were these: That the general government deepen the harbors on the Gulf coast, and at San Joaquin, Sacramento, San Pedro, Isla Creek, and Oakland, Cal.; erect fortifications and keep armed vessels on Puget Sound; enlarge the appropriations for improving rivers, and renew work for betterment of the Mississippi jetty system; government aid to the Nicaragua Canal, and interior canals connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic Ocean; greater protection to person and property in Alaska; creation of an international commission to control canals and natural waterways of an international character; the cession of arid, non-mineral public land to the several states and territories containing such, for their use in storing water for irrigation; opening for settlement the Uintah and Uncompahgre Indian Reservations in Utah; admission of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma; the cession to Oklahoma of the Indian Territory, and the abolition of tribal relations among the Indians, they to become citizens of the United States.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

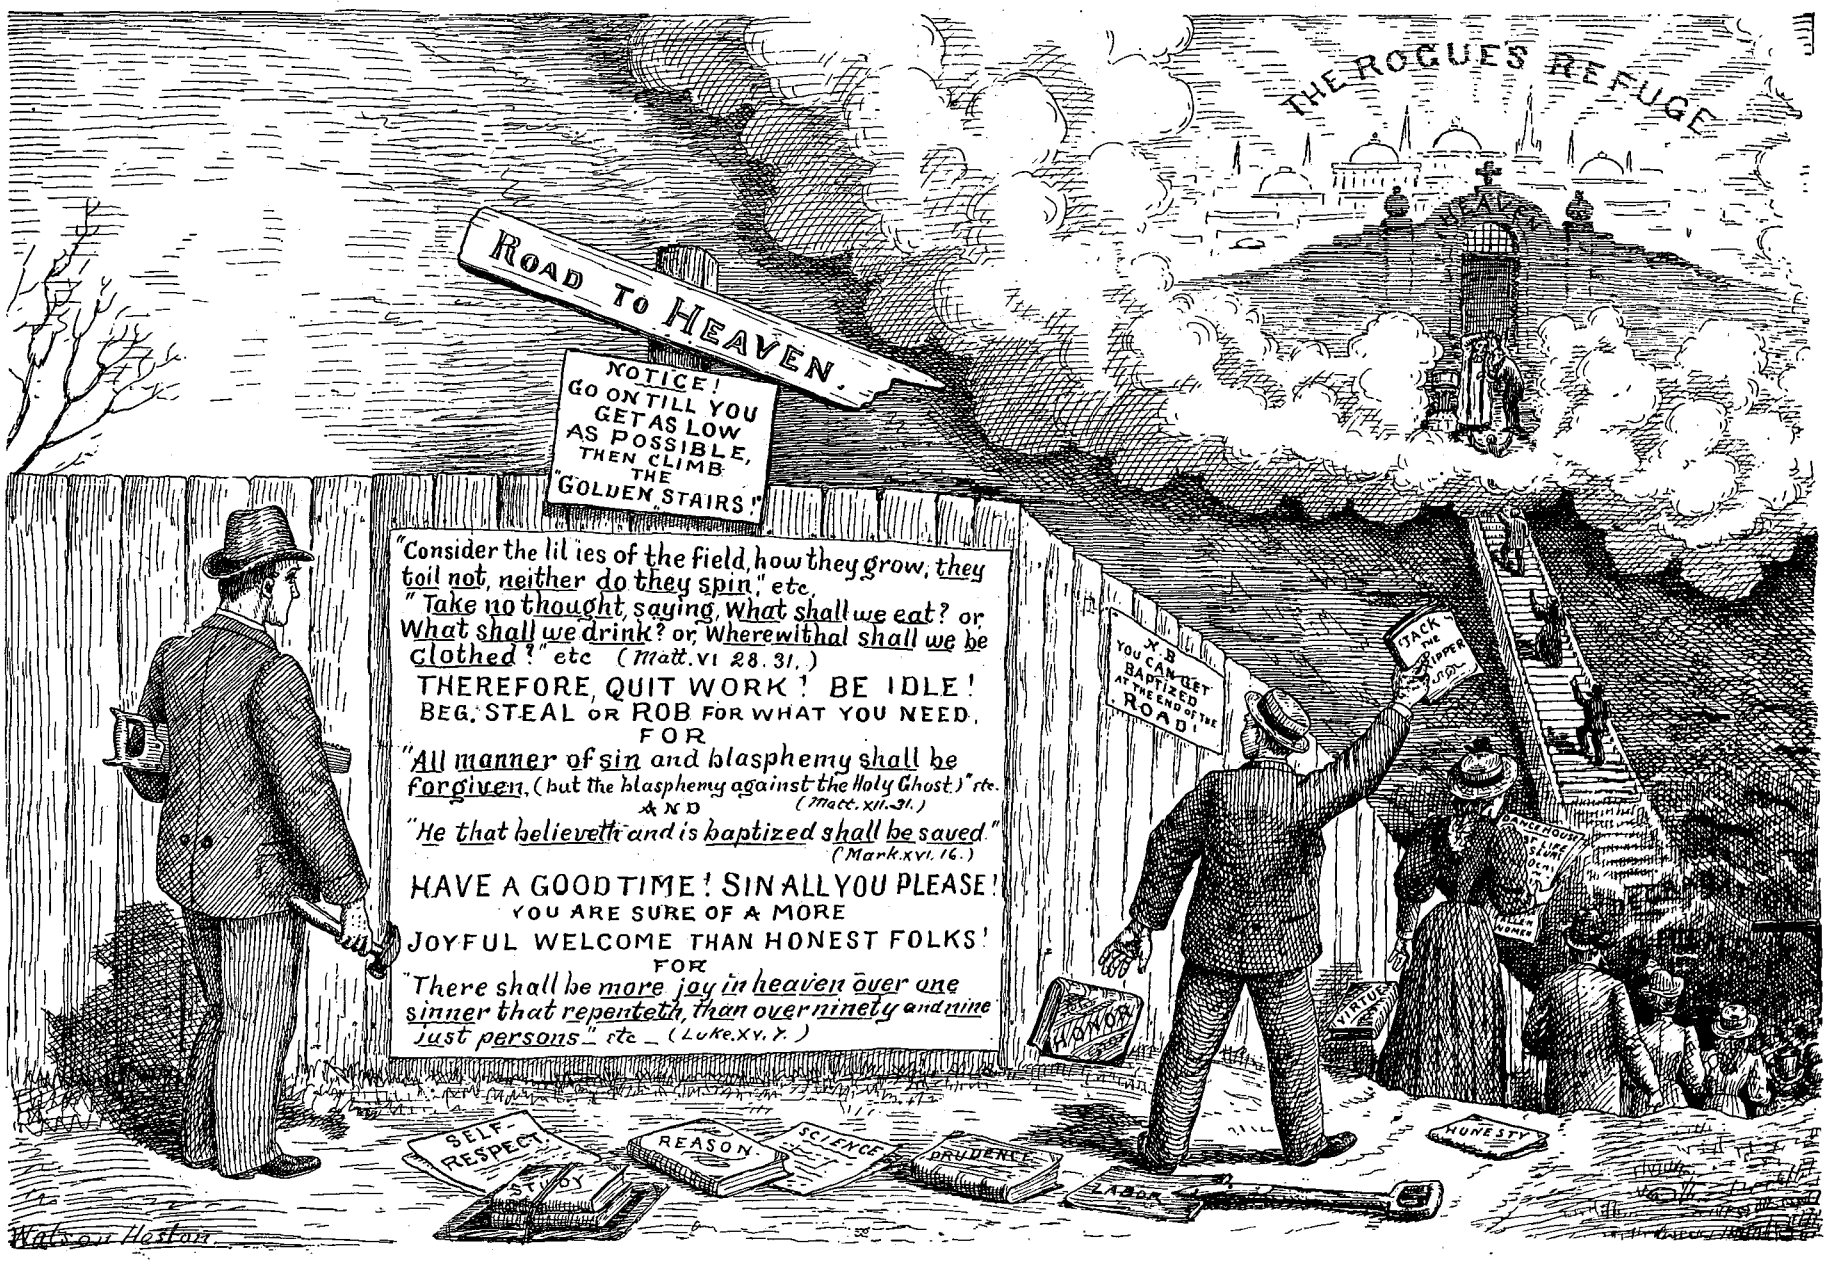
With the advent of the reading season, when the summer's work is done and the people hav time to think, we want to do a great deal of religious missionary work, and so we hav prepared this scheme, which has already received cordial indorsement:

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.



In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

400 Years of Freethought.

From Columbus to Ingersoll — By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pages, Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. Price, $5; with The Truth Seeker One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WILL CONTAIN AN ARTICLE BY

JOHN PECK:

"A QUEER GOD AND HIS QUEER BOOK."

God and the Calvinists.

Bishop Foster, of the Methodist church, has got into doctrinal trouble with the Calvinists because he said in a recent sermon that there was hope for the heathen. Here follow a few of his disturbing sentences:

"I am not hopeless. If I could conceive for a moment that the world as I know it—and I know it from rim to rim; I hav traveled in all its lands; I hav seen its desolate and despicable millions; I hav seen it in shame and filth and poverty—if I were compelled to think that my God whom I worship would by any possible method of administration send down to an eternal and hopeless eternity twelve hundred millions of my brethren who know not their right hands from their left, and save a few of us who are but a little better perhaps, in our moral fiber, I would not go to heaven if I could. I say that with consideration. I could not worship such a God as that. I would join all the hosts of hell in rebelling against such a God as that. God is love. God is trying to save men. There is not a man in the universe whom God is not trying to save, and not a man whom he will not save if he can do it under principles of moral law. No man will be lost if God can save him by any principles which he knows anything about."

When a Methodist bishop talks in that way you may be sure that the humanities are getting the better of the creeds. It is one thing to reject Calvinism, but quite another to threaten to rebel against God in a certain contingency. Yet is Bishop Foster prepared to rebel against the God who, if the creed of the Methodist church be true, has made this earth a hell for such a large proportion of the human family? Did he not create these "desolate and despicable millions," and did he not make the "shame and filth and poverty" in which they liv and die? Is there no principle that "he knows anything about" by which he can rescue them in this world? Or are there "principles of moral law" which the infinit cannot control? If that is the case—and it would appear that it is, judging by the fate of the majority of earth's children—what warrant has Bishop Foster for his hope that God will save these multitudes in some other world? In reply to the Methodist bishop the Calvinistic Christian Reformer says:

"We maintain that God is not 'trying to save'; he is actually saving. Christ came, not to try to save, but to save. Did God ever try to save any one and fail? Bishop Foster admits that all are not saved. Why are some lost? His explanation must be that God is unable to save them. The plan of salvation, in his view, is not adapted to those who are lost. They might hav been saved if only God knew of a plan that would suit their case. The bishop, in trying to maintain his theory of the goodness and love of God, sacrifices both his omnipotence and omniscience."

In brief, Bishop Foster believes that some will go to hell because God can not save them, and the Calvinist critic believes that more will go to hell because God will not save them. Logically, the Calvinist has the best of the argument. He must be right if their mutual premis is sound. According to the Calvinistic theory, God has saved all that he has tried to save, which—if orthodoxy be true—is equivalent to saying that he has not tried to save more than one out of each thousand of his creatures. He is a delightful God.

Accepts Revelation, and therefore Believes in Creation.

Continuing his criticism of the views of Colonel Ingersoll, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise observes that the Bible teaches that God created the world; that among ancient philosophers it was Plato who held that matter existed in a chaotic and formless state, and God made the world from this existent matter; that Aristotle maintained that heaven and all that is in it, everything besides the earth, existed from eternity, and that the earth was produced by the action of the heavenly bodies. Centuries afterwards came the Moorish-Spanish philosophers, Arabs and Jews, who reasoned on this problem. Among these was Moses Mamonides, who analyzed the three theories of cosmogony, "reasoning on them from the purely philosophical standpoint," and reached the conclusion "that it is not within the bounds of possibility to establish certainty in one or the other of these dogmas, and added to it: 'I, believing in revelation, believe also in creation, to which, from the philosophical standpoint, I am at least as well entitled as you are to yours.' This says that you can deny creation as little as I can the eternity of matter."

Even if it were admitted that this reasoning was valid, under the circumstances, what essential connection has it with the present contention between the supernaturalist and the naturalist? Philosophy has yielded the first place which it so long held to science, and the inductiv method has largely superseded the deductiv. Instead of fitting facts to theories, as in the old days, we now rest the superstructure of theory upon the basis of ascertained facts; to be sure, the generalizations are often too broad, often defectiv, but they are not advanced as finalities, and every true student of science well knows that they are always subject to revision when new facts are ascertained or a clearer light is thrown on old facts. But the reasoning of Mamonides was not valid, even with modern science left out of the question. It is not reasonable to make one's mere belief in the supernatural carry with it the settlement of disputed philosophical or scientific questions, or even to do no more than to claim that that belief is sufficient to balance the scales as between the contending theories. Had Mamonides said that an a priori assumption of creation was philosophically as legitimate as the theories of Plato and Aristotle, his position would hav been logically sound, reasoning deductivly, however much we might be disposed to belittle his powers of observation. This was not his position, however, if he is correctly summarized by Rabbi Wise; he did not assume, a priori, the fact of creation, but he assumed a priori the fact of revelation, and then, because he found creation asserted in the assumed revelation, he declared that his belief in creation was philosophically as valid as the belief of Plato and Aristotle in their theories. The moment he attempted to prove creation by revelation, the latter took its place in the category of disputed facts and had to be itself proved to be a fact before it could in any degree help to demonstrate the alleged miracle of creation. It is needless to say that the much-desired proof of the actuality of revelation has not yet been produced, and that consequently it in its turn has not contributed the sought-for demonstration of the creation of the cosmos by God. In fact, as all know, the most earnest and learned of Theists and special creationists hav very little to say about the Bible as a witness for their clients. They talk much about design and order and moral purpose, which they try to show are everywhere manifest in the universe, but it is clearly apparent that they no longer expect to convince reasonable men and women of the soundness of their positions by appeals to a discredited "revelation."

When Mamonides offered his belief in revelation as proof of an assumed creation, he was logically required to prove the fact of revelation instead of creation. Could he do this, the creation issue would incidentally be disposed of once for all. Three men, living on an island where there are no trees, dispute regarding them. A asserts that trees grow suspended in the air, and B asserts that they grow with their roots only in the air, while C asserts that they grow with their roots in the ground. Here we hav three assumptions which mutually conflict, and the defender of each must bring the best evidence he can find in support of his particular claim. Then if A injects the supernatural element into the dispute, producing a book said to hav been written by an infallible God which affirms that trees grow suspended in the air, it is manifest that if he is right the others can hav nothing more to say. At once the question is raised, Did God write this book? If it is found to be impossible to prove that he did, the book then takes its place among the productions of fallible men and the question is no longer, Is it divine? but, Is it true? That is to be determined by investigation. The three disputants come into the possession of other books and these deny that trees grow as the alleged God-written book asserted that they do; the men travel in foreign lands, where they find trees growing with their roots in the ground, and they reach the inevitable conclusion that the book which put forth the suspension theory was neither divine nor true. This is also the conclusion reached by unprejudiced people concerning the Hebrew and Christian scripture—that is, it is not of divine origin and it is not true so far as the creation story and other miraculous tales are concerned.

Rabbi Wise is pleased to designate as "negations" the affirmation of the scientist that nature is self-ordering and the affirmation of the scholar that the Bible is a human production, like all other books so far known to man. The supernaturalist, himself the persistent denier of the oneness of nature and the testimony of human experience that all literature has been traced to the hand of man, delights to call his opponents the apostles of negation and to accuse them of tearing down and failing to put anything in the place of that which they destroy. It has too often been shown that this an utterly valueless defense for us to use here much space in exposing its triviality. It is to be charitably presumed that Rabbi Wise did the best he could for his cause, and we must take this as the explanation of the millionth-time sowing of these "negativ" chestnuts. There is no life in them and has not been for hundreds of years. The Freethinker and the practical scientist are the affirmers. None can surpass or approach them in the readiness, nay the eagerness, with which they accept both old and new truths that hav reasonable certification. They would be as credulous and foolish as the supernaturalists if they accepted what was lacking such certification. Their attitude is the furthest possible remove from that of the mere idle denier or the denier who denies because his Bible or his church denies.

The rabbi thinks that the scientist and the critic are very rash to hav doubts regarding revelation and creation, or to deny them, when so little is known about the universe and even this earth on which we dwell. He calls to the witness stand the "historian of materialism," the physiologist, and the philosopher, who all say, and truly, that our real knowledge is very little indeed. None will more cheerfully grant this than will the scientific rationalist. But he will also say that what we do know has been gleaned in the rich fields of observation and experiment, not in the barren desert of revelation, and he will add that what we do know points unmistakably to the uniformity and sufficiency of natural processes, alike in the realms of mind and of matter, conveniently so-called. So far supernatural gods and devils hav not been proved to hav had any hand in the making of worlds or in the writing of books. Every fact classified up to date has been credited to the scientist, and every "revealed" lie debited to the supernaturalist. We do not know very much, but what we do know is uniformly unfavorable to the claims of the antinaturalists.

Mr. Wise tries to be witty at the expense of the Monists. He tells a story of an English gentleman who spent several years in hunting in Australia, and on his return was ridiculed by his acquaintances for his lack of information concerning the country at the antipodes. Thereupon he had his footman bring him the long boots which he had worn in Australia. Scraping from them the mud he found clinging there, "he microscoped it carefully, and then he wrote a geology of Australia." It is true that a work so written would not be very full or reliable, but that mud would tell much more to the careful investigator of nature than any man who had never been in Australia or who had read no better description of it could imagin. The otherworldian knows all about heaven and hell, but he has not so much as a grain of gold from the pavements of the one or a pinch of ashes from the furnaces of the other to furnish a foundation for his descriptions. He likewise can tell us all about God's intentions, but he has not a scrap of paper as big as a maple leaf bearing the sign manual of that alleged being.

Because Colonel Ingersoll criticises the Bible as one book, written by God or by his direction, Rabbi Wise accuses him of being ignorant of the fact that it is a collection of books, written by many persons, at different times. It is difficult to hav patience with such statements. As though Mr. Ingersoll did not know all this! What does Rabbi Wise mean? Does he assume that his hearers are so ignorant that they will believe that the Agnostic does not know anything about the development of the Bible? Does the rabbi suppose that he will be able to drive the Freethought lecturer from the field by throwing chaff at him? What fact is more patent to thinking people than this that the average Christian believes that the Bible is one book, clear, consistent, and received from the hand of God himself at a certain time in the past, or, rather, at certain times, the Old Testament having been given, and then, at a later date, the New to complement and fulfil it? That the Bible is a collection of books, and parts of books, written at times widely separated and by many persons of diverse and even antagonistic opinions, is precisely what the Freethinker has maintained for ages and what the "Higher Critics," so despised by Rabbi Wise, are demonstrating anew every day. It is not necessary to say to Freethinkers, although it seems to be necessary to say it to Rabbi Wise, that Colonel Ingersoll and his confrères attack the Bible on the ground selected by its friends. When Christians become frank enough to put the creeds of the churches into harmony with the position of the advanced critics, and strive to educate the masses of their adherents in the principles of Bible growth, the work of the Freethinker will be vastly different from what the churches compel it to be to-day. As we hav said before to other critics of the Freethought lecturer and writer, so long as the vast majority of Christians believe that the Bible is one book written by dictation of a perfect god, we will find it necessary to consume much of our energy in attacks that apparently put us in the attitude of assuming that such was the origin and such is the nature of that book. When we point out the absurdities of the scriptures we are not unaware of the fact that many of those absurdities are more apparent than real if the Bible is considered as a collection of writings by different human authors living in periods of time far apart and under the influence of differing civilizations. But the official view of the Bible does not recognize such an explanation as permissible or even moral, and the masses of Christians and Jews consider that it is only the Infidel who could be so foolish and depraved as to contend that the Bible can be so explained. While the revelationists giv the word of command to the armies of religion they must not be surprised or angry if the Freethinker attacks the very pretension that they sustain.

Down With Sunday Laws.

There will be found on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a petition to the legislature of New York asking for the repeal of the Sunday law of the state. We want every one of our readers in New York to cut that petition out of the paper or send to this office for separate petitions and then get every signature possible. When all the names hav been obtained that hard work can procure send these filled sheets to us and we will forward to the proper committee in Albany.

Some of the newspapers of the city are making an effort to obtain from the legislature a modification of the law in the interest of the saloons and their patrons. This does not concern us. The issue is a partial and misleading one. The fundamental iniquity of Sunday legislation is not touched by any such scheme. Let the fight be made openly and squarely on the issue of the unconstitutionality and barefaced injustice and tyranny of all Sunday laws. No enthusiasm can be aroused in behalf of a makeshift and a compromise. Strike straight at the fundamental principle underlying the infamous Sunday statutes. All these laws are in the interest of the church and were and are meant to be. They are intended to help unite church and state and they do help unite them. The ministers are their only consistent champions; with them it is a trade movement; they are trying to legislate rivals out of the field. The man who cannot see this must be blind to the most glaring everyday facts.

The Voice, the preachers, and the other defenders of privilege are much disturbed by the effort, already mentioned, for the modification of the existing law so as to permit the saloons to be open during certain hours of Sunday. The "laboring people" (how they love them!) are told that if such a step is taken it will only be a short time before everything will be open on Sunday and the "laborer" will find himself compelled to work seven days in the week; his day of "rest" will be gone. All this is buncomb. Are all men compelled to work at night because a certain large number do so? Will all hav to work seven days in the week because, in order to giv those who do not work a chance to enjoy their holiday, a certain percentage of the people work on that day? Has it been found necessary to make work and recreation on the Fourth of July and other secular holidays misdemeanors or felonies in order that the masses of the people may then rest and enjoy themselvs? Not at all, and no one would hav thought of saying that such steps would be necessary as regards Sunday had it not been for the priests, with whom the movement for Sunday legislation originated. Under a rational system only those will work on any holiday whose services experience shows to be necessary for the proper use of the day by the bulk of the population. Sunday has become the weekly day of rest for the masses, and the repeal of all legislation which punishes work done on that day will not make it a day of general labor. Those who serve their fellows during that time can rest on some other day. Drive fanaticism out of our legislativ halls and there will be no difficulty in securing for all the leisure they want. That the cry of "a rest day for labor" is insincere is demonstrated by the fact that the clergy and their lay coadjutors are just as bitterly opposed to Sunday recreation as they are to Sunday labor. Do you not remember how they fought against the opening of the Metropolitan Museum on Sunday? And in Pittsburg they are just as uncompromisingly opposed to the public parks being open on that day. If the bigots who are at the bottom of the Sabbath observance movement could hav their way they would close Central and Bronx parks on Sunday, stop every horse and electric and cable car in the city and state, and keep the people shut up in their houses all day on Sunday unless they went to church, and to drive them there is the object of the day worshipers. Repeal every Sunday law.

The historian Bancroft says that "Infidelity gains the victory when it wrestles with hypocrisy or with superstition, but never when its antagonist is reason." This is readily explained. Infidelity does not wrestle with reason; Infidelity is on the best of terms with reason; hypocrisy and superstition are its natural foes; this accounts for its uniform triumphs when contending with Christianity.

George Macdonald says his story of the "One-horned Ox" in THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895 will run its circulation up to a million, beyond a doubt. That being so, our readers should order their copies early, as we shall print only a few thousand. Price, 25 cents. And speaking of the ANNUAL, it may be well to say that we hav got the best collection of contributions for its pages that we hav ever had, and that is saying a very great deal. The articles cover the field of Freethought, and each is a gem in itself.

We learn from the religious Outlook that Mr. Johnston, the British Commissioner for Central Africa, "looks for the salvation of that region, not so much from any political or religious domination by white colonies, as by the introduction of farmers and traders from India. The experiment has already been tried of settling Banyans on the Shiré River, and it has been encouraging." Somehow, religion does not seem to be very much of a success anywhere as a civilizing agency—at least, not the Christian religion; Mohammedanism appears to be somewhat better.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones hav had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends hav never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We hav tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you hav induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

We hav sold over a thousand copies of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture about the Bible within the last few weeks, several hundred copies of his Letters on Suicide, filled accumulated orders for his lectures on Lincoln and Shakspere to the number of several hundred more, and still the people want them just a little faster. All of which shows that the Colonel is about the best read man in the United States, for what we hav sold is but a drop in the bucket compared with the sales at his lectures. Five hundred to a thousand are disposed of each time he speaks. Mr. Farrell expects that over a hundred thousand copies of the lecture on the Bible will be circulated this winter.

Now it is Senator Hoar who tells something out of school, and it is the Outlook which helps giv currency to the heretical observation. The Senator says:

"In studying the cause which gave Boston its influence at the beginning of this century, I became satisfied long ago that the influence was chiefly due to the fact of the existence at Boston and at Cambridge of great public libraries."

Education is a mighty force, and it will be the redemption of our race, to the full extent that it can ever be redeemed. In spite of itself, Christianity is involved in the great forward movement begun when movable alphabetic types were invented.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we hav to get behind with others. We hav no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to giv others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we hav said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

As stated in our News Column, revelations very unpleasant for Trinity Church Corporation hav recently been made. The Sanitary department of the Board of Health began an investigation on Dec. 10 that will be continued until all the Corporation's 148 tenements hav been thoroughly examined. Fifty-two of these tenements are leased to various persons who sublet them to the tenants and collect the rents. In regard to these Trinity makes the excuse that the leases prevent it from making repairs or building new structures. Ninety-six are owned and rented directly by Trinity. The great majority of these are old, tumble-down affairs, many wholly unfit for human habitation. Trinity asserts that these were inherited from former règimes, and that it has torn down and rebuilt as rapidly as the means at its command would permit. In the report in the Tribune of the testimony before the Tenement House Commission will be found some statement of facts that are very damaging to Trinity, although Colonel Cruger, comptroller of the corporation, claims in an interview published in the World, that if his version of the facts given to the Commission had been printed there would hav been no ground for the present discussion. Dr. Cyrus Edson of the Board of Health said that the corporation had fought the Board of Health in the courts on the issue of having running water on each floor and had been released from that obligation. Of course neither Colonel Cruger nor any other official of Trinity would for a moment consent to liv in a house where there was not running water easily accessible on every floor. But it is different in the case of "God's poor."

It is very clear why Archbishop Corrigan forbade Father Ducey to longer attend the sessions of the Lexow Committee. The latter is not disposed to support the machine with which the former is on such friendly terms, and it had come to be understood that Father Ducey's presence at the Lexow hearings might be taken by the machine to mean the secret sympathy of Corrigan with the independent priest's very apparent interest in the anti-machine reform movement. This would not do, and so there came the orders to Ducey to absent himself thereafter from the committee rooms. There does not seem at this writing to hav been any reason for the implied charge that Ducey was meddling, as a priest, in political affairs. This has been the habit of the wolf. According to the fable, the lamb was accused of roiling the water in the stream from which the wolf was drinking, although the poor lamb was down the stream from his lupine lordship.

In its issue of December 6th, the Christian Advocate outlines its work for 1895. Regarding the public schools, it says that it will defend them against all attacks, whether those attacks take the form of demands for the introduction as teachers of nuns and priests wearing the uniform of their orders, or for the division of public funds among the denominations, or, while the schools are maintained in general, to allow the Catholics to hav a share of the public money, pro rata, for their parochial schools. This is all right so far as it goes, but the Advocate is so careless as not to say a word regarding its attitude toward the the use of the Bible and the saying of prayers and singing of hymns in the public schools. Is it going to champion or antagonize these? A little farther down in the same column we are told that when the Christian Advocate is "in doubt it will maintain silence." We infer that it is in doubt regarding the propriety of the teaching of Christian and Protestant dogmas in the common schools. We hope that this is so, for it is said that "doubt is the beginning of wisdom."

Evidently they are unsophisticated in Vermont. A woman in that state writes to Kate Field's Washington that she wants to receive into her house several little girls to educate with her own. After describing the proposed system of instruction and giving her terms, she innocently adds: "My references are unquestionable, as I am a life-long resident of this city and a church member!" If she had only been prudent enough to leave off those last four words she would hav been all right, but when she says she is a church member she at once becomes an object of suspicion, for the business public and a good many other people hav learned to keep clear of the man or woman who makes a display of his or her religion. A religious profession has come to be regarded as very often a mask for rascality. So many embezzling bank presidents, cashiers, and bookkeepers hav been zealous workers in the church that prudent employers are not anxious to take that kind of business men into their service. The Vermont teacher has made a mistake.

The champions of Christianity never tire of boasting that that religion has civilized the world as no other has done, and yet it is notorious that among the devotees of no other great religion hav the humanities been less cultivated. When the Bible told man that he was to hav dominion over all the beasts of the field and the birds of the air, he took it for a perpetual license to torture and slaughter, just as the Christians of the middle ages took the command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." In what Christian land could a traveler find such a condition of affairs as a writer in Arthur's Home Magazine describes in two paragraphs which we condense below?

Birds are very tame in Egypt. They enter houses and hop about in perfect fearlessness. A sparrow was seen perched on the corner of a table during a crowded hotel repast, and it is not uncommon to see them flitting across the ceilings of drawing-rooms at Luxor. All birds, from the largest to the smallest, go unmolested, unless they are definitly useful for food. Owls, kites, and crows sit in peace on the roofs of Cairo, or in the palm-trees in the gardens. What security would any of these hav in our Christian "sporting lands"? Even song birds are defenseless before the gun-muzzles of our ministers of the meek and lowly Jesus.

A book reviewer in one of the leading dailies, speaking of a work written by a distinguished Bible critic, referred to the critic as "one of the most eminent living exponents of Christian rationalism in Germany," and said of his position:

"It is doubtful if he admits the supernatural at all; he declares miracles impossible, and the resurrection of Jesus Christ a delusion. The idea that the Bible is a heaven-descended revelation from God cannot, he feels, be seriously maintained. · · · Nevertheless, the spirit that characterizes these volumes is essentially religious and devout."

The Christian Advocate givs the reviewer a deserved castigation. It observes truly that there can be "no such thing as 'Christian rationalism,' in the sense of utterly excluding the supernatural," and says that the man who denies the inspiration of the Bible "is a rationalist pure and simple." As for an author who repudiates the inspiration of the Bible, the occurrence of miracles, and the resurrection of Jesus, it is misleading and foolish to say that his spirit is "essentially religious and devout," "in the sense that either of those words is applied to believers in the supernatural, though he may stand awestruck before the mystery of the universe." We can heartily agree for once with Dr. Buckley; there are hundreds of writers like this reviewer; they try to be like St. Paul, "all things to all men," with the result that they confuse everything they touch. They are either too stupid or too cowardly to tell their readers just what they mean or what those of whom they write mean. They use old words in senses which deceive and probably are oftentimes intended to deceive.

The legislativ season is here. Congress is already at work, and some of the state legislatures are also in session. Soon all will be, and this is the opportunity for the political Christians. During the next six months these meddlers will be more activ than ever before. We want each of our readers to constitute him- or herself a committee of one to keep watch of the enemies of the secular state. Report to us immediately every movement of the theocrats. Look out for new Sunday laws and attempts to more rigorously enforce old ones; watch for appropriations to the church and to institutions under the control of the church; gather all the facts that you can in relation to the exemption of church property from taxation; be vigilant in regard to religious teaching in the schools; note what is said and done about the employment and payment of chaplains; do not fail to keep informed and to inform us as to the attacks which the anti-naturalists are sure to make on the agencies of expression and transmission. Do not assume that the Editor will find out all about these things through the daily papers; there are hundreds of those journals, and there are only seven days in the week; something of vital importance to our cause may escape his eye and yours may catch it in the nick of time; it will be better for him to hav his attention called to it repeatedly than not to see it at all. So send along the items. In this connection we will request all the members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps and all others who will now engage to write one letter each week to the target selected by the Captain to send us their names and addresses, not for publication, but that we may know how many there are, and so be better enabled to direct their activities. Let us make the coming year memorable in the annals of Secularism.

The Sermon on the Mount.

II.

Mat. v, 22: But I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of judgment.

Put in this way this saying is a mere self-evident platitude. Any uninspired person knows that to show anger, resentment, or any similar feeling, "without a cause," is childish, and Jesus uttered only a platitude in saying so.

In the revised version of the New Testament, however, the words "without a cause" are omitted. Dr. Roberts, a member of the committee that prepared the Revised Version, says, in his "Companion to the Revised Version of the New Testament" (p. 48):

The evidence from manuscripts, versions, and fathers, is here not quite conclusiv, but the internal evidence is clear. It is obvious that a strong temptation presented itself to transcribers to insert the words, in order to soften the apparent harshness of the precept, whereas, had they existed in the primitiv text, it is scarcely possible to account for their being dropped. There is little, if any, doubt, therefore, that they ought to disappear.

I fail to see that there is any "internal evidence" in the precept, but in the above quotation from Dr. Roberts there is "internal evidence" that this last alteration was made because there was an external desire to do so. He admits that the evidence from manuscripts, versions, and fathers is inconclusiv, and one may fairly retort upon the revisers by paraphrasing Dr. Roberts, and saying: "It is obvious that a strong temptation presented itself to the revisers to soften the evident platitude of which Jesus was guilty, and so they dropped the words out merely because they desired to." This is a very forcible example of how the difficulty of knowing anything about what Jesus really said and did has arisen. There has never been any genuin desire on the part of Christians to keep the records of Jesus authentic. All they hav been anxious about has been to get the text into such a shape as to support each of the transcribers' pet doctrins and dogmas and his theories of what Jesus ought to hav said and done for that purpose. Jesus lived in an extremely ignorant age; we know that he made some terrible mistakes in his assertions; his horizon was very limited, and his knowledge probably very limited too. Unquestionably he said and did foolish things, and the endeavor of his followers in all ages has been to conceal these facts and make it appear that he was divinely perfect. His character and life hav become problematical and illusory in consequence. The New Testament revisers, in this instance, hav put themselvs on a level with the unscrupulous Christian historian Eusebius, to whom Christians are indebted for so much false Christian history. As Gibbon says ("History of Christianity"), "Eusebius indirectly confesses that he has related whatever might redound to the glory, and has suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace, of religion." Eusebius headed the thirty-second chapter of his "Evangelical Preparation" with the scandalous proposition: "How it may be lawful and fitting to use falsehood as a medicin and for the benefit of those who want to be deceived" (Gibbon, "Vindication"). Evidently the spirit of Eusebius still survives.

However, it will be seen that the revisers had not improved matters by making the statement read thus: "Whosoever is angry with his brother shall be in danger of judgment." There are kinds and degrees of anger; some are bad and should "render one in danger of judgment;" but there are kinds of anger that are righteous and called for; times when it is proper and is demanded. Gross injustice and many other extreme facts render anger not only righteous but necessary. Among other things, I think we may fairly say that we are entitled to be righteously angry with unscrupulous Bible revisers who read their own ideas into a text when admittedly "the evidence is not quite conclusiv," and with historians who maintain "how it may be lawful and fitting to use falsehood as a medicin and for the benefit of those who want to be deceived." Jesus was fond of venting his anger, in a full tide, against those he called "hypocrits," and there is no greater hypocrit than he who plays fast and loose, or falsely, with what he pretends to hold sacred. And, by-the-bye, there were scribes among those Jesus called "hypocrits."

Jesus continues (Mat. v, 22), "And whosoever shall call his brother 'Raca,' shall be in danger of the council." The New Version says "Raca" is an expression of contempt, and the Old Version says it means "vain fellow." Obviously, there is no divine or human wisdom to detain us here. Jesus then adds, "But whosoever shall say, 'Thou fool,' shall be in danger of hell fire." (N. V., "hell of fire.") Then why does Jesus do so himself? His constant practice with those who do not at once accept his teachings, on his authority, is to belie his own maxims and to fly into fits of anger and ill temper, to call them names, to use the harshest expressions of contempt, and last of all to call them fools.

O generation of vipers (Mat. xii, 34).
Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers (Mat. xxiii, 33).
Ye hypocrits (constantly).
Ye fools (Luke xi, 40); (N. V., Ye foolish ones).
Ye fools and blind (Mat. xxiii, 17).

Well might we retort on Jesus his own saying (Mat. xii, 36, 37).

I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall giv account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.

Mat. v, 27, 28: Ye hav heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery. But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

First, I wish to point out the extreme indelicacy and atrocious bad state of the unnecessary intrusion by Jesus of the words "with her" in this text. Then, as regards the maxim itself, as it stands, if it really conveyed the meaning that Jesus meant, if he meant to condemn lust, the teaching is sound and honorable. But there is the fact to be faced, that nobody has ever supposed for a moment that he meant what he said. It has always been understood that in using the word lust he really meant desire; if so, and I see no reason for doubting it, the case is entirely altered.

The orthodox religious idea has always been that any conscious relation between the sexes, however it had to be unwittingly permitted now, was sinful, the desire sinful and a curse, and that it was one of the curses imposed on man as a result of his sin and fall in the Garden of Eden. St. Augustine, in the fourteenth chapter of his "City of God," and elsewhere, writes vehemently upon the subject and from the orthodox point of view. I cannot quote any of the crazy, unnatural and preposterous saintly indecency that Augustine writes on the subject, but, put in its mildest form, his statement is that in the Garden of Eden the relationship was one in which there was no consciousness or sensation, no emotion physical or mental. That was the dreamy ideal from which man fell through the sin of eating an apple, and the punishment for sin was desire, therefore desire was wickedness. That has been the basis, though not always admitted, of religious teaching from Jesus onward even to our own time. Its consequences hav filled the world with untold misery and despair. No more monstrous and unnatural doctrin was ever taught. Human reason and experience teach us that hunger and thirst are desire, imperativ and not to be denied, for food and drink, and that unless the desire is reasonably satisfied the individual, and through the individual the race, would perish. Human reason teaches us that excess in food and drink is low and bestial and to be condemned. But human reason can see and appreciate the difference between the reasonable satisfying of the desire for food and drink and the voracious excess of gormandizing, if the divine delirium cannot see it. So it is with the relation of the sexes; if the same desire did not exist, the relationship would never exist, would never be fulfilled, and the race must inevitably die out. Human reason can see and appreciate the difference between natural desire and unnatural lust, if divine delirium cannot. Jesus has but one word for the two.

Whilst we are on this subject, let us read in the same connection what Jesus says in Mat. xix, 11, 12, "All men cannot receive this saying, save they to whom it is given. For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb; and there are some eunuchs which were made eunuchs of men, and there be eunuchs which hav made themselvs eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it."

Enigmatically expressed as this passage is, it is impossible for any one who thinks for a moment to be ignorant as to what Jesus meant; impossible not to understand that he was here also speaking of himself, for one. Jesus, in the passage in the Sermon on the Mount, is denouncing what he regards as sin, and in this last passage he speaks of what he regards as the best and only safeguard against that sin, which precaution he implies that he had himself taken, and leaves it to be understood that whoever is able to follow his example, let him do so. If he was to be crucified at all, why, in heaven's name, wasn't he crucified before he had given utterance to so monstrous and wicked a precept?

The same fearful idea of putting oneself beyond the possibility of sin and temptation by mutliation is enforced in the Sermon on the Mount in these words: "If thy right eye offend thee [New Version, 'causeth thee to stumble'], pluck it out, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell" (Mat. v, 29, 30).

It is perfectly idle to say, as some do, that the language in which these commands are expressed is figurativ, not meant to be taken literally. If, as you say, Jesus attained the highest possible limit of human wisdom, then he is doubly criminal in having expressed his ideas in words that convey commands to do what he did not intend should be done. As wise old Confucius said, hundreds of years before Jesus, "Without knowing the force of words, it is impossible to know men" (p. 11). "In language it is simply required that it convey the meaning" (p. 88). If Jesus used words that did not convey his meaning, how can we know him and his ideas? Why do you say that he preached a perfect morality if you do not know what he meant?

Is it any wonder that a man so cut off from human nature and feeling, as to utter such precepts, should also say: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters; yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple"? (Luke xiv, 26.) The most alarming feature about these utterances is that the religious spirit is at all times so given to morbid and fanatical extremes that teachings like these might be mixed up and associated with the finest pearls of human thought and these vile and debasing thoughts will be the very ones that will be pitched upon to form the basis of action instead of milder and more humane ones. Bear these horrible utterances in mind, and then run over the social history of mankind since Jesus' time, and will you wonder that among its most prominent features you will find vast communities of men and women shutting themselvs up in monasteries to liv lives of painful and morbid asceticism and inhuman severity, to be followed, afterwards, in the same places, by similar hordes of men and women going to the other extreme under the same mask of severity, but in reality leading lives of fearful license? Will you wonder that when men hav so placed themselvs outside of human nature, torrents of blood flowed, ignorance and bestiality of every kind abounded, that vice and crime followed in the wake of the Christianity founded on the teachings of Jesus?

Put all these scattered passages together, as we hav done, and any one must be convinced that Jesus did say exactly what he meant, no more, no less. He is consistent, though fanatical. On them were founded the fanatical ideas of the Middle Ages—the system of punishment and torture that prevailed as long as the cross of Jesus was the symbol of government and the word of Jesus the foundation of the law and practice. If thy right hand, offending thee, is to be cut off, authority will soon relieve you of the trouble by cutting it off for you, and so on through all the list of offenses, until the full logic of the system is elaborated, and then must come the reign of the cutting block, the tongue tearers, the eye gougers, branding irons to put on the forehead the mark of the beast, martyr lashes, and the rest. The conception of sin, extending from "one of thy members," will grow to include the whole body, and then you hav the gallows, the executioner's ax, and fire, until the whole thing must culminate in the punishment of thought, and then you arrive finally and logically at the horrors of the Inquisition—all of it the outcome of the fanatical spirit of Jesus, and not solely of that of vile Jesuits. And then this man has the effrontery to say: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light"! (Mat. x, 28–30.)

Among the curious associations of animals as mutualists, is that of a gamasid—a small insect of the acarus family—with the ant; particular species of gamasid associating with particular species of ant. One gamasid described by Michael is protected by the ant to the extent that when there is an alarm the gamasids leap on to the heads of the ants and ride to a place of safety, the ants apparently feeling under obligation to save them while they save themselvs. The benefit to the ant by this association appears to be that the gamasid is a sort of scavenger, eating the dead ants and assisting in keeping the nest clean.

At the Book Table.

The Open Court Publishing Company is quite rapidly adding to the world's supply of solid literature. Several of its meaty publications confront us as we seat ourself at the book table. The first that we take up is "The Nature of the State,"* by Dr. Paul Carus. When the Homestead rioters were indicted for treason in 1892, Gen. M. M. Trumbull wrote for the Open Court some criticisms, in which he said that their prosecution for treason was a moral victory for the rioters. This statement, together with others in the same article, called out from the editor, Dr. Carus, some pointed but kindly comments, in which he expressed the opinion that Gen. Trumbull was "carried away by his sympathy for one party—viz., the strikers—and thus become unjust to the other—the state." Following this there appeared in the paper numerous letters, which evinced the "wide interest taken in the subject." The discussion suggested the essay republished in this number of the "Religion of Science Library," and which first appeared in several instalments in the Open Court.

The author first asks: "Does the state exist?" and he answers that it does; that "the relations which we call society, nationality, and state are not mere phantoms, but realities for the preservation of which individuals are ready to fight, to sacrifice their possessions, and even their lives." In connection with this answer the author remarks that "the tendency of the times is toward individualism, and, indeed, the glory of our institutions is that they hav, for the first time in the world's history, given, in principle at least, a most unbounded sway to individual liberty. And rightly so." However, Dr. Carus admits that "this theory remains too much mere theory." We are not jealous of our liberties, and do not guard against inroads upon our rights. It may be said here that it is barely possible that the reason, or one of the reasons, why we do not take more interest in the preservation of the liberties guaranteed to us by the Constitution is because there is in the minds of many of our people a strong trend of thought away from individualism, a trend so strong that it may well be considered the dominant current in our politics today. This necessarily produces confusion in our minds, making us doubtful of the propriety of vigorously defending this or that right, for the suggestion is always present that it possibly is not a right after all. Dropping this suggestion as a thought provoker for others, we pass on to examin the work before us a little more. Dr. Carus thinks that the state exists as an entity, an entity of the kind that consist of "relations, realities which are not concrete objects."

Was the individual prior to society? the writer regards as similar to that much-discussed query, Which was first, the hen or the egg? He replies that the right answer to both questions is, Neither was first. Dr. Carus does not seem to discriminate as clearly as did Thomas Paine between society and the state, yet he realizes that, indispensable as society is to the individual, he cannot get the best from it unless he is free to grow and to suffer from, and therefore be benefited by, his own mistakes. This consideration leads the author to say that all places in a society should "be open to free competition," and that there should be "elbow room for all the individuals, so that everywhere the best may come to the front. It is not probable that an increase of comfort or of individual happiness will be the result [for the few, the context seems to show] of the full application of this principle; hence the opposition of the ruling classes to individualism. On the contrary, it will make it harder for him who has an easy lot in life to maintain it. But society as a whole will be benefited, and mankind will progress at greater strides than ever before."

We must not linger, great as is the temptation to do so, with this very interesting volume, for our space is limited, and we must not neglect other good books that their publishers hav kindly sent us. In the third chapter Dr. Carus argues that the state is a product of natural growth. In this he discriminates between society and the state, but maintains that the latter is "as little artificial (i. e., unnatural) in comparison with the so-called natural condition of savage life as the upright gait of man can be said to be artificial as contrasted with the walk of quadrupeds." Disagreeing with Rousseau and Kant, Dr. Carus holds that the rights of states are not merely negativ, exercised only for the protection of the liberties of their members, but are positiv also. If they were only negativ they could not, as he endeavors to show, collect taxes or pass laws enforcing military and juror's service. He concludes that "the state is actually a super-individual power, and has to be such in order to exist at all." But it it is human, not divine, in its origin and sanctions.

In the succeeding chapter the modern state is examined. Here it is held that no majority vote can make a wrong law right; not even the consensus of all can do this, for there is a difference between the will of all and the common will, and the authority of the state "is founded upon the latter, not the former." The next chapter is devoted to the demonstration of the thesis that the modern state is based upon revolution, and the concluding chapter maintains that, notwithstanding the revolutionary origin of the modern state, there can be committed against it such an offense as treason, and that this treason is "one of the gravest crimes." It is admitted, however, that "it is very difficult to draw any well-defined line between treason and reform, especially when it is remembered that every reform appears necessarily as treason, to a conservativ mind."

In "Double Consciousness"* we hav a record of experimental psychological studies by Alfred Binet, a well known French student of the science of mentality. During recent years, a great scientific movement has developed in France for the experimental investigation of psychological manifestations. In the high schools and universities the professors continue "to teach an antiquated science, whose only method is that of introspection," but in the philosophical reviews and in the journals which are "strictly medical" the investigation of mental phenomena is carried on along the lines and according to the methods of natural science. The forerunner of this inquiry was M. Taine, who in 1869 wrote an important treatis on "The Understanding." Then came M. Ribot, who is the "real inaugurator of the psychological movement proper." M. Ribot started the Revue Philosophique, through which he made known the investigations of himself and his fellow scientists of France and the investigations of the psychologists of Germany and England. He also instituted a chair of psychology at the Sorbonne and later at the College de France. Finally, in conjunction with M. Charcot, he founded the Society of Physiological Psychology, which has more than fifty activ members. This society has brought together the physiologist, the psychologist, the physician, the mathematician, the alienist, and the linguist, and working in the same direction they hav been enabled to do a great deal in developing the new science. M. Ribot has published four very timely works on the Diseases of Memory, of Will, of Personality, and on the Psychology of Attention. M. Binet says that he has always endeavored to stand "upon the groundwork of facts, entertaining a horror of metaphysics that is perhaps exaggerated." It is also said of him that "he has little love for great systems, and rightly givs precedence to little facts accurately observed and minutely described." Concerning the relations of the "physical and the spiritual," he regards the matter as a simple concordance, without going into the problem; he has frequently compared the state of consciousness to a state superadded, which in no shape modifies physiological processes, and which acts like a shadow opposit a body. He affirms, in different places, that an unconscious phenomenon is nothing else than a purely physiological phenomenon. M. Binet believes that we "know absolutely nothing regarding the nature of unconscious phenomena," and he suggests that despite M. Ribot's repugnance to metaphysics, it may be thought that a "slightly metaphysical character attaches to the ideas just noticed," and which we hav outlined above. The little book we are noticing is devoted to the investigation of the phenomena of unconscious cerebration in their "relation to double consciousness." The subjects treated are included under the heads of "Proof of Double Consciousness in Hysterical Individuals," "The Relations Between the Two Consciousnesses of Hysterical Individuals," "The Hysterical Eye," "Mechanism or Subconciousness?" "The Graphic Method and the Doubling of Consciousness," "The Intensity of Subconscious States," "The Rôle of Suggestion in Phenomena of Double Consciousness," and "Double Consciousness in Health."

As in the case of all other mysteries, the domain of the unknown in psychology is the domain of the miraculous, the supernatural. As we explain we cease to fear and to worship. Instead of burning "witches" and the "possessed," as the Christian doctors of minds diseased were wont to do in the good old days of faith and nescience, the students of these times are delighted to reduce the causes of unhappiness by discovering and explaining the sources of all this "bedevilment." This is the method of science. It is a pleasure to review, ever so briefly and imperfectly, such works as the "Double Consciousness" of Alfred Binet. If only the people in general could be induced to read them the reign of superstition could not long endure, but, alas! we cannot hope that they will. Only a few will read and understand, but that is a great gain, and it givs us hope for the future of our race.

Science Notes.

It is notorious that man as an individual left to himself is an exceedingly helpless being. He must be assisted by others in order to become anything more than a very low down beast. And he presses into his service also many animals of other species than himself. To most of these, as the horse, ox, sheep, etc., he is obliged to render a return service in shelter and food. Animals associated together and thus helping each other are called mutualists. There are parasites, it is true, that rob their hosts as much as they can, and never giv any benefit in return; but almost all animals are mutualists. Dr. James Weir has lately rescued the reputation of some so-called parasites and proved them mutualists. Thus the lice that infest fowls are found to be only scavengers scraping up the waste scarf-skin of the fowl and leaving it in a more healthy condition. They never bite or suck the blood of the host as parasites do. Many fishes are served by mutualists. The doctor experimented with gilt cat fish. This fish has mutualists called gyropeltes, whose friendly office is to devour the mucus that exudes from its body and remains on the skin clogging up the pores. The doctor put two of these fish in a tank where there were no gyropeltes, and in two days they were covered with a dense mucus, lost their fine complexions, and became decidedly low spirited. He then put them in a tank containing hordes of their little friends, and they were covered by them in a few moments, and in two days were beautifully polished off and restored to their usual good health and spirits.

There is a newly discovered worm called the Filaria Nocturna, that gets into the blood of men (and probably other animals) in India. The embryos of this worm are in the water, and when it is drank are taken into his stomach. From the stomach they bore their way into the lymphatic vessels, where they become sexually mature and reproduce a prodigious number of minute embryos inclosed in a delicate shell. These pass from the lymphatics into the blood, and during the day are quiet and not easily detected, but are activ at night. Now the mosquito, also a nocturnal animal, comes along, and sucking the blood of her victim, transfers some of these embryos to her own stomach, where they grow. When the musquito retires to water where she lays her eggs and dies, these embryos are scattered in the water, where they swim about and never develop any further, unless some drinker of the water swallows them, and so givs them a chance to produce a new generation. Providence has thus very ingeniously arranged this partnership between men and mosquitos for the benefit of the Filaria Nocturna. They are sometimes injurious to men, but not unless they are in great numbers.

The term annelid is used to designate that class of animals that, like the earthworm, consist of a series of rings or segments placed one behind the other and attached together in a long row. Each segment is provided with a nervous ganglion on the ventral side of the animal, and nerve fibers running from it to the sides terminating in hairs, which are organs of touch, and sometimes in limbs. The leech is an animal belonging to this class. It, like other annelids, has at the head end an extra bunch of nervous ganglions that hav not improperly been styled its brains. Professor C. O. Whitman of the University of Chicago has exhaustivly studied the nervous system of the clepsine, one of the leech family, and has shown that this bunch of ganglions arises from the bunching of the ganglions of five common segments into one segment. Every element of these ganglions with the proper number of nerve fibers is there in this primitiv brain. This is interesting to the human race, since there is every indication that man (as well as other vertebrates) is a lineal descendant of the annelids. Each vertebra in our backbone, with its corresponding ganglion and paired nerves, represents an ancient segment in the worm-like ancestor. This discovery shows how the brain was started in one family at least.

News and Notes.

Accidents will happen, and the Secular Pilgrim cannot escape the troubles of this life any more than the saints, who are expected, of course, to suffer, for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. I left Chicago Friday evening, November 31st, and expected to be in Blair the next day before noon; but I was obliged to pursue a round-about journey before I got there. At Trempealeau, Wis., one freight train had dashed into another, and the main track was blocked, and would be for several hours, so I was dead sure of missing my connection at Marshland; and if I did there was no railroad communication with Blair until Monday morning, in which case my three lecture engagements for Saturday and Sunday would remain unfulfilled. I thought certainly I was in a box, and must resign myself to an uncomfortable three days' sojourn in a strange country, with nothing to do, and out of pocket. However, by due inquiries of the conductor and various fellow-passengers, I found that I could take a local train to Galesville, seven miles off, and then drive across the country a distance of twenty miles. I proceeded to carry out the program. I arrived in Galesville about 10 A.M., had breakfast, and then the team was ready for Blair. Off we started, over hill and through dale, behind a couple of splendid Montana bronchos. I must confess I like the broncho. He is a lively animal. He keeps going. He does not seem to hav the slightest idea of walking. He is a kind of electric battery incapable of fatigue. We went over that twenty miles in two hours, and I arrived in Blair only an hour behind time after all. I enjoyed the drive. It was a misty morning. The dull gray and gold of December's scenery was all about. The hilltops were covered with snow and ice, and we had to wallow around some of the heavy drifts; but on the whole the roads were good, and the cool air was exhilarating; and there was something unique and weird in the darkling pictures that opened and shut in the cloudy chambers of the morning that reminded one of the vague and luminous poetry of Ossian when he sings of the melancholy heroes in the dim solitudes. So although I didn't thank God for changing the course of my journey, I made the best of it, and derived all the romance I could from the swift and circling progress through a hitherto unexplored country. When I drove up to Mayer's hotel at Blair I was in a right good condition for dinner, and found a cordial welcome from many friends in this new field.

I certainly should hav missed it greatly if I had not made Blair. It was a treat indeed to giv lectures in so appreciativ a community. The first night, Saturday, was pitch dark; the fog still accumulating, but the town hall was nearly full. Liberal friends came from Whitehall, seven miles away; from Taylor, the same distance, and from other places; and in every respect it was a grand rally of our forces. The lectures on Sunday afternoon and evening were equally successful. The largest audience of all was present on Sunday evening. These were the first Freethought lectures here, and certainly the result is most favorable.

The mists rolled off, and Sunday was a lovely day, a perfect winter day. There was no cloud in the sky. The brilliant hues of autumn had vanished, but the soft colors presented to the eye had a most charming effect, contrasting with the sparkling glory of the clear atmosphere over which the sun was gorgeously marching. The river was frozen over, and hundreds of happy people were skating although it was Sunday. Dr. Bodon and myself climbed the big bluff, on whose top is the residence of Ole Granberg, who is in the front rank of our Liberal workers. It was like tugging up Zion's hill to reach his delightful home; but we were amply repaid for the toil. The valley of the Trempealeau stretched wide beneath the glittering azure. The bluffs and hills and cultivated lands mingled in beauty and charm. The woods shone with exquisit luster. Now and then a spot of vivid green checkered the landscape. The ice-bound river gleamed like a silver ribbon, and animated nature rejoiced in the diamond-like splendor of the earth and sky. Everything conspired to make an entrancing picture.

Ole Granberg has a fine library of Freethought and scientific books, and it was a pleasure to roam through these treasures of wisdom, poetry, and romance, for if anything makes the world beautiful it is the truth itself.

Dr. Bodon treated me with the genuin hospitality of the Norseland. I had the bread and cake, fish and cheese of that far country; and it seemed as if I were really in the "land of the midnight sun," with its art, its music, its literature, and its good things of ancient renown. It whetted my appetite to visit that great and wonderful country where sea and land mingle in such magnificent array, and in the minds of whose people are the traditions and glory of an almost immeasurable past. Nearly three-fourths of the farmers about Blair are from Norway originally, and they make a steady and prosperous community. They, perhaps, hav more churches than any other nationality, for they seem to delight in splitting on subtle points of theology, but a vast Liberal element prevails; and I find among them some of our broadest and best thinkers and most vigorous workers. The spirit of its literature is now almost thoroughly Freethought. There are about 600,000 of Norway's people in our land to-day, and they will certainly break off the shackles of superstition and become a powerful element in American life.

I hope to return to Blair some day. I hav also an invitation to break ground at Taylor, which sent a goodly delegation to these meetings. The Liberals of Whitehall also desire a continuation of the campaign, so I find this whole country in sympathy with progress and reform. I leave Blair to pursue my northward way with hope and encouragement.

I hav come across a history of the first national Thanksgiving in the American Republic, and it is quite an entertaining affair, and shows what a farce the whole ecclesiastical procedure was. We shall find points in it for secular instruction. As will be seen by the record, the first Thanksgiving was the occasion of making the "Father of our country" profane. It really made Washington swear, perhaps for the first time.

The idea of having such a national holiday originated in the fertil brain of Alexander Hamilton Hamilton was then secretary of the treasury, and in August of 1789 he broached the subject at one of the meetings of President Washington's cabinet.

It was in September of 1789 that the matter was brought to the attention of Congress. Representativ Boudinot of New England moved, that in view of the blessings so abundantly bestowed on the country by the Almighty, a day of thanksgiving be set apart by the president. The resolution was supported by Representativ Sherman of Connecticut, but it aroused violent opposition. Many members of Congress denounced the proposition as effete and monarchial, and we hav the authority of Representativ Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania for the statement that some members grew so personal in their discussions of the matter that blows were exchanged on the streets of New York. It appears from the Hamilton letters—and the fact will certainly surprise the historians—that Jefferson and Hamilton immediately differed as to the desirability of the holiday. Jefferson, as appears from his letters, was opposed to the idea because it seemed undemocratic. He was then, of course, fresh from his long residence in Freethinking France, and at the very culmination of his skeptical progression. Anything that savored of prayer and church observance in the government was opposed to his extreme views in the matter of separation of church and state. He expressed these views of his with moderation and good sense in a concise letter, for he had as yet hardly assumed the reins of office.

However, the resolution went through Congress, and Washington duly appointed the last Thursday of November, 1789, as the first of one long line of national Thanksgivings. Immediately another acrimonious contest was begun. How was the day to be observed? It was proposed to hav a monster procession of dignitaries, headed by Washington himself, on horseback. Jefferson's opposition to anything of the kind, as his letters show, effectivly prevented such spectacular perambulation. It was finally determined that the day was a domestic holiday and should be observed in the privacy of the home after the good old New England manner. This much we know from John Adams, the vice-president, who came from Massachusetts, the mother of Thanksgivings.

Now, it seems that Alexander Hamilton, eager to do anything calculated to put Thomas Jefferson to confusion, had been organizing all manner of festivities and observances likely to make Thanksgiving a noisy holiday. Jefferson, on the contrary, had held somewhat aloof from the whole thing, for he took great pride in his superiority to all affairs of a religious nature, and he looked upon Thanksgiving as a religious contrivance entirely. The friends of Jefferson did what they decently could to ignore Thanksgiving altogether, as John Adams's letters show very emphatically. Hamilton's partisans, on the contrary, did all in their power to make the day a success, and when the state of affairs was made known in Boston and Philadelphia, the battle was heartily entered into. Washington had the mortification of seeing that his day of Thanksgiving for the blessings of Almighty God had become a source of no end of contention.

However, the day dawned bright and even warm for New York. The bells of Trinity were rung for an hour and there was a parade of one regiment reviewed by Hamilton from Faunce's tavern. Then the cheering part of the day began by indulgence in various forms of stimulating percolations and every one no doubt was very thankful. Washington went to church in the morning and at high noon began to receive his visitors. It was well on in the afternoon that Hamilton's little dinner began. It was rather a famous little dinner in its day and generation, although it is never talked of nowadays. It was eaten at Faunce's and was the first official Thanksgiving banquet in our history. Hamilton was to respond to a toast and then go off to the president's mansion, but it seems the secretary of the treasury was behind time, and there occurred at the dinner table what would now be called a disagreement among gentlemen. We hav much and detailed information about it in the Hamilton letters. In the first place Lieutenant St. Clair, a nephew of famed Arthur St. Clair, took occasion to say upon his honor as a gentleman that he was sober. An unhistoric personage of whom we know no more than that his name was Tisdal and that he was an alderman and notary, impeached the veracity of Lieutenant St. Clair's assertion and defied him to prove it. The lieutenant thereupon threw a bottle at nobody in particular and missed his aim. In an instant, as they say in novels, all was confusion, and then like a god out of a machine in walked Alexander Hamilton. The scene that met his gaze, according to John Adams's account of it, was shameful. Viands and glassware and gentlemen were all massed together. However, they were separated and Hamilton, dreading the effect of the scandal if the episode became public property, did his best to patch matters up. The skeptical alderman appears to hav had his doubts upon the subject of Lieutenant St. Clair's sobriety set at rest, but unfortunately there could be no doubt that the lieutenant's nose was broken in the course of debate, for the Hamilton letters distinctly say so, but we hav the same authority for maintaining that it was agreed that a gentleman is at times justified in insisting that he is sober.

The next thing that happened, according to the letters, was a dispute about the turkey. Where was the turkey? It had not been brought upon the table. There were loud shouts for turkey, but none was forthcoming. A proposition to dispense with that fowl was hooted down, and Alexander Hamilton swore—the Hamilton letters say he swore—that no citizen of the United States of America should abstain from turkey on Thanksgiving day. Well, they got a turkey somehow, and ate it. Then they drank and cheered and sang songs, and sang songs and cheered and drank. They knew how to observe Thanksgiving in those days.

This little matter attended to, Hamilton made a speech and hied him to the presidential abode. Here and there had been dignified observance of the day, but it seems that some inkling of the little row at Faunce's had got abroad already, and Washington put some questions to the secretary of the treasury about it. Both Knox and Randolph mention the exercised condition of the president, and Hamilton seems to hav been influenced somewhat by his recent excitement. However it was, Washington at any rate became vexed and indulged in some pointed remarks. Readers of the history of the period remember the effectiv way in which Parton, Marshall, and Hillard hav touched up the anger of our first president. Washington's displeasure always took the form of just resentment. He resented the whole Thanksgiving episode. John Jay givs the language of the father of his country on this occasion with some pretensions to exactness. Washington was incensed that a young soldier should hav broken his nose in a tavern brawl, while professing to be giving thanks for heaven's best gifts. Our first president went so far as to say that it was disgraceful, "by God." "By God, sir!" was the most blasphemous imprecation in the Washington vocabulary, and he used it twice to Hamilton. The first occasion was on this unhappy Thanksgiving. At the second Hamilton quitted his master.

The churches are welcome to all the credit they can get out of this first Thanksgiving celebration by order of the president. It shows Jefferson in the light of a wise statesman and a sensible Freethinker, and Hamilton as an imitator of the ancient monarchies. It is a bit of history worth preserving.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"I will dash them one against the other, even the sons and fathers together; I will not pity, nor spare, nor hav mercy."

"And his mercy endureth forever."

When will Christians see the absurdity of these contradictions?—John Peck, in Truth Seeker Annual for 1895.

An Observation.

A rhetorical denunciation of unbelief, the authorship of which was attributed to James Russell Lowell, has been printed in most of the religious papers during the past few years and has probably by this time found its way to the heathen. It bore internal evidence of imposture, but that made no difference. It was slush, and Lowell was not given to writing slush, but it answered the purposes of piety. It was analyzed, picked to pieces, and disposed of as worthless refuse, but the Gabriel of the resurrection of fraud blew his trumpet and it arose. Mr. Lowell, who died in 1891, repudiated it over his own signature, but within the past six months it has reappeared. Who has not been dazzled by this gem?—

Some gentlemen tell us very complacently that they hav no need of religion; they can get along well enough without it Let me tell you, my friends, the worst kind of religion is no religion at all. And these men who liv in ease and luxury, indulging themselvs in the amusement of going without religion, may be thankful they liv in lands where the gospel they hav neglected has tamed the beastliness and ferocity of the men who, but for Christianity, might long ago hav eaten their bodies like the South Sea Islanders, or cut off their heads like the monsters of the French Revolution.—James Russell Lowell.

Or blinded by the following?—

When the microscopic search of skepticism, which has hunted the heavens and sounded the seas to disprove the existence of a creator, has turned its attention to human society, and has found a place on this planet ten miles square where a decent man can liv in decency, comfort, and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted; a place where age is reverenced, infancy respected, womanhood honored, and human life held in due regard—when the skeptic can find such a place on this globe where the gospel of Christ has not gone and cleared the way, and laid the foundations and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the skeptical literati to move thither, and there ventilate their views. But so long as these men are dependent upon the religion which they discard for every privilege they enjoy, they may well hesitate a little before they seek to rob the Christian of his hope and humanity of its faith in that savior who alone has given to man that hope of eternal life which makes life tolerable and society possible, and robs death of its terrors and the grave of its gloom.—James Russell Lowell.

Would the man who grieved to find "Truth forever on the scaffold" be likely to crucify facts in that manner? Hardly. Would a person pious enough to lie for God's sake say this?—

Slowly the Bible of the race is writ,
And not on paper leaves nor leaves of stone.

The quotation is from "Bibliolatres."

It is doubtful if Lowell was a Christian at all. There is nothing in his works to indicate that he was. In his poem, "The Search," he relates how he sought Christ, and having come to a church he says:

I found his tomb, indeed, where, by their laws,
All must on stated days themselvs imprison,
Mocking with bread a dead creed's grinning jaws,
Witless how long the life had thence arisen.

Here the church is made the tomb of Christ's dead body—his spirit, that is, his teachings, having gone outside. There is here also a crack at the Sunday laws by which professed Christians "themselvs imprison" in churches on their Sabbath; also at the communion business. Instead of partaking of the body and blood of Christ, the church people, as Lowell thinks, feed the grinning jaws of a dead creed, and his thought is well expressed, though in harsher terms than Ingersoll, for example, would hav employed under the circumstances. Not to leave the reader in doubt as to how Lowell's search for Christ ended, I will say that he found him in a "hovel rude" feeding a hungry child and protecting a slave he had set free. He was not at that moment robbing the grave of its terrors, or death of its gloom; he was just trying to make life endurable. If I were to guess at Lowell's estimate of Christ, I should say that he regarded the Galilean as a reformer whose mission was not to deterrorize death or to ungloom the grave, but to help the unfortunate, free the enslaved, humble the proud, call the righteous to repentance, and put the gad to hypocrits.

I find nothing about Christianity in Lowell's works, and he mentions the church only to score it. The fact seems to be that he took no stock in the gospel of Christ as now promulgated. His poem entitled "A Parable" tells of a visit which Christ makes to earth in our days. He finds the church built upon the groaning multitude, whose heavings and sighings rend its walls. And he says to the chief priests:

Hav ye founded your thrones and altars, then,
On the bodies and souls of living men?
And think ye that building shall endure
Which shelters the noble and crushes the poor?
. . . . . .
I hav heard the dropping of their tears
In heaven these eighteen hundred years.

The chief priests try to apologize, and call Christ's attention to the images of himself which they hav reared, and to illustrate their zeal they tell him:

Our task is hard—with sword and flame
To hold thy earth forever the same,
And with sharp crooks of steel to keep
Still, as thou leftest them, thy sheep.

But Christ does not approve of that method. He goes away and finds a laborer—

A low-browed, stunted, haggard man,
And a motherless girl whose fingers thin
Pushed from her faintly want and sin.

And having set these two in the midst of the Christians who had sent the gospel into heathen lands, and the said Christians having drawn their skirts away to avoid defilement—

"Lo, here," said he,
"The images ye hav made of me."

That does not really look as though Lowell thought the gospel necessarily promoted "decency and security," or as though womanhood was especially honored on every ten square miles of Christian territory. On the other hand, the conclusion is that he holds Christianity responsible for the man being low-browed, stunted, and haggard, and for the condition of the girl who but faintly pushed away want and sin. It cannot be gathered from the lines quoted that no religion at all, in the estimation of Mr. Lowell, could be worse than such a religion. Mr. Lowell had a God who always agreed with him, and also a Christ whose opinions and conduct were invariably such as Mr. Lowell could indorse. He had likewise a heaven, to which he gave Wm. Lloyd Garrison and the heretical Dr. Ellery Channing a handsome send-off. He had a hell, too, but it was the hell that the rich Christians make for the poor ones on this planet. But Lowell's deities were just; they judged men on their merits. His heaven was evidently a mental state and was to be won, in abolition days, chiefly by fighting slavery. If there was no conscious existence after death, on which subject the poet did not dogmatize, still—

No power can ever die that wrought for Truth;
Thereby a law of nature it became,
And livs unwithered in its sinewy youth,
When he who called it forth is but a name.

In Lowell's humorous writings ministers are described as of the earth earthy, and joining the church is recommended, in one instance which I recall, as a matter of business. Here the commercial value of piety is set forth, and it is argued that nobody who has not experienced a change of heart can make one nigger raise ten bales of cotton. But if you read anything whatever that Lowell is known to hav written, and then turn to the rancid stuff attributed to him, you can almost detect the imposture by the taste the words leave in your mouth. He may hav been a Christian, despite the lack of evidence to that effect. It never occurred to me to invest any man with the title of Freethinker unless he claimed and defended it; but it is only fair to Lowell to say that he was no ranting blatherskite, as he would deserve to be called if the denunciation of the "skeptical literati"—a denunciation that would fall upon his friends and contemporaries Channing, Emerson, Holmes, Thoreau, Parker, and Whittier—had been his.

It is tardy justice for the Christian Advocate of November 15th to reprint the matter under the acknowledgment that Lowell is not its author, but these facts are welcome nevertheless: Professor Wilkinson, of the University of Chicago, wrote to Prof. C. E. Norton, the lifelong friend of Lowell and editor of his published letters, saying that he wanted to use the passage and asking Mr. Norton to authenticate it if he could. Why a college professor should take any trouble to secure such a screed when the Rev. John Jasper's Sun-Do-Move sermon was available, is one of the mysteries of godliness. Norton replied that he was sure it could not be Lowell's utterance. The next witness is Mr. John T. Perry, of Exeter, N. H., a journalist, who says that he warned the Rev. Smith Byington, the Congregational minister of Exeter, who had quoted the words as Lowell's, that they were spurious. Thereupon the Rev. Mr. Byington wrote directly to Lowell, and to his apparent disappointment received in reply a note saying that the passage was not his (Lowell's) and that he was not in the habit of employing that style when discussing religious questions.

There is valuable instruction in this incident, if no truth. Here we find, in the hindquarter, as might be said, of the nineteenth century, a pious fraud flourishing within three years of the death of its purported author, after his literary executor had branded it as such, and even after a letter in which he had declared over his own signature that he did not write it was in the hands of a distinguished clergyman. The Rev. Mr. Byington, who received Lowell's denial, did not make it public, but Norton the journalist saw it, and so set about clearing the poet's reputation. The indications are that the preacher designed to suppress the facts.

If in these days of newspapers and diffused intelligence a humbug of such dimensions can pass as genuin for years, what a gorgeous freedom the fathers of the church enjoyed to invent every posible imposture and attribute it to Christ and the apostles! The editor of the Advocate admits: "The tendency to exaggerate in religious writing and conversation is so marked that....we are compelled by lengthening experience to declare that the presumption is that exaggeration exists in every case of unusual positivness in unauthenticated quotation." Applying that rule, which is a good one, to the gospels, there is no more if not less excuse for accepting them as authentic than for believing James Russell Lowell wrote the passage we now know to be fraudulent. The child is the raw material. It is in our power, and it is our duty, to mold, fashion, develop, prune, as it were, into as good a growth as the world at large has a right to expect and a community to demand. With all due allowance for inherited tendencies, the work of training the child is in the hands of the teachers. . . . We hav no more right to put a child in mental bondage than we hav to enchain his limbs or to obstruct his free respiration. By mental bondage I mean the bars and bolts that are used to shut out the light and radiance of scientific fact and investigation, the dungeons of ignorance and cells of dogmatic authority. —Susan H. Wixon, in Truth Seeker Annual for 1895.

APPONAUG, R. I., Nov. 25, 1894

MR. EDITOR: I hav got the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I am reading now the second time, and the more I read the more I get interested in the work. It is the greatest book on record, superior to all, the Bible included, which is saying a good deal.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.20, which please credit as follows: Extend my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me "The Better World," "Religion and the Bible," and the "Age of Reason." Wants an Unadulterated Constitution.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y., Nov. 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed fifty cents for the "Age of Reason," and Ingersoll's "Holy Bible."

I cannot believe in their personal Gods, but am a believer in Spiritualism. I hav THE TRUTH SEEKER read in the Psychical Hall very often. We are for Freethought and liberty, and we are gaining slowly. Now and then one dares to show himself on the side of liberty. No God in the Constitution for me. I hope you will succeed in your grand, good, and truthful work. GEO. H. WOOD.

How Moody Feeds God's Lambs.

ORILLIA, ONT., Nov. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Winter has come on here in Canada, and the snow is now covering the ground, and in Toronto the poor sometimes hav to starve, but, thank God, Moody spent two weeks in the great Massy Hall and warmed up their souls in a most God-like manner, and when leaving the other day he took $1,800, as a result of the big fish stories and stale jokes. If this amount had been spent for bread and divided amongst the needy of this most godly city, it would hav purchased 700 barrels of flour or eight car loads or 49,000 loaves of bread, weighing four pounds each, food for one month for 1,633 families of five persons each, or 8,165 souls for one month. Wonderful is the blessing of godliness.

T. W. MOFFATT.

No, He is Another Lambert.

LEON, IA., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I read recently in some paper that one Rev. Mr. Lambert, a Catholic priest, had been converted to Protestantism, and wish to know if he is the Lambert who is the author of "Notes on Ingersoll." Please find inclosed $1, and send me eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." It is not my intention to giv these books away, but to lend them first to one and then another as missionary documents. As soon as I can spare the money I will send you a few names and the money to pay for their subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, hoping that they will become regular subscribers. Yours with admiration for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the cause of Freethought, FRANK COOK.

Make a Note of the Name and Address.

ESKRIDGE, KAN., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see in a recent issue that you often hav inquiries for some one to deliver a funeral address, and sometimes are unable to comply on account of the regular Liberal lecturers being too far away from where the speaker is wanted.

I hav always insisted that Freethinkers should conduct their own funerals. Some call an orthodox minister, simply as a matter of custom, but it is very inconsistent. I hav delivered Liberal lectures and funeral addresses, and will continue to deliver funeral addresses as long as I liv, if desired. Should I hav to go a distance that would necessitate travel by rail, all I ask is expenses paid. If I can say something to lessen grief and impart consolation, I am satified. C. V. WILLIAMS.

Some Things That They Forget.

VINELAND, N. J., Nov. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The churches hav accepted the errors of priestcraft so long and become so ignorant that they think the way to worship their man-made God is to injure themselvs by a day of extreme gluttony; yet, while thanking God for food that they raised themselvs, or bought by hard labor, they neglect to reprove him for sending strikes, riots, business stagnation, drouth, failure of crops, great fires, burned bodies, ruined homes, broken hearts, blasted hopes, despair, and numerous diseases that kill thousands every year.

They are indulging in gluttony to-day with a full force, and to-night and to morrow the doctors will hav their hands full in alleviating the pain and distress of their outraged bodies. These errors will continue with the churches so long as they are ruled by the Bible and priestcraft.

J. HACKER.

Approves of the Idea of An Annual.

SUNAPEE, N. H., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: You will no doubt remember that some months ago I made the inquiry as to the prospect for the publication of an ANNUAL. You were discouraged then, but now I am glad to see by an announcement in yesterday's TRUTH SEEKER that an ANNUAL will soon be forthcoming.

I regard such compilations with great favor, because they can be really the cream of the year's progress, and are in better shape to use for proselytizing than any special number of a weekly publication. The calendar alone is worth the price charged, as being a ready authority in regard to great events and persons connected with the onward march of Liberalism. The present year, I take it, has been more than usually fruitful in THE TRUTH SEEKER office in valuable material for illustration. You may put me down for two copies, and I will instantly remit on receipt of same. Yours truly,

W. C. STUROC.

Ingersoll in Toledo.

WOODVILLE, O., Nov. 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Last Wednesday, November 21st, I first set eyes on Colonel "Bob." I attended his lecture on Voltaire, at Toledo, O., and was charmed by his persuasiv eloquence. The attendance was large, standing being at a premium, but what was most gratifying was the hundreds of female heads to be seen in the audience, and the enthusiasm with which they applauded the brave Colonel. I judge that about one-third of the audience were women.

As usual, it set the Lord's anointed to blowing like a school of porpoises, and it is probable that more pious lies hav been told in Toledo during the last week than hav been told since they got through with Ingersoll last year.

Mr. J. E. Remsburg has written me twice to try and arrange for a lecture at Woodville, which I would gladly do if it were possible, but Lutheran bigotry is so dominant here that a hall cannot be secured for an "Infidel" lecture.

When starting to Toledo on the 21st, I told a prominent merchant of Woodville that I was going to hear Robert Ingersoll lecture, and he said he had never heard of him, so you see how far the people hav advanced in twenty years.

GEORGE H. TURNER.

Where They Hav Live Liberals.

PORTLAND, OR., Nov 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav received several sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER I wish to inform you that I always get the paper from our friend Jones, who keeps the only Liberal book store in this city, and who has done a great deal here for Secularism. Since the convention of the Oregon State Secular Union we hav again commenced holding our regular meetings, and the work is progressing finely. Our first few meetings were small, but we are again attracting audiences of from two to three hundred people to our hall, which, by the way, though not large enough to seat more than three hundred and fifty people, is very good. We hav it decorated with mottoes from Paine; also with his picture and Mrs. Smith's in crayon presented to the church by Professor Bauer. Over the pictures we hav respectivly "The Founder of Our Republic" and "The Founder of Our Church." Mrs. Smith resigned as lecturer of the church October 14th, as it was too hard for her to come down here from her home, eighteen miles from Portland, every Sunday; and although we all regret that we hav lost her we hav a splendid substitute in Nettie A. Olds, who has taken charge of the work here. Inclosed I send you one of her lectures clipped from the Portland Leader, which paper publishes them every week, as she delivers them. Our Sunday-school is growing very rapidly, and altogether we are very much encouraged in the work. Yours for truth,

CHAS. HAGNER.

That's Right, Organize the Sunday Schools.

ALLISON, MO., Nov. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Having received all the literature promptly I sent for, find inclosed $1, for which please mail eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to address inclosed. There are a number of Freethinkers in this locality, but up to date we are unorganized, and hav not done so much for the cause of liberty of thought as we should, and in every discussion between the Freethinker and Christian the retort would be used: "If you are right, why are you in the minority?" The answer to us is obvious. Yet we believe time has come for something to be done for liberty, and we propose to organize a Secular Sunday school as soon as possible, and scatter all the Freethought literature we can get the people to read. There are two churches here, and a revival meeting has been in progress at one of them for three weeks without a single conversion. I believe there has been one backslider "reclaimed from the paths of sin." Nightly the representatives of the fifteenth century pour out their supplications to their Joss for the "salvation of souls," and for the "removal, O Lord! of that Infidel who stands in the way of the salvation of his family." I don't suppose they would waylay that man and murder him in cold blood, but I do believe they would like to see some other disciple of darkness do so, and then they could very readily see "one of those mysterious outworkings of Providence," etc. If you will send me a few sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER I will distribute them where I think they will do good work. Hoping that liberty may soon be proclaimed to all the world, and wishing your paper success, I remain

Yours truly. LUTE JERSEY.

Common Sense Exercises.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $6.50 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and paper as per offer. I am highly pleased with the able manner in which you conduct the paper; it suits me.

My wife died last June, and I had Mr. H. Bird to speak instead of a sky-pilot. Much surprise was expressed at the departure from the customary manner of conducting the last rites for our departed loved ones. It served to start the brains and tongues of the neighbors. Some were quite shocked at the innovation; others spoke in praise of the plain common sense of Mr. Bird. One lady quite indorsed much that was said. Mr. Bird reminded those present that the deceased knew that death was near, but that she had not the slightest fear in meeting it; in fact, when told that she was going to die, her last words were, "I am so glad." She died about one hour after that. He also told them that death was but the process of all nature; all things hav to pass through the same process of decay. As for the hope of a future life, he left that to those who wished to cherish that hope, not denying or affirming the possibility. Altogether, he made a pretty good impression on those present. Mr. Bird not only gave his time and service free of charge, but he sent a beautiful floral tribute. Mrs. Bird was also present. If Freethinkers had the courage to hav their own ceremonies over their departed, Christians would receive an object lesson, and would see what sort of people Freethinkers are; as it is, they think that we Freethinkers turn at the time of death, and that we take it all out in talk while we are in good health. Go ahead and unseat this Christian-Jewish monster, Yahveh or Jehovah. Yours for god killing, CHARLES EVERETTE.

A Fearless Lawyer Wanted.

Nov. 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Any man who is living in a village among orthodox people, and forced to liv from his labor and support his family, is bound to suffer injustice from orthodox churches.

I will describe to you the wrongs committed against me by the Roman Catholic church. My wife died four years ago in —— Camp (about forty miles from this place), while on a visit and in her father's house. She went there to attend the marriage of her sister. She left me with three small children, the eldest being twelve years of age.

I was advised to leave the children with my father-in-law (he is a well-to-do farmer), and I left this country and went to the Black Hills. From there I corresponded with my children and sent them money which I earned. I remained there four years, when my eldest girl wrote me to come back, and she would keep house for me. So I secured my old situation here (with salary of $2 per day), and two months ago came back. But in the mean time my eldest girl was seduced by Father —— in —— Camp, and all the rest of the fanatics think that he, as a priest, has just as much right to the children as I hav. The second girl was taken to a sisters' school, and the fanatics are simply laughing at me. I spoke with one of my old friends, a lawyer, who is practicing in this state, but the fact is that churches hav such privileges, and lawyers living among orthodox people do not like to punish priests lest they make themselvs enemies.

Now, I ask you for some advice, and I will wait until I hear from you. Otherwise there is nothing left for me but to take the matter in my own hands.

Will you or can you giv me some advice, to save me trouble? Please let me know, and send charge for your trouble. I will pay it. Inclosed find subscription for one year. A FATHER.

About Varions Things.

LEXINGTON, KY., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The Thumbscrew Association has lately arrived at the following conclusion:

The god Juggernaut, being a legitimate advance from some ancient dragon, was in like manner followed by the Holy Jackal, the Sacred Crow, Jupiter, Jehovah—such like deities coming on, according to the principle of evolution, in due time to bless and civilize the world.

Women are sometimes so unkind to their own sex that it has been hinted that Beelzebub, their favorit god, is included in this list. Truly, people do not know what they worship. Mammon is adored with a zealous spirit, his worshipers not being aware of the extent of their devotion; thumbscrews are a little lighter in this instance. Piety is so natural to the human heart that we excuse the heathen, but if you do not pray to Jehovah the churches will order a box of thumbscrews in a hurry. Evolution is getting to be fashionable; so nextly: The unformed, nebulous state of the human mind, however, givs us a gloomy, misty idea of a sentimental journey, into a purer sphere or heaven called "progress." Evolution fits in here, for we would be ashamed of supposing that we could reach heaven by a single bound.

The next world is evidently the result of this, but how about a spiritual effect of the weary tide of present affairs? Fond dreamer, examin this kind of progress; can you hide facts? Progress indeed! A decaying corpse, a heap of carrion, the harvest, the heaven of the buzzard, the carrion crow, and this to nourish the lowest, the meanest of all animal life. You hav found a cord connecting the two worlds, not half as strong as the "spider's most attenuated thread." A spiritual rose, growing from a dead cabbage stalk—an effect without a cause. And probably the universe cannot contain an instance of more complete deterioration of true mentality than that existing here.

Christians and others cannot locate their spirit world. Charles Lyell remarks that nature givs a bound now and then, but years hav been spent in bringing us to our present standing, without leaving this planet, and if we develop further it will be here, not as individuals but as a race. Nothing but divine pity in the human heart can save the world from returning to the fearful grossness of the gorilla or chimpanzee monkey, from horrible degradation and oblivion. Purity must become second nature.

What is heaven? The heaven of the religious miser is the moment when he cheats a poor widow out of five cents and it falls into his hand. Such men are not human beings. How often do we associate with a church bull-dog or tiger without being aware of it! Tyranny is on the increase and the church does not hinder it. Thirty or one hundred tyrants rule our beloved country, and how few protest against it!

Hav we an Alcibiades sunk in religious luxury? Will he not arise from his lethargy and quicken the honest hearts of the people? The latest religious racket is to burst in on the silent starving poor; the bediamonded woman seizes her and sucks her breath to find out if she has been eating meat! She drives some poor girl to infamy sparkling with holy gems, then comes to tell her that she is "fallen" and must be conveyed to a "House of Mercy." So dwelleth the love of Christ in his church.

Respectfully, ALHAZA.

The Sunday Octupus in California.

NATIONAL HOME, CAL., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I well know that you feel interested in anything that may happen to demonstrate that the sky-pilots are all the time hard at work against our enjoyments of Sunday, I will tell you that they hav persuaded the governor of the home to issue an order not to play cards on Sunday. The order was promulgated to-day. Mind you, there never was any complaint about the noise or playing for money, neither through the week nor on Sunday. The home has been established six years, and under the governorship of Colonel Treichet, although they used to say he was a religious man, there was no restriction about playing cards on Sundays. The boys here, I mean the Infidels and a good many more, think that the God-in-the-Constitution scheme is nearing success.

I hav here to mention the steps taken by the Board of School Directors of Alameda county in establishing a censorship over the literature circulated in the schools of Alameda county by the W. C. T. U. This literature is about the evils of rum and tobacco, in a pamphlet entitled "The Streets of Hell." Another teaches that no man can be a Christian if he uses tobacco. But the School Directors did not see it exactly in that light, so at a meeting they adopted a motion that such literature could not be circulated in the public schools without previous examination by the superintendent.

I had to laugh on reading a letter published in the San Francisco Call of the 23d inst., in which Rev. Father Ducey, of St. Leo's church, givs vent to his bad temper against Archbishop Corrigan for reprimanding him for taking part in the Lexow Committee's meetings without permission from him. I will not say whether Mr. Corrigan is right or wrong in the matter, but it appears to me (of course I am an Infidel, and ought not to know) that Mr. Ducey seems to forget that he is a priest, and as such has no right to do anything without Mr. Corrigan's order; for on the day that he was made a priest did he not, of his own free will, and not in ignorance either, surrender the right to act or think for himself, and promise to act and think only through the mind of his superior, appointed by the Holy See, and in case of disobedience to these orders he commits a breach of disciplin against the church of the same order that a soldier or any officer would who disobeyed the orders of the commander in-chief in face of the enemy; and I do not think that the Holy See would support him in doing that. And should the Holy See order him to be punished, it will be only justice. That is where the shoe pinches, for how does Mr. Ducey dare to dispute an order from his superior officer whom he swore of his own free will to obey? Let Mr. Ducey remain the slave of his own act. I do not pity him, and only wish they would punish him as he deserves and as they did punish them in the sixteenth century; it would teach him the foolishness of surrendering the liberty to act as he wishes. I can tell Mr. Ducey of a way to rid himself of interference by Mr. Corrigan for ever, and it is this: Let Mr. Ducey throw the frock from him, and tell Mr. Corrigan that he does not any more recognize him as the arbiter of his will, and it is done. But that is where the shoe pinches on the other side. Mr. Ducey will cease to be a slave to the church, a beggar, and a non-producer, but he will hav to work a little harder for his living as we Infidels and profane hav to do, and he will be free to think and act as he likes. As long as he does not interfere with anybody else's liberty, he will hav the right of not being interfered with, and I do not believe he will hav lost by the change. Truly yours, GEO. BOURDAIS.

Does Machinery Displace Labor?

HARLAN, IA., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: My "Labor Pensioning" scheme was compressed into a few brief sentences in my letter published in your paper of Sept. 29. Yet I think it was presented distinctly with the fact assumed as an imperativ necessity for it and the specific benefit to be derived from it. Yet Mr. Gunther, under the caption of "Some Calm Reflections," has entirely misunderstood it, with no better excuse for his misreading than a "sick stomach." His use of Mr. Hayes as a buffer and the compliment that by comparison he renders to me does not at all diminish the effect of the unnecessary collision. Is it fair to say that "now comes Mr. J. K. P. Baker and givs us a recipe for making every person happy"? I do not offer a recipe to cure even a "sick stomach"—more's the pity for those who would digest an argument in the same way they would digest a dinner; or who read articles they wish to criticise from the "pit of the stomach." I do not "start out with the claim that the cause of distress among the laboring classes is over-production" in any such meaning of the word as he givs to it. On the contrary, my leading proposition is that very law of equilibrium between demand and supply that makes over-production an impossibility, and "thus over-production inflicts more destitution than famin." Over-production is thus limited by the context to the "capacity" or potential over-production. I might say that there is over-production in relation to the market or commercial demand when there is no sale for a product, although if distributed freely there might be a deficiency.

Or I might say very properly, and this is the evil to be remedied, that if one laborer produces enough for his own use and for the use of ten or a hundred others, this is over-production. This is the actual state of industry now; and it comprehends the great wrong I seek to remedy. When one laborer produces enough for one hundred, the one hundred are out of employment, and that means destitution and crime. To distribute the necessary labor so that each of the hundred shall get his share of it, is the object of my scheme. I do not doubt that stagnation results from any stimulation of the productiv forces just as soon as over-production becomes apparent. So the effect of protection at first is to stimulate production by enabling the producer to obtain higher prices; but soon the market is stalled, prices decline in spite of protection, laborers are unemployed, mills and factories close, and we hav "hard times." But I will not discuss this question because the advantages or disadvantages of any particular tariff scheme are something outside of my present purpose, and I hope to find both Mr. Gunther and Mr. Hays coöperating with me to secure the adoption of my Labor Pensioning scheme, although they differ from each other about the tariff. My scheme is not such a whale as to swallow the political Jonah, with all his schemes.

Mr. Gunther makes no issue with me, but rather reiterates my own argument till he arrives at this statement: "Another mistake is that labor-saving machinery turns people out of employment."

At the last session of Congress, on the motion of the Hon. McGann of Illinois, the House passed a resolution directing the Commissioner of Labor to report as to the effect of machinery on labor, wages, etc. I am told that nearly a year must elapse before that report can be submitted to the House and given to the public. I do not know what spirit or purpose inspired that resolution, only as one may judge from the language in which it is expressed. I should not be surprised to find that it will create a greater excitement than did that little work of statistics known as "Helpers' Crisis" of long ago.

Labor-saving machinery means, by the very terms, a saving—a displacement of labor. Now, all the steam engins of the world, excluding locomotivs, hav in power an energy greater than the entire population of the earth, if every soul were an able-bodied laborer. The engin power of the United States (steam engin, I mean) is equal to the energy of 50,000,000 able-bodied men (excluding locomotivs). Almost all this vast power has been created within the last twenty-five years, and there is no limit, except the demand, to its indefinit expansion in the future.

Let us look at Niagara. The flow of water at Buffalo is estimated at about 250,000 cubic feet per second, and it has a fal of 165 feet. This immense force is equal to 7,000,000 horse power, or the energy of 147,000,000 able-bodied men—exerting the force of so many men working night and day and every second of time. The full utilization of this force is far in the future, but the present company hav a charter to use 450,000 horse-power on the American side and the same amount on the Canadian side, making 900,000 horse-power as their limit. This would be equal to the energy of 18,900,000 men. The present plant, however, will use only 125,000 horse-power, and the turbines are now in place for only a small part of this. This great free power will be applied just as fast as there is a demand for it, until the whole of it is in use. Yet this Niagara is only an atom from the universe! It is but one local partial application of the universal force of gravitation, that sleepless giant that plays with planets and suns as boys do with spinning-tops. Men need to eat, and sleep, and rest. Even steam engines must be fed with coal. But here is absolutely a free and eternal worker to take the place of the human laborer. But the advantages of such natural forces are supplemented by labor-saving machinery. What was the effect of the invention of Whitney's cotton gin? Now comes Whitney's grandson, and claims that he has eclipsed his progenitor by the invention of a cotton harvester, which, with two men and two horses will do the work of one hundred men.

I believe the only great staples in the production of which this country is deficient are wool and sugar, but more especially the latter. A planter who has 4,000 acres of beets in San Bernardino county, Cal., and 2,000 acres more near San Francisco, says that the crop will amount to 55,000 to 60,000 tons, and that but for the dry weather it would hav been 100,000. He claims that there is enough good beet land in the state south of San Francisco to supply the whole world with sugar. (I get this last item from an educational paper, Our Times, in the November issue.)

The newspapers are crowded with accounts of late achievements in the line of labor-saving discoveries and appliances, some of them, no doubt, somewhat uncertain yet. Some one seriously proposes boring into the earth, not for gas or oil, for that is already a fact, but to get free access to the internal heat of our little planet? Chimerical? Well, may be—I am not sure. It is said that the Evil One, tempting our Lord in his hunger, suggested that he might "command that these stones be made bread." That was a wise and benevolent suggestion, and if it had been heeded, and "the author and finisher of our faith" had transmitted the power of making such transubstantiation to his followers, it would not only hav made Palestine the granary of the world, but it would hav secured the immediate success of Christianity. I see nothing abhorrent in the suggestion of Satan. Therefore, I am prepared to welcome to the ranks of human benefactors those daring geniuises who declare that they are about to take a short cut on nature in the direct production of organic substances from inorganic elements. For instance, eggs will be made by machinery, and that old question of which came first, the egg or the chicken? will be relegated to the rubbish of the past. But all these yet unrealized schemes are not at all necessary to our argument, for it seems to me scarcely a debatable proposition that labor-saving machinery does save labor, and saves it to starve the displaced laborer to death. In Mr. Gunther's old neighborhood labor had not been displaced, for though "all hand labor had ceased the population had increased about one-third, and wages had more than doubled." If Mr. Gunther had compared the present per capita production with the past, he might hav seen that, although the working population there had increased somewhat, hand labor in distant places had also ceased, without any machine or factory employment to take its place. But, quoth Mr. Gunther, "those who can hardly earn money enough to sustain life cannot afford to pension others." Well, then, who does it now—for we hav more idlers than workers with us now? But I do not believe Mr. Gunther will take issue with me on anything I hav said.

Arthur read a hastily prepared essay, as nothing more availabe chanced to be at hand.

"EGOISTIC PHILOSOPHY.

"'A philosopher in a passion, like a hero in his night-shirt, would seem an incongruous spectacle to the popular fancy,' writes a gifted author, 'and yet, shall not even the philosopher get in a passion when there is occasion for it, and would you hav the hero go to bed without his night-shirt?'

"The popular idea of a philosopher is one who has, or must possess, repose of manner and studied carelessness. 'Calm as Greek art.' But, as Shakspere has written, 'There never was yet a philosopher could endure the toothache patiently.' 'I pray you peace, I will be flesh and blood.' 'Serenity too often masks the real symbol of perpetual weariness and unrest.' And the aspirant for the honors of philosophy must not be bound by emotion, be it pleasurable or otherwise. Why? Because the affections are fruitful sources of both inward and outward disturbances. 'Propose to yourself not too many objects, if you would hav a tranquil mind.' So with the student in the school of philosophy. Subordination of disturbing susceptibilities is a necessity, requisit for cultivation of tranquility. And yet, shall one giv up all happiness merely to become a philosopher? And such a philosopher! Less human and less humane than the average of men? No! As Lovelace has declared in a burst of soulful melody:

'Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds, innocent and quiet, take
That for a heritage.
If I hav freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.'

"Kindred with this popular illusion is the conviction of many minds that altruistic—other-than-yourself-istic—is the proper form of philosophy, but which is, however, a 'method of procedure extremely inconvenient for "others."' The point in philosophy which justifies its course, is to make the current of human life flow as smoothly as possible. To secure one's own comfort is to promote that of others. And egoism is contentment.

'I quarrel not with destiny,
The best is good enough for me!'

declares the poet, who, satisfied with little—'a little more than enough,' as Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes pleasantly suggests, resigns himself to the inevitable. 'Blessed are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed.' Egoism would offer a consolation for the renouncing of pleasurable anticipation in the great! The unexpected!"

Arthur ceased reading, with a final emphasis on the last words, which the "old clock on the stairs" gave still greater significance in pealing out the chime of four; and the Club adjourned. IDA BALLOU.

Sense.

All that we feel, think, and are, is the result of sense. We sense a thing by feeling it through mental or bodily faculties. We are said to hav five senses; but really they are all resolved into the one sense of feeling. We feel with the eye, the ear, the nose, and all parts of us.

We feel good, bad, or indifferent, according as we are in good health or good spirits.

We sense the grand, the good, and the beautiful, and we feel thrilled all through into a joyous gladness. We sense sorrow, sin, and misery, and our mind is filled with sadness, regret, and mourning. But Mother Nature has given to the most of us a strong yearning for all that is sweet, loving, and good, so that we cheerily look on the sunny side; and hence are most apt to sense the true and the pleasing. People are said to hav good sense when they do right, proper, and wise acts.

An old philosopher says: "We hardly find any persons of good sense save those who agree with us." The reason of this is, we do not appreciate or fully understand those who do not think as we do.

We think our own opinions are right, and all who believe differently from us are wrong. Of course if we thought we believed a wrong thing, we could not keep that belief. We believe as we must, as we hav sense or reason to. We cannot believe fire will freeze us, or that an apple-tree will produce potatoes, because our senses tell us it is not natural.

We all like being thought to be sensible; to be full of good sense, to hav good judgment and understanding. AUNT ELM.

Correspondence.

CROSBY, TEX., Nov. 21, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write again, as I saw my other letter in print. I was glad to see it in print. I think Mary L. Merritt wrote a nice letter for a girl of nine. I wish I could write a letter similar to that. I hope the day will come when one can speak a word of their own belief without its breaking the heart of a sky-pilot or other Christian. There was a preacher here for about four months, and got five members, and is still preaching; but he doesn't get any more members; he has about three or four families to hear him preach. Well, I don't think they will get me to join any of their churches by howling around. If I wanted to join their "holy band" I would do it in my right mind; they wouldn't scare me into it. My idea is that if there is any such place as heaven everybody will go there after they die, but as to there being two places, a good and a bad, I think it is pretty thin; and if there is I don't think God would be merciful to send the Freethinkers to the bad place after giving them that belief. I think if the Christians would study a little they wouldn't be so sure of that heaven business. Well, I had better close for fear of that waste-basket. I remain your Freethinker friend, BELLE HARVEY.

"The Better World" is a study in idealistic conditions, after the manner of "Looking Backward," and a host of successors. The author endeavors to show us a people in the enjoyment of life as an intelligent, matter-of-fact way, without selfishness, avarice, and fear. They are too good-natured to need lawyers; diet and cleanliness hav abolished any need of doctors; and they are all so sensibly, naturally good, that preachers are unknown among them. The purpose of the book is to show how present conditions may be improved; and with all the extravagant vein given to fancy, there are some interesting and thought-provoking suggestions.

F. D. Cummings' book, "Religion and the Bible," is an effort to reconcile with a practical, working faith in natural religion and in the moral precepts of Christ, the inaccuracies and unexplainable inconsistencies of the Scriptures. It pleads in a convincing way for toleration in religious beliefs, and points out that some activ, operating, religious principle is important to all, especially to those who hav no faith in a hereafter. Yet, for all this, there is an unsparing criticism of the faults and weaknesses of current Christianity.—Portland Oregonian.

"How Weak and Diseased Lungs Are Now Cured."

IN A SERIES OF ARTICLES BY ROBERT HUNTER.

Dr. Robert Hunter, the great specialist on weak lungs and lung troubles, contributes to The Truth Seeker his valuable book, wherein he shows how consumption can be avoided and how it can be cured. It should be read with great interest, as it shows how many lives can be saved with a little care. His book will be published in The Truth Seeker, a chapter every week.

INTRODUCTION.

In publishing my book I have endeavored to explain, in plain, untechnical terms, the nature of consumption—the manner in which it is contracted—the causes which produce it—how it is to be prevented, and what must be done to cure it. In doing this I feel that I confer an inestimable benefit on the whole people by placing before them knowledge which, if received intelligently, will save many from the most dreaded disease known to mankind. Unquestionably diseases of the breathing organs are less understood by the public and treated with poorer results by the general profession than any other class of maladies in the whole range of medical practice.

The records of the Board of Health inform us that in a single year the deaths by throat and lung complaints in New York City were 14,698 out of a total of 35,975—or 40 per cent. of the whole mortality.

This frightful sacrifice of human life could not occur if pulmonary diseases were treated with any degree of success, or were not, under the usual means employed by physicians, practically incurable and hopeless. Many prominent people during the past years have passed from life by lung diseases which began in simple attacks of congestion of the lungs. General Sherman, Mrs. Harrison, and Jay Gould are significant examples. They were in perfect health when attacked—surrounded by all comforts—able to command competent medical care, with all the aids to health that wealth can buy, and yet were not saved. Why? Because there was not virtue enough in that medical treatment they employed, from both the schools of allopathy and homeopathy combined, to arrest Mrs. Harrison's "influenza," break up Gen. Sherman's "cold," or cure Jay Gould's "bronchitis."

And yet all this in face of the fact that we have remedies perfectly adequate to the mastery even of consumption. But where a task of such acknowledged difficulty is to be accomplished as the cure of consumption, not only are the needful remedies requisite, but their use must be directed with masterly intelligence and an extended knowledge and experience of the true nature of lung cases. Precious lives should not be frittered away and sacrificed by piddling palliatives, which do no good, are totally without power to arrest the attack, and actually increase the danger by stifling the natural functions of the body.

Until physicians generally learn to appreciate that sedatives, hypnotics, and hypodermic injections only poison the patient's blood, and injure, instead of benefiting, his lungs, they can never succeed in lung cases. Such treatment actually robs the lungs of their natural power of healing.

The treatment of the air passages and lungs by volatilized antiseptics and curative agents—applied directly to the inflamed and affected parts, within the lungs, by inhalation—is the only course that ever succeeds. The antiseptics are necessary to destroy the germs, and the healing medicines to repair the injuries they and the disease have inflicted on the lungs. This is the essence of my cure.

The arrest of consumption and the restoration of the lung to health by it I know by the assurance of actual experience. I saved my own life by inhaled remedies, after the late Dr Swett of New York, Dr. Williams of London, and Baron Louis of Paris—the highest French authority—had pronounced me in incurable consumption. I have since then—for forty years—made an exhaustive study of pulmonary diseases, and in thousands of instances have succeeded in the cure of consumption after other treatments have been tried in vain. The verity of cures I have effected is indisputable. No case in a court of law was ever proved by a greater array of unimpeachable witnesses in its favor than has been the truth and success of antiseptic air inhalations in lung diseases.

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surface. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Books by SALADIN.

(W. STEWART ROSS),
Editor of the London Agnostic Journa

GOD AND HIS BOOK.
When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.
The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

CHRISTIANITY and the SLAVE TRADE.
A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.
A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and Science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.
Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods: Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.
This books reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.
The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.
By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. Paper, 10c.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.
Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. Paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.
A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" Paper, 25 cents

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES,

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

MARK TWAIN says: "Adam was but human. He did not want the apple for the apple's sake; he wanted it only because it was forbidden. The mistake was in not forbidding the serpent; then he would hav eaten the serpent."

CLERGYMAN: "John, I hope you are trying to do what is right." John: "Yes, sir; I teach my children the commandments." Clergyman: "But what we do is of more importance than what we say." John: "Yes, sir; but it would be mighty tejus to keep all of them commandments." —Voice.

ANOTHER church-fair story comes to us, relativ to raising money to pay off church debts. A friend meeting a deacon on the street, asked: "Are you not going to get up a fair to pay off the debt on the church?" "We were going to," replied the worthy deacon; "but the congregation heard of the rumor, and raised the money at once." —Oakland Saturday Press.

"THIS morning," writes a Sunday-school teacher, "I gave the children a little talk about their souls. When I had done I thought I would ask them a few questions to see if they understood what I had told them. So I began, 'What did the almighty giv us besides our bodies?' Perhaps you can imagin my emotions when they instantly responded 'Laigs!'"

"I NEVER in my life," said Dean Stanley to his wife, after a sermon in Westminster Abbey, "so touched the congregation. They were entranced; every eye was upon me from the first word to the last." "No wonder," said Lady Augusta; "your gloves were inside of your hat, and when you took it off they remained on the top of your head all through the sermon."

A STORY is told by a French paper of two provincials, a man and his wife, who visited the Louvre in Paris. "What struck you most at the Louvre?" asked one of their friends, when they returned home and began to tell of the wonders they had seen. "Oh," replied the husband, "a picture that represented Adam and Eve, with the apple and the serpent." And his excellent wife chimed in, "Yes, we found that very interesting, because, you know, we knew the anecdote."

WHEN you see a clergyman wearing a white cravat, and a long-tailed coat buttoned up to his chin, closely shaved, and kid gloves upon his lily-white hands, you see a man who has his sign hung out, which signifies: "I don't belong to the common herd; I stand upon an elevated pedestal; I demand reverence on account of my cloth; I expect that all the goods I buy will be discounted in price, and that on all occasions special favors will be meted out to me." "But a man's a man for a' that," says Robert B.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati.

"MRS. TRULIGOODE has made applications for divorce, I hear." "You don't say? Why, it was only a short time ago that her husband was converted and joined the church." "I know it. That was the cause of the trouble. You see since his conversion, Truligoode has been in the habit of going alone to the evening experience meetings. Full of the spirit of the occasion, he would get up and tell what a bad man he had been; indeed he seemed to take pride in recounting his slips while he was in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity. The other night Mrs. Truligoode dropped into the meeting, and from a back seat heard his confession, and when he closed, by saying his eyes were now opened to the knowledge of his sinfulness, her eyes were opened, too. She went next day to her lawyer, and proceedings for a divorce were begun."—Secular Thought.

WHEN we remember how difficult it is even for the adult mind to attempt to grasp the conception of God, we need not wonder that children are utterly puzzled over it. As their ideas of all scriptural things come from the scriptures, it is wholly natural that the anthropomorphism of the Bible should tinge all their ideas of deity. Ruskin says that when he was a child he had a very reverent conception of God, as a grave old man, with a long, white beard, clothed in a flowered dressing-gown; which conception, no doubt, had come to him from some old picture. A friend was telling me, the other day, of a little fellow who came to his mother with the inquiry: "Mamma, do you believe that God can see everything?" His mother assured him that God was omniscient, explaining to him what the term meant. "But I know, mamma, there is something that God cannot see." The mother, naturally, was shocked at the little skeptic's asseveration. "But I know he can't see everything!" "What can't he see?" "Why, mamma, he can't see the top of his own head."—Margaret J. Preston, in the Chautauquan.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE

BETTER WORLD.

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Gems of Thought.

RELIGION is the shadow of which culture is the substance. The one pretends to be what the other is in reality.—Grant Allen.

THE world owes no man a living save as he earns it or is willing to earn it. It owes him, however, the opportunity to earn it. —Alexander Kent.

A MIRACLE is the badge and brand of fraud. No miracle ever was performed. No intelligent, honest man ever pretended to perform a miracle, and never will.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

I SOMETIMES find myself surmising whether a people who, like the Americans, put up quietly with all sorts of petty personal imposition and injustice, will not at length find it too great a bore to quarrel with great public wrongs.—James Russell Lowell.

A GREAT story, exhibiting the features of a universal sympathy, and a vision that is not deceived by much clothing into obsequiousness or by little into Puritanical horror, enters into history far more influentially than a battle or a new code of laws.—Horace L. Traubel.

CRIME is incurable, save by that gradual process of adaptation to the social state which humanity is undergoing. Crime is the continual breaking out of the old unadapted nature—the index of a character unfitted to its conditions; and only as fast as the unfitness diminishes can crime diminish.—Herbert Spencer.

THE real Freethinker accepts truth from whatever source it comes, and cheerfully concedes the right of his neighbor to strive for happiness at his own cost. The real Christian accepts such truth only as he thinks the Bible sanctions and insists that his neighbor shall seek for happiness in such ways only as the Bible appears to approve.—E. C. Walker.

FAR better to be a bonnet rougè of the barricades, my friends, than to be a conservatist, if conservatism makes it our duty to let all the drains of thought choke up and keep the soul's windows down, to shut out the sun and the breezes, till the soul sickens with moral typhus and we begin to snore in its coma or rave in its delirium. —Oliver Wendell Holmes.

INSTEAD of encouraging civilization, Christianity actually retards it. Religion consists in serving God. Religionists serve God as subjects serve kings. In both cases, means are sacrificed for the benefit of their superior. In both cases, they rely for happiness on supplication. In both cases, they hope to avert misfortune by flattery. In both cases, they accept information credulously instead of seeking it curiously.—Albert M. Lorentz.

IT has long been scientifically acknowledged that morality, as such, is far older than religion, which at first was limited to certain metaphysical theories, which must be accepted on the authority of ancestors. Mr. E. B. Tylor has shown us that the relation between morality and religion is at first very insignificant and of second-rate importance. Primitiv animism, the earliest form of religion, has no moral relations whatever. Morality comes only as the consequence and result of the inevitable necessities of social intercourse, so that in primitiv peoples morality does not extend beyond their own race, and does not include the people of foreign races.—Ludwig Büchner.

Now, the good a man does livs after him, although the man who did the good has, after death, no conscious knowledge of it. The discovery of chloroform is still of immense good to humanity, although Professor Simpson, who introduced it, is dead. Personally, for years past I hav had no hope of a future life; but that has had no effect in preventing me from striving to do something to leave the world better than I found it. There is not the slightest substantial evidence extant for the belief in a future life; while the belief in eternal sleep after death is a thousandfold better than the Christian doctrin that ninety per cent of humanity are to be tortured forever. Professor Momerie cries out for immortality. How does he know that, if he got it, he would not be one of those who are to be either roasted or frozen for all eternity?—Lex Naturæ, in Agnostic Journal.

AGAIN, that spirit of science which we cultivate and represent is at once modest in its own claims and liberal to the claims of others. The first lesson which every sound student learns is to follow his facts and not to lead them. New facts teach him new conclusions. His opinions of today must be modified by the learning of the morrow. He is at all times ready and willing to abandon a position when further investigation shows that it is probably incorrectly taken. He is in this the reverse of the opinionated man, the hobby rider, and the dogmatist. The despair of the scientific assemblage is the member with a pet theory, with a fixed idea, which he is bound to obtrude and defend in the face of facts. Yet even toward him we are called upon to exercise our toleration and our charity, for the history of learning has repeatedly shown that from just such wayward enthusiasts solid knowledge has derived some of its richest contributions. So supreme, after all, is energy, that error itself, pursued with fervid devotion, yields a more bountiful harvest than truth languidly cultivated.—Daniel G. Brinton.

Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES
A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

AN officer of the Austrian army has been court-martialed and reduced to the ranks for wearing crape when dressed as a civilian and acting as a marshal at the funeral of Louis Kossuth.

THE Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals offers a reward of $25 for evidence sufficient to convict for violation of the state law against vivisections and dissections in the public schools.

JEAN VICTOR DURUY, the Academician and historian, died recently in Paris, aged eighty-three. His seat in the Academy has been filled by Henry Houssaye. As Minister of Education he was bitterly opposed by the clericals.

THE High Court of Justice of Hungary has decided that Francis Kossuth, son of Louis Kossuth, is eligible to a seat in the Reichstag and Deputy Fouszek, an aged friend of the elder Kossuth, will resign his seat in favor of Francis.

CONGRESS began its short session on Monday, Dec. 3. The president's message was long and made several important recommendations, especially regarding the currency, all of which our readers will find in their political papers.

SENATOR BUTLER, of South Carolina, is trying to get the election law of that state declared unconstitutional, because of its discrimination against colored voters. He has been three times elected Senator by legislatures chosen under that law.

LEON ABBETT, ex-governor and supreme court justice at the time of his death, died at his home in Jersey City on Dec. 4. He was one of the best known of the Eastern members of the Democratic party. He was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 8, 1836.

THE English Liberals hav lost another seat, this time in Lincolnshire. They recently lost one in Forfarshire, Scotland. This reduces their working majority to about ten, as the Parnellites are pledged to oppose them on all questions. Dissolution seems to be near.

REUBEN F. KOLB, signing himself "Governor de jure of Alabama," has issued a proclamation to the legislature and the people of that state. He advises his supporters to form clubs to assist the general object of his appeal for their rights, and to pay no taxes at present.

A BILL has been introduced in the Alabama legislature making it a penal offense for anyone to attempt to exercise the duties of an office to which he has not been regularly declared elected. This is aimed at Kolb and the other Populists who recently had themselvs sworn in as state officers.

MRS. CLEVELAND has decided that the painting by Watts, "Love and Life," refused a place in the White House by Colonel Wilson after the artist had presented it to the government, shall go to the Smithsonian Institution. She thinks that the presidential residence was not intended to be an art gallery.

SOME time ago the name of the Old Court House of Appomattox county, Va., was changed to "Surrender" by the post office department. The change created a great excitement, but it has now been decided to let the new name stand and to change the name of Nebraska, which town is now the county seat, to Appomattox.

THE emperor of Austria-Hungary has approved the ecclesiastical bills adopted by the Hungarian Parliament. These are all in behalf of religious freedom. One legalizes civil marriages, another removes restrictions regarding children whose parents are of different beliefs, another lifts Hebrews to the plane of religious equality, and the fourth permits conversions from Christianity to Judaism.

COUNT FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, the projector of the Suez Canal, died in Paris on Dec 7. Since the Panama revelations he has been in a state of comatose somnolence. He did not know of his trial and conviction nor of the imprisonment of his son. At the age of sixty he married Mlle. de Bragard, aged nineteen, and eleven children have been born to them, the last in 1885. De Lessops was eighty-nine at the time of his death.

THE World has sent its reporters around among the tenement houses owned by Trinity Church Corporation, and it sums up the result of their observations in the statements that "Its ramshackle tenement houses are not fit for human habitation;" that they lack light and ventilation, are "filthy, squalid quarters, with water only in backyards." Richard Watson Gilder says the corporation should take immediate steps to improve these premises.

GOVERNOR HOGG, of Texas, sent a requisition to Governor Flower, of New York, for several of the Standard Oil Company's officials, who are accused of violating the anti-trust law of Texas. Governor Flower refused to honor the requisition because of some technical defect, but it is also claimed that citizens of one state cannot be taken to another state to answer a criminal charge unless they are "fugitivs from justice" from the latter state.

THAT ILL-HUMORED OLD JOSS MAKES SOME MORE IDLE THREATS.—Zeph. i, 2, 3.

To the Senate and Assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York:

We citizens of the State of New York, respectfully request you to repeal the Sunday law of this State. We ask this because,

First, Sunday being a period of time of precisely the same nature as Saturday or Monday, there is no natural reason for its being elevated above or depressed below the other days of the week.

Second, Said Sunday law is, in the best possible view of it, useless; it is wholly inoperative as a conserver of the rights of any inhabitant of the State.

Third, It is invasive of the equal rights of the citizens of the State, an impertinent meddling with their private affairs, and its effect is to disturb their peace and rob them of their earnings.

Fourth, In making or amending our laws, common sense and experience should be the guides, instead of sentiment—religious or otherwise. Experience has demonstrated that Sunday laws are not observed by the people, and common sense teaches that, in the nature of things, they never will be, for it cannot be wrong to do on one day what it is right to do on another. The people, feeling this and knowing this, will not be governed by the dead churchmen who made these laws, which are anachronistic and have been perpetuated by hypocrisy. Here we will call your attention to the words of Martin Luther, a churchman we are willing to put against the ecclesiastics of to-day: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake,—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it—to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Fifth, Sunday laws are vicious, for they are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities, as the revelations of the Lexow Committee abundantly show. They produce more crime than they could possibly prevent, for blackmail is more immoral than drinking.

Sixth, All such laws are essentially religious in their intent and effect and as such they are opposed to the spirit of our institutions, which do not favor the union of church and state. The Sunday law of the State of New York is no exception to the rule, and it should be immediately repealed in the interest of religious liberty, if for no other reason. This law is a survival from the time when there was a state church and the civil power enforced the Sunday law of the state church, just as it enforced that church's blasphemy and heresy statutes. But where there is no state church the state has nothing to do with the enforcement of the domestic rules of any church or those of Christianity in its entirety.

For these and other reasons we ask the entire repeal of the Sunday laws rather than a patching which shall discriminate against one business and foster another. We ask that the liquor trade be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days, and the same with all other kinds of business. It is not proper for the state to legislate in the interests of any legitimate trade as against any other legitimate trade, and we ask your careful attention to this admitted fact and particularly ask you to bear in mind the also admitted fact that Sunday laws are a fruitul source and an adequate means of blackmail.

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

THE

Truth Seeker Annual for 1895

CONTAINS AN ARTICLE BY

MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE:

"WHAT THE CHURCH HAS NOT DONE FOR WOMAN."

"Down With the Bible."

Mr. Charles Watts did not win a seat on the London School Board, but he made a strong fight in Finsbury and has sounded the keynote of the issue for coming years. He polled 7,642 votes, about one thousand less than Mr. Forder received three years ago. But the religious question was not so much in evidence in Mr. Forder's canvass. Besides, there was another secular education candidate this year—Mr. Hobert, Social Democrat, who received 4,065 votes. Three years ago Mr. Forder had the support of the Pall Mall Gazette, the Daily News, the Star, and other organs of the political Liberals. This year the secular vote was cast on a clear-cut issue—it was for no religious instruction of any kind in the public schools. As Mr. Foote says, it "can be depended upon as a solid nucleus in all future struggles." It was cast in the face of the most strenuous appeals not to "split the Progressiv vote." This year Mr. Watts was boycotted by the entire press. The "Progressiv" newspapers refused to report his meetings; during the last week of the contest they failed to print any but the "Progressiv" list of candidates. Thus the public was denied the information it had a right to expect; thousands of voters did not know that Mr. Watts was running. This would not hav mattered much in a small district, but Finsbury is miles in extent and has ninety thousand electors. Again, all the Liberal and Radical party machinery in London was used in the interest of the "Progressiv" candidates. Many who called themselvs Secularists, "men who profess unbounded admiration for the late Charles Bradlaugh, were battling for the 'Compromise'—that is, for forcing the Bible upon helpless little children in the public schools," as Mr. Foote expresses it. Then the fight was a stand-up one between church and chapel, that is, between the established church and the dissenting sects. Each brought out all its reserves, the usual "stay-at-home" vote. The result was a phenomenally large poll.

Mr. Watts himself, Mr. Foote, Mr. Wheeler, and other Secular leaders are not despondent over the result; they hav learned some valuable lessons, and will make the most of them. They know now where their friends are and just what the religious party intends to do. They are glad the vote they polled had the effect of defeating some "Progressiv" candidates, and they are determined to go ahead and defeat more in the next election, and keep on doing so until the people become tired of the farce of religious instruction in the schools and join with the secularists to make a square issue against the clericals of all degrees of orthodoxy. The total secular instruction vote has been increased in London from 21,352 to 72,074. This includes the Socialistic vote, the platform of that party pledging its candidates to non-religious instruction. Concluding his review of the situation, Mr. G. W. Foote says:

"The 'Progressivs' who think the religious question can be shirked are grievously mistaken. It has been raised once for all, and it must be settled. Church and chapel will go on fighting each other until the 'secular' constable comes in to restore peace. As a matter of fact—and Mr. Diggle [clerical] gloats over it—the 'Progressivs' hav pledged themselvs absolutely to Bible-reading. In other words, the Bible is to be kept in the schools forever as God's word; and men like Graham Wallas are promoting the monstrous swindle! Very well then. It is a plain challenge to the party of secular education, and those who are found in the enemy's camp will know what to expect when we confront them. Meanwhile there is a great duty incumbent on Secularists. No alternativ is left us but to show the real nature of this book which is forced upon board-school children. We shall hav to prosecute an anti-Bible campaign with all possible vigor in London and perhaps especially in Finsbury. Lectures must be delivered, telling leaflets must be scattered, and the reticence of mere etiquet must be thrown to the winds. Church and chapel are all one to us; so are 'Diggleite' and 'Progressiv.' They stand by an open Bible [in the schools], and the Bible must be the object of our attack. Those who thought the time for 'destructiv criticism' was over hav been living in a fool's paradise. We must do our utmost to open the eyes of the multitude, and our war cry in this great fight is, 'Down with the Bible.'"

Judicial Inconsequentialities and Sophisms.

The Supreme Court of Michigan recently affirmed the constitutionality of the Sunday law of that state. The legal friend who sends us some excerpts from the decision of the court thinks that that part of it which deals with the physiological aspects of the question is an obiter dictum, inasmuch as the court had stated that the issue before it was one simply of constitutional interpretation. With all due respect for the probably superior judgment of our friend in a technical matter of this kind, we nevertheless must express our opinion that the judges were under the necessity of showing that it was constitutional to compel the observance of a day of rest, else they would be obliged to declare the state Sunday law invalid, for, leaving the exception clause to one side as a mere incident not vitally affecting the law either pro or con, it is clear that the statute in question is a piece of religious legislation, and as such is forbidden by the constitution of the state. But when the exception clause is taken into consideration, it is, if possible, still clearer that the Sunday law of Michigan is unconstitutional. With these facts staring them in the face, it is not strange that the judges cast about them for "sanitary" sanctions for the statute, and this is why they quoted the paragraph from Cooley's "Constitutional Sanctions," the intent being to show that, while the man who had religiously observed one day of the week by abstaining from labor could not be compelled to observe another, the exemption clause which protected him could not be invoked to shelter another man who had failed to keep some special holy day and who yet worked on Sunday. The Supreme Court of Michigan was remorselessly forced by the constitution of the state to find in the decisions of other courts and in that vague thing, "the police power of the state," a secular, that is, human need and justification for Sunday laws, as the constitution itself debarred it from sustaining the law on divine grounds. Of course it is indisputable that the decision is in flagrant defiance of the state constitution; but this is not the first state supreme court which has so flouted the organic law, and we might as well make up our minds now as later that until the people get their eyes open and arise in their strength and destroy the political church the courts will continue to decide that Sunday laws are constitutional because they are not in the nature of religious legislation, although every unprejudiced person who has common sense knows that they are. Until we hav judges who get their interpretation of our constitutions from those instruments themselvs instead of from the American Sabbath Union and its allies, we shall continue to hav decisions handed down which brush aside the organic laws' inhibition of Sunday statutes with the specious plea that it is "as sanitary" safeguards that these statutes are enacted, and that, as such, they are constitutional.

In the case before us the court seems to hav been anxious to make the Sunday law perpetual, to remove all objections that might be raised against it, for it went outside of the argument of counsel to answer possible criticisms. The court says:

"Another question which naturally presents itself, but which has not been discussed by respondent's counsel, is whether the law is open to the objection that it is class legislation for the reason that those who observe the seventh day of the week are excepted from its provisions."

A Louisana case is cited in which it was held that such a provision is unconstitutional, because it discriminates between religious sects; but the provision has been in force in Michigan since 1846, and while the question has never been passed upon directly, its validity has been assumed in a number of cases. The question was raised in Indiana, where the constitution contains this inhibition:

"The general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or to any class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not belong equally to all citizens."

In the light of this, the Indiana court said of the Sunday law of that state:

"The framers of the statute meant to leave it to the consciences and judgments of the citizens to choose between the first and seventh days of the week. One or the other of these days they must refrain from common labor. Which it shall be is to be determined by their own consciences. It was not the purpose of the lawmakers to compel any class of conscientious persons to abstain from labor upon two days in every week."

We quote this here in order to ask why the legislature assumed that those who did not care to abstain from "common labor" on either of these days should be branded as persons who are not conscientious, and why every citizen must abstain from labor on one or the other of these days? The Indiana Sunday statute is undoubtedly unconstitutional, for it grants to Adventists and ordinary Christians a privilege not granted on the same terms "equally to all citizens." These two classes of Christians are permitted to choose the days upon which they will work and the day upon which they will rest, a right of choice expressly denied to all other citizens. (Of course, we include with the Adventists the Jews and all other seventh-day people.)

The Michigan court also refers to the decision of the Ohio Supreme Court, which held that a Sunday law without the exception clause was unconstitutional. Now, as we hav already shown by their own words, all this talk about the possible class legislation of the seventh-day exception clause was entirely outside the question raised by the respondent's counsel, and seems to hav been introduced for the purpose of darkening the argument as affecting the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the Sunday statute. Section Thirty-nine of Article Four of the constitution of Michigan declares that "the legislature shall pass no law to prevent any person from worshiping Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience." By what right does the legislature assume that mere abstention from labor constitutes worship according to the dictates of one's conscience, while to engage in work is a demonstration that one is not worshiping according to the dictates of his conscience? If the legislature is correct in its assumption, then the tramp is engaged in worship while the minister and church organist are not. Certainly it needs no argument to prove that the right not to worship is the correlativ of the right to worship; neither is of any value without the other. If one has no choice he has no liberty. Therefore, the Sunday law of Michigan is violativ of the constitution of that state. But there is more in that instrument that the court has overlooked or to which it has purposely shut its eyes. Section Forty-one of Article Four reads as follows:

"The legislature shall not diminish or enlarge the civil or political rights, privileges, or capacities of any person on account of his opinion or belief concerning matters of religion."

And the legislature has immediately, deliberately, and directly proceeded to do the very thing which it was expressly forbidden to do, and now comes the Supreme Court and sustains it in its usurpation of power. The legislature has enlarged the civil rights, privileges, and capacities of Christians and diminished the civil rights, privileges, and capacities of non-Christians, and it has done this because in the one instance they were Christians and in the other instance they were not Christians. Ministerial and lay representativs of the church hav gone to the legislature and demanded that a certain day which they believe or claim to believe is holy shall be set aside for purposes of worship ("rest" is a very modern euphemism for worship) and that whosoever works or plays on this day of worship shall be punished by the civil powers. The legislature has granted their request. Thus those who do not believe in Christianity or in the Sunday dogma are compelled to render obedience to certain commands of the church under stress of the pains and penalties of the law. The Christians because they are Christians are enabled to dominate over the rationalists because they are rationalists. Christians may choose which of two days they will hav for worship or idleness without worship, but the non-Christian can hav no right of choice as to which days he will employ in labor or recreation, so far as the one day which the orthodox Christian holds to be sacred is concerned. The Constitution of Michigan forbids legislation in the interest of religion. The legislature of Michigan legislates in the interest of religion, and the Supreme Court of the state decides that these religious enactments are constitutional, because, forsooth, the legislature is qualified to decide when the citizen is tired enough to need rest and does not know enough to rest of his own volition!

The court next proceeds to reason regarding the alleged "sanitary" basis for Sunday laws, and in so doing it incidentally pulls aside the veil from the face of the Fury of religious intolerance, who for her own base purposes is just now masquerading as the Angel of Rest for the poor, down-trodden "laborer." It says:

"The better reason for maintaining the police power to prohibit citizens from engaging in secular pursuits on Sunday is the necessity of such regulation as a sanitary measure. As to those employments which are noiseless, and harmless in themselvs, and conducted in a manner not calculated to offend those who, from religious scruples, observe Sunday as the Lord's day, this necessity appears to be the only valid source of legislativ power; and this is based upon the fact that experience has demonstrated that one day's rest is requisit for the health of most individuals, and not all individuals possess the power to observe a day of their own volition."

Here we are told that under conceivable contingencies certain industries might be permitted on Sunday were it not that those engaged in them should be compelled to rest for their health's sake. What are these might-be-allowed industries? Those that are "noiseless and harmless in themselvs," it is replied. And what is the contingency under which these noiseless and in themselvs harmless occupations may be engaged in by the citizen? Why, bless you, he may engage in noiseless and harmless work on Sunday when he does so "in a manner not calculated to offend those who, from religious scruples, observe Sunday as the Lord's day"! The mask is off, the veil is lifted, and now we know that we may do as we please in innocent work—if the state thinks we do not need to rest and if we labor in a way not to offend the "religious scruples" of the Christian! So it is not to protect the Christian from noisy Sunday work and the citizen from demoralizing traffic that we hav "Sabbath" laws. Such statutes are designed to prevent the Christian from having his feelings hurt by the sight or knowledge of work done on the Lord's day! No matter how innocent in itself the man's occupation may be; no matter how quiet he is, he is still deserving of punishment—in addition to what he should get for not "resting" when good grandmother state thinks that he should—if his labors "offend" the "religious scruples" of some superstitious Christian! Nothing is said about the possibility of his offending any but "religious" scruples, or people with that kind of scruples. Presumably the scruples of none but Christians would be hurt by work that was at once noiseless and harmless, and it needs to be said right here that theirs would not be if all such work were not in competition with the noisy and harmful work of the pulpit tyrants. In this connection it is in order for the Michigan judges to explain what justification there is for Sunday laws forbidding quiet and harmless amusements. The "rest" pretense is not available, for even judges should know that the best rest is change, and that therefore all forms of recreation that are not in themselvs unhygienic are beneficial and cannot be forbidden on Sunday on "sanitary" grounds to those who hav labored on other days. But we all know that the true Sabbatarian hates Sunday amusements with as virulent and unreasoning a hatred as he does Sunday work, and for precisely the same reason—they "offend" his "religious scruples." This fact exposes the hollowness and hypocrisy of the priest's suddenly developed interest in the cause of weekly "rest" and "sanitation."

In a future article we shall continue this subject, exposing more judicial sophisms and tracing the genesis of the Puritan Sunday.

The Campaign in This State.

We hope our readers will giv us what moral and financial aid they can in circulating the petition to the legislature for the repeal of the Sunday laws in this state. It is particularly the fight of the citizens of New York, but as every struggle of this kind anywhere in the country helps in all states, aid from outsiders interested in the attempt to realize the Nine Demands will not be refused.

The time is particularly opportune this winter, as there is to be a general discussion of the Sunday issue at Albany. The liquor dealers of the state seem to hav been promised by both parties—and very strongly by the party which won in the late election—that their interests shall be considered, and legislation in their interests enacted. This is generally understood to mean opening the saloons for a portion of each Sunday. Of course such legislation will be strenuously resisted by the ecclesiastics, who see in this another chance for the people to slip away from them. The matter will be argued pro and con, and the church will show her hand, and the clergy are sure to expose the real animus of their protests against the proposed law, which is to save to themselvs the day on which they earn their living.

This will giv the Freethinkers their opportunity, and they will miss it sadly if they do not jump in and see that the legislators hav the true doctrin on the Sunday question presented to them.

We propose to send the petitions out all through the state, together with printed arguments against any Sunday legislation; to get the petitions signed numerously and presented to every member of the Senate and Assembly; and when the Sunday legislation is referred to the proper committee for consideration and recommendation thereon, it is our intention to hav some good men represent the Freethinkers and make some speeches to that committee.

This will cost money—a good deal of it. We ought to hav five hundred dollars at least. The clerical forces will spend thousands of dollars. The Freethinkers cannot do that, but we believe they can raise enough to do what we hav so briefly outlined. THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to do something to start the thing going, and how vigorous we can make the fight will depend upon how much we are aided. A ten dollar bill will do a great deal, and we would like to hav every New Yorker who can afford it send us one of them to push this along. If you cannot send ten, send five, or four, or whatever you can spare for this work. Within the next week we shall spend at least fifty dollars to open the ball, and we would like some help promptly.

Let us hear from you at once, friends, so we can know what to depend upon. The more you send the hotter will we make the fight.

Touched in a Tender Place.

The American politician and agitator is very respectful to the church. In fact, he is afraid of it. Before it he appears cap in hand. He givs it what it wants, generally. If it says that a Fair should be shut on Sunday he obediently passes a law to shut it—and then slips in himself with his friend the director. If it wants the saloons closed on Sunday he closes them—in front—and sneaks in at the side door when he gets thirsty. If it demands a general Sunday law he gratifies the whim—and then proceeds, in common with millions of others, to pay no attention to the law. If a few Freethinkers and Adventists are persecuted and imprisoned under this statute—well, so much the worse for them; they should not be animated by a principle; he is not; does not believe that such over-niceness "pays." If the church wants its property exempt from taxation, all right; let them hav it; he has no time to fool with constitutional questions; all he can do is to attend to his fences. Suppose that this exemption does slightly increase his own taxes—what of that? He will make it up quickly enough if the orthodox electors reward him with the reëlection or the promotion that he is after. He finds it very convenient to get off cute little religious catch words on the stump; it doesn't hurt anybody, and it is always good policy to cast a theological "anchor to windward." The Christians are apparently in a big majority, and so what self-respecting politician could think of hurting their feelings by telling the truth concerning the usurpations of the church or letting "the cat out of the bag" in regard to his own real views? He is no "crank"! Of course the papers, while considerably more independent—we mean the metropolitan journals, chiefly—are far from having minds of their own all the time, and are pretty sure to rebuke the luckless wight who happens to giv utterance to an unpopular truth about the church. If anything of the kind must be said, they are the ones who should say it, in their own good time and way. That is what they think.

John Burns, Member of Parliament, came to the United States a few weeks ago, and it is already plain that he is not a "practical politician." He does not always sacrifice to the popular gods. He occasionally indulges in the luxury of saying what he thinks when what he thinks is not what his auditors think. This is unpardonable. What business has a labor leader with a mind of his own? Well, Mr. Burns was at a banquet where he had the temerity to remark that in walking and riding about New York he had discovered that there were a great many costly churches, especially along Fifth avenue, and he said that "there will never be any reciprocity between rich and poor so long as the rich hav so many churches." This rank heresy has shocked the Times awfully. It says that Mr. Burns "has already made one serious mistake." He began to agitate, we are solemnly told, before he had learned "the difference between the conditions of agitation in this country and in his own." It is stated that for the lack of knowledge of this difference he has at times presented the appearance of "a chimera bombinating in a vacuum." That must be terrible.

The Times wants to know wherein the multiplicity of costly churches hinders reciprocity. It occurs to us that the thoughtful laborer in the humbler walks of life might reflect that here are gorgeous club-houses in which the rich meet to display their fineries and secure desirable alliances for their sons and daughters, and that it is hardly fair that these ostentatious reception rooms should be exempt from taxation while the few belongings of the poor are thereby compelled to bear additional burdens. It is quite possible that these towering piles hinder reciprocity by keeping before the minds of the ordinary people of the city the fact that the churches of the rich are oftentimes built and kept in repair by money raised in the form of rentals from the miserable tenements of the poor. Even the Times might hav perceived a fact so glaringly conspicuous as this. It is also not entirely without the bounds of possibility that reciprocity is not so easily obtainable as it would be if a great many of the manual and mental workers of the city did not realize that the people who frequent these "dim cathedral aisles" and the ministers who stand in the pulpits and break the fashionable bread of life hav within their homes the means of passing their Sundays very agreeably, and if not, that they can drive out in their carriages, while the masses of the people are dependent for recreation on far less convenient and luxurious agencies, and that the clergy and many of the ultra respectables among the laity are constantly clamoring for the suppression of what few means of amusement and instruction are accessible to the poorer people on Sunday. While the preachers and other self-vaunted moralists continue their agitation for rigid Sunday laws and the like there is bound to be a lack of reciprocity between the owners and users of the big churches and those who are called the "common people."

The Times observes that while in England the church "is regarded by the poor as an oppressor," "no poor man in America looks upon it in that light." This is simply not true, and if it were it would be a reflection on the intelligence of all American people of moderate means. Numbers of laboring people regard the church as an oppressor because she demands Sunday laws; because she has her property exempted from taxation; because she forces the Bible into the schools; because she seeks to prescribe the literature, art, and amusements of the people; because she is continually striving to secure from the political powers privileges which would be necessarily oppressiv as regards non-conformists, and because she socially and financially ostracizes those who do not accept her theological creeds, or, accepting, do not find it convenient to activly aid her in her enterprises and in her schemes for the overthrow of civil and religious liberty.

"No nativ American," sapiently remarks the Times," entertains any activ hostility to churches or to religion." This is decidedly amusing. What does this paper take the nativ Americans for if it really supposes that, in spite of the intolerable aggressions of many of the churches, none of these American-born citizens feel hostil to the church and to the religious intolerance which makes so many churchmen tyrants to the full extent that the laws and that the better public opinion permit? Does it think that we are all contented slaves? To be sure, there is not enough independence of churchgrandyism, but the picture of American indifference is not nearly so black as the Times has painted it. We are told that "purveyors of public amusement find it very much against their interest to satirize the churches or the religious sentiment." No doubt true, to quite an extent, but it by no means follows that there is not a considerable contingent of nativ Americans ready to applaud the hits at the expense of the church which are occasionally heard on the stage. And what about Colonel Ingersoll's immense audiences? Are there no nativ Americans among the hundreds of thousands who, in the course of a lecture season, giv him such hearty applause as he satirizes and excoriates the church, her creeds, and her Bible? Finally, Mr. Burns is warned that he "will do himself and his cause nothing but harm by opposing that sentiment" favorable to the church, which we are assured animates the bosoms of all "nativ Americans." We hope that the Englishman will keep right on telling the truth as he has done in the instance which has so disturbed the Times; it will not hurt him at home and will do the "cause" good everywhere. Frankness is a tonic that our editors and politicians cannot be dosed with too generously. They are sick nigh unto moral death for the lack of it.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we hav to get behind with others. We hav no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to giv others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we hav said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

Capt. Robert C. Adams, the genial whooper-up of all things Secular in Canada—and elswhere, for that matter—was in town a few days last week, and related a pleasing and encouraging story of the new town he has been chiefly instrumental in founding in British Columbia. The town is brand new, and though it has leaped from nothing to the third town in the province in a year, the preachers hav not yet got anybody there foolish enough to giv them money to build a meeting-house. The town has a court-house, wherein one case lasting twenty minutes has been disposed of, and the authorities are building a jail in anticipation of the advent of the religious element. But so far—and this is what we started out to say—only one man of God has been there, and the only congregation he could get was one woman and two children—both girls, one five and the other seven years old. The founders of the town are all Freethinkers and the people seem to follow the lead of the rational captain and his partners. The name of this paradise is Midway, and anyone desiring further information about it can write to Capt. R. C. Adams, Montreal, P. Q.

The Independent, referring to the investigations of the Tenement House Commission as they affect Trinity Corporation, quotes this remark made by the secretary of the commission: "Trinity Church Corporation has not made a very strong effort to help the Board of Health in its endeavors to improve the condition of the dwellings of the poor." The Independent comments: "We are sorry that such things should be said of a church corporation." This, taken alone, would be interpreted by us to mean that the Independent is sorry that such things should need to be said of a church corporation, but when we read further along we are almost compelled to let the sentence stand as the editor wrote it. Here is the succeeding observation to which we refer:

"We mentioned, last week, the fact that a member of the faculty of a theological seminary had just allowed a saloon to be opened in one of his buildings. Such things ought not to be. They bring reproach upon the church and the cause of Christ."

Is it the only reason why those things "ought not to be" that "they bring reproach upon the hurch and the cause of Christ"? Has the Independent nothing to say in condemnation of the wrongfulness of Trinity's treatment of its tenants and the leasing of buildings for saloon purposes except that such conduct brings reproach on the church? We hope that the journal named will not leave this impression on the minds of its readers, as it will if it does not explain itself more clearly.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones hav had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends hav never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We hav tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you hav induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

The Christian Advocate says:

"There is not a word in the Bible that is not based on the assumption of a supernatural revelation—its fact, its necessity, its reality, its consequent authority."

Could superstition further go? Did Luke hav such a claim in mind when he wrote in the beginning of his gospel (as per Revised Version):

"Forasmuch at many hav taken in hand to draw up a narrativ concerning those matters which hav been fulfilled among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, it seemed good to me also, having traced the course of all things accurately from the first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus, that thou mightest know the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed."

The revisers insert a foot-note in which they alternativly render the last clause of the above by this expression: "Or, which thou wast taught by word of mouth." This amounts to the declaration of the Authorized Version that he, Luke, had given himself the task of writing out an account of the events which others had also attempted to set forth in order concerning "the things most commonly believed" among the Christians of that time. Where is there the "assumption of a supernatural revelation" in these statements of the person who writes over the signature of Luke? He makes no claim to being inspired, but puts himself in the attitude of a simple chronicler of certain alleged events which he had received by word of mouth from those who asserted that they were eye-witnesses of those events. Dr. Buckley should be too wary a theologian to make such a "break" as this.

The Catholic Union and Times remarks that the "must of Paine and Voltaire still hangs round" the lectures of Ingersoll. But this assertion does nothing toward answering the arguments of either Colonel Ingersoll or the illustrious dead. At the same time the religious paper named wonders why "the little fraud doesn't try to answer Father Lambert." Does the Rev. Father Cronin suppose that Colonel Ingersoll can stop to answer every priest or preacher who chooses to attack him There was nothing notable in Father Lambert's book except the prodigious number of faulty syllogisms, and those hav been pretty effectually exposed for the Freethinkers by Lacy, Watts, and others.

At the Book Table.

In these days everyone who reads is thinking and talking about that wonderful land in the far East—Japan. We are amazed at the marvelous facility and the lightning speed with which it has seized upon and assimilated "Western Civilization." Most of us are, of course, quite sure that it will be a great gainer thereby; that it will slough off its superstitions and become a beacon light to that part of the world. But there are not wanting those who perceive that there must be wise discrimination in the process of assimilation or some of the gentlest of the virtues of that great people will suffer, perhaps irretrievably, by contact with and imitation of the West. One thing seems to be already certain, and that is that Japan is almost sure to burden herself with debt and thereby sink a large number of her people into abject and hopeless poverty if she persists in her present determination to assume a place with the nations of Europe as a great war power. The maintenance of immense military establishments and costly navies is the curse of the countries of the Old World, and if Japan follows their example, she will soon find herself, as they long ago found themselvs, in the remorseless grasp of the money lenders. If she can retain the best of her old civilization and absorb only the best of that of the West she will take her place in the very forefront of the world's advance.

What the best of that civilization is Mr. Lafcadio Hearn* has most charmingly told us in these two octavo volumes. The telling is with him a labor of love. To the keen, penetrating vision of the scientific observer there are added in him the warm sympathy of the humanitarian and the delicate appreciation and insight of the poet and artist. He was for four years a teacher in the schools of the Island Empire and in that time he made himself acquainted with the people—their religions, their social customs, their industries, their literature, their art—as only one could who loved them and had their confidence. In his "Tales of Old Japan," Mr. Mitford wrote in 1871: "Of the inner life of the Japanese the world at large knows but little—their religion, their superstitions, their ways of thought, the hidden springs by which they move—all these are as yet mysteries." It is this invisible life that is the Unfamiliar Japan of which we get a few glimpses in these volumes of Mr. Hearn's. He modestly says that a residence of four years is all too short, even for one who tries to adopt their habits and customs, to begin to feel at home in that land of strangeness. The popular religious ideas—in particular the ideas having a Buddhistic source—and the curious superstitions adverted to in these sketches, are little shared by the educated classes. The occidentalized Japanese is indifferent toward abstract ideas in general and metaphysical speculations in particular; otherwise he "stands almost on the intellectual plane of the cultivated Parisian or Bostonian." Toward the great religious questions of the day his attitude is one of perfect apathy. He is inclined, according to Mr. Hearn, to treat with undue contempt all conceptions of the supernatural, and this necessarily leads him to disregard the genesis of the superstitions of his countrymen, and thus to unintentionally aid the Western missionaries in their proselyting work. "For him, superstitions are simply superstitions; their relation to the emotional nature of the people interests him not at all." There are some exceptions to this rule, notably Viscount Torio. Mr. Hearn thinks that this attitude of the scientifically educated among the Japanese is due to the shame they still feel that they once held religious beliefs. To illustrate his meaning Mr. Hearn says:

"Most of us who now call ourselvs Agnostics can recollect the feelings with which, in the period of our fresh emancipation from a faith far more irrational than Buddhism, we looked back upon the gloomy theology of our fathers. Intellectual Japan has become Agnostic within only a few decades; and the suddenness of this mental revolution sufficiently explains the principal, though perhaps not all, the causes of the present attitude of the superior classes toward Buddhism."

The exquisit charm of Japanese life, so different from that of other countries, is to be found in the interior, away from the Westernized centers. It was there that Mr. Hearn went to study as he taught, and his story of travel and association is as fascinating as the better novels of the best writers and as instructiv as history, descriptiv sociology, and science combined. Referring to what he saw there our author says:

"This is the life of which a foreign observer can never weary, if fortunate and sympathetic enough to enter into it—the life that forces him sometimes to doubt whether the course of our boasted Western progress is really in the direction of moral development. Each day, while the years pass, there will be revealed to him some strange and unsuspected beauty in it. Like other life, it has its darker side; yet even this is brightness compared with the darker side of Western existence. It has its foibles, its follies, its vices, its cruelties; yet the more one sees of it, the more one marvels at its extraordinary goodness, its miraculous patience, its never-failing courtesy, its simplicity of heart, its intuitiv charity."

And yet Rev. Mr. McCarrell asserts that "there is no morality outside of the pale of Christianity"!

Referring to the beliefs of the common people, Mr. Hearn observes that a few of these are sinister—like the belief in demon foxes, which popular education is rapidly dissipating—but this is so only in a comparativly few instances.

"A large number are comparable for beauty of fancy even to those Greek myths, in which our noblest poets of to-day still find inspiration; while many others, which encourage kindness to the unfortunate and kindness to animals, can never hav produced any but the happiest moral results. The amusing presumption of domestic animals, and the comparativ fearlessness of many wild creatures in the presence of man; the white clouds of gulls that hover about each incoming steamer in expectation of an alms of crumbs [what a contrast to the reception that awaits the gulls on the coast of Christian Massachusetts, where, when they come to a summer resort, they are shot down for "the fun of the thing"!]; the whirring of doves from temple eaves to pick up the rice scattered for them by pilgrims; the familiar storks of ancient public gardens; the deer of holy shrines, awaiting cakes and caresses; the fish which raise their heads from sacred lotus ponds when the stranger's shadow falls upon the water—these and a hundred other pretty sights are due to fancies which, though called superstitious, inculcate in simplest form the sublime truth of the Unity of Life."

In view of these facts, Mr. Hearn is inclined to think that it is regrettable that "the critical spirit of modernized Japan is now indirectly aiding rather than opposing the efforts of foreign bigotry to destroy the simple, happy beliefs of the people, and substitute those cruel superstitions which the West has long intellectually outgrown—the fancies of an unforgiving God and an everlasting hell." In this connection he further observes: "More than a hundred and sixty years ago, Kaempfer wrote of the Japanese: 'In the practice of virtue, in purity of life and outward devotion, they far outdo the Christians.' And except where nativ morals hav suffered by foreign contamination, as in the open ports, these words are true of the Japanese to-day. My own conviction, and that of many impartial and more experienced observers of Japanese life, is that Japan has nothing whatever to gain by conversion to Christianity, either morally or otherwise, but very much to lose."

Mr. Hearn's description of the streets, with the curious, artistic signs of the shops; of the homes of the people and the temples and shrines; of the woods and shimmering waters of river and lake; of the almost cloudless skies and the distant mountains; of "the market of the dead;" of the deft workmen who fashion things of use which are no less objects of art, and all that his facil pen limns for us of all the other strange and lovely creations of nature and man in that fair Eastern land—for none of these delineations which speak hav we room here, nor can we giv even an outline of the entrancing picture. The reader must look for all these delights for himself and he will be amply rewarded for the time he devotes to the pursuit of them.

Among the poorer classes some of the deities of evil are worshiped, as well as the beneficent Kami. The worship seems to take the form of requital that the evil powers hav graciously vouchsafed to inflict a temporary ill instead of an irremediable misfortune. On these occasions they are duly propitiated. Mr. Hearn remarks parenthetically: "After all, this is no more irrational than the thanksgiving prayer at the close of the hurricane season in the West Indies, after the destruction by storm of twenty-two thousand lives."

After telling in his own inimitable way several of the legends of the countryside, particularly the exploits of the demon foxes, Mr. Lafcadio Hearn says:

"But these strange beliefs are swiftly passing away. Year by year more shrines of Inari crumble down, never to be rebuilt. Year by year the statuaries make fewer images of foxes. Year by year fewer victims of fox-possession are taken to the hospital to be treated according to the best scientific methods by Japanese physicians who speak German. The cause is not to be found in the decadence of the old faiths—a superstition outlivs a religion. Much less is it to be sought for in the efforts of proselytizing missionaries from the West—most of whom profess an earnest belief in devils. It is purely educational. The omnipotent enemy of superstition is the public school, where the teaching of modern science is unclogged by sectarianism or prejudice; where the children of the poorest may learn the wisdom of the Occident; where there is not a boy or a girl of fourteen ignorant of the great names of Tyndall, of Darwin, of Huxley, of Herbert Spencer. The little hands that break the Fox-god's nose in mischievous play, can also write essays upon the evolution of plants and about the geology of Izumo. There is no place for ghostly foxes in the beautiful nature-world revealed by new studies to the new generation."

But in the public schools of the United States our children yet read of the foxes whose tails Samson united that they might carry destruction to the grain fields of his enemies, and of the lions which would not eat Daniel, and of the ravens which fed Elijah! And they are solemnly assured that those stories are the divine truths of an infallible God, who made them and will damn them if they do not believe the foolish tales! Where in the scale of scientific development does the United States stand? Behind Japan, only yesterday plunged in the "filth and ignorance of heathenism"! How many of our school children of fourteen can giv an intelligible account of Darwin, and Huxley, and Spencer? What good is the Bible in the schools doing them?

The most difficult problem that the Japanese educator has to deal with is the one of nutrition. The modern knowledge which the student "must acquire upon a diet of boiled rice and bean curd was discovered, developed, and synthetized by minds strengthened upon a costly diet of flesh." The curriculum of the Japanese schools is at least twice as difficult as that of Western schools of the same grade, and it must be mastered upon a diet that would starve an English or American boy. The result is that the best pupils often break down in mind and body. Better conditions are coming, but at present the strain is very severe. What may be expected of this people is prophesied by this fact: "Happily, even among the poorest of her poor, the educational policy of the government is seconded with an astonishing zeal; the entire nation has plunged into study with a fervor of which it is utterly impossible to convey any adequate conception in this little essay. Yet I may cite a touching example: Immediately after the frightful earthquake of 1891, the children of the ruined cities of Gifu and Aichi, crouching among the ashes of their homes, cold, and hungry, and shelterless, surrounded by horror and misery unspeakable, still continued their small studies, using tiles of their own burnt dwellings in lieu of slates, and bits of lime for chalk, even while the earth still trembled beneath them."

In the opinion of Mr. Hearn, while Japan attempted too much, she could not hav attempted less. The development of the mental system has been forced. "For the desired intellectual change, to be accomplished within a few generations, must involve a physiological change never to be effected without terrible cost." To our mind, it is easily conceivable that the slow progress of the Indian and the Negro, in contact with Caucasian civilization, is nearer normal than that of the Oriental, and that, consequently, it will continue proportionally longer.

With Mr. Hearn, we are glad that while Japan admires Western material superiority, she does not look with favor on Western morals. "Oriental thinkers do not commit the serious blunder of confounding mechanical with ethical progress, nor hav they failed to perceive the moral weakness of our boasted civilization." One Japanese writer says: "Order or disorder in a nation does not depend upon something that falls from the sky or rises from the earth. It is determined by the disposition of the people."

No thinking, humane man or woman will regret reading "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan."

Alas! Poor Talmage.

Dear, modest Talmage says he sees God's hand
In burning up his tabernacles three;
God wills that he should preach throughout the land—
His church this continent, his gospel free.

Then should his temple wide be struck apace,
By blizzards, earthquakes, flames, and famin's curse;
The signs would read, "Giv Talmage wider space
Till gall sublime has filled the universe!"

The Sermon on the Mount.

III.

Here, again, the Chinese Mencius, centuries earlier, was wiser than Jesus. He said: "Maintain firm the will, and do no violence to the passion-nature." So far from condemning what he calls the "passion-nature," and pulling it up by the roots, as Jesus taught should be done, Mencius taught that "it is the mate and assistant of righteousness and reason. Without it man is in a state of starvation." There must be a constant practice of this righteousness, without the object of thereby nourishing the passion-nature. Let not the mind forget its work, but let there be no assisting the growth of that nature. Let us not be like the man of Sung. And this is what he tells of the man of Sung: "There was a man of Sung, who was grieved that his growing corn was not longer, so he pulled it up. Having done this, he returned home, looking very stupid, and said to his people, 'I am tired to-day. I hav been helping the corn to grow long.' His son ran to look at it, and found the corn all withered. There are few in the world who do not deal with their passion-nature as if they were assisting the corn to grow long. Some, indeed, consider it of no benefit to them, and let it alone—they do not weed their corn. They who assist it to grow long, pull out their corn. What they do is not only of no benefit to the nature, but it also injures it." Wise old Mencius!

In Mat. v, 32, Jesus forbids divorce on any ground but for adultery on the part of the wife, and he forbids anyone to marry a divorced woman. Here again his teaching is mischievous and immoral, and the Christian world revolts against it, as is shown by the steady growth of a more reasonable divorce law. Jesus, too, allows only the man to procure a divorce; to woman he permits no escape from her intolerable position in such cases. The man only may hav the divorce, and he may marry again; the woman cannot procure a divorce; and if the man does, the woman is forbidden to marry again. Jesus recognizes only the one ground for divorce, that is adultery on the part of the woman; whereas, all human experience shows that there are other forms of misery, and other grounds for divorce that may be, and often are, much more intolerable.

Mat. v, 33–37. Jesus says: "But I say unto you, swear not all, but let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Here again is a precept right enough in itself, but not of a vastly lofty nature. It is curious that almost the only people who follow this injunction of Jesus are heretics, Quakers, Infidels, etc. In spite of Jesus's command, "Swear not at all," Peter, when accused of being a follower of Jesus, denied him, and, we are told (Mat. xxvi, 74), "began to swear and curse." The followers of Jesus ever since hav followed Peter's example, the lower orders by cursing and swearing, all classes by swearing oaths in courts and government affairs.

Is it not curious that where there is a germ of truth in any saying of Jesus, the so-called Infidels follow him, and you Christians will not, until Infidels hav made you do it? The more under the thumb of the church the mass of the people are the worse they are in this respect, the more horrible and continuous their swearing and profanity is, as anyone may find by listening. One of the most disagreeable experiences in the streets of Christian cities is the swearing and profanity of Christian men.

(Mat., v, 39–41.) I say unto you that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at law, and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

The old Jewish law of an "eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," was bad enough; but how is it possible to justify evil doers more forcibly or increase evil-doing more surely than by observance of this command? If it were carried out, and we were to sit down quietly under evil, a premium would be put upon evil-doing, and every man would become a law unto himself against others. The command is so contrary to human reason and universal experience that it has never obtained any amount of observance, even among Christians themselvs. Here again these directions and teachings are of a kind that are peculiar to Jesus, and again are impracticable and ridiculous. Anyone following them would be taken for a lunatic, even by his Christian friends. A sincere admirer of Jesus, W. R. Greg (Creed of Ch., 38), has commented on the passage in words that I cannot do better than to quote. "The common sense, or the common instinct, of Christians in all ages and in all lands has quietly but peremptorily put it [the doctrin of non-resistance] aside as not meant for use." · · · "Only the Quakers hav professed to obey it literally, and they never pretended to carry out more than one-half of it; they never denied themselvs the luxury of passiv resistance in its most resolute and ingenious devices. They did not return a blow; but they did not make the first so easy or so pleasant as to invite a second. And yet the Quakers hav nearly died out! The whole of our criminal law and our police arrangements are based upon a systematic repudiation of the precept in question, and the order of modern society, the security of modern life, could not otherwise exist. · · · No one would fail to resist the blows directed against our neighbors—against those whom we are taught to love, to assist, and protect. A man may be so disciplined as to take meekly the blow struck at himself, but would never dream it his duty to endure in the same fashion the blow struck at the woman leaning on his arm. · · · The worst ill-service you can do to the violent, is to show them that they may work their wicked will unpunished and unchecked by the natural instincts of humanity. Non-resistance, then, becomes connivance and complicity in wrong. In the case of nations, for one country to submit to outrage and wrong at the hands of another, when the means of resistance lay in its power, has never been held right or obligatory. The doctrin of non-resistance would mean nothing but the destruction of the gentler and finer races, and the rampant tyranny of the stronger; the reign of violence, not of peace."

Listen to the "heathen Chinee" again. Ages before Jesus, some one asked Confucius, "What do you say concerning the principle that injury should be recompensed with kindness?" Confucius said, "With what, then, will you recompense kindness? Recompense injury with justice, recompense kindness with kindness."

Giv to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow turn thou not away (Mat. v, 42). Giv to every man that asketh of thee, and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again (Luke, vi, 30). Lend, hoping for nothing again (Luke vi, 35). If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and giv to the poor (Mat. xix, 21). Sell whatsoever thou hast and giv to the poor (Mark x, 21). Sell all thou hast and giv to the poor (Luke xviii, 22).

It will be seen from our examination of the Old Testament that the old Jewish writers were possessed of truer ideas about helping the poor—to supply whatever help is timely. The Mosaic law not only enjoins that relief is to be given (Levit. xxv, 35), but you are to "lend him sufficient for his need" (Deut. xv, 7), and "Take thou no usury of him, or increase" (Levit. xxv, 36). Moses (so called) teaches, not quite wholly, but approximately, the true doctrin—the practice of helping the poor to help themselvs. Jesus not only does not adopt or notice this good feature, but is again "original," and goes to a vicious extreme. He made poverty a personal merit, without which salvation could not be attained; so that logically, as to alms-giving, he is obliged to teach and did teach:

Sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor (Luke xviii, 22). And when thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors lest they bid thee again, and a recompense be made to thee. But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind (Luke xiv, 12–14). And thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.

Such a system is utterly impractical, and would reduce the whole of mankind to poverty and debar all progress to civilization. In the early ages of Christianity many converts, acting on these teachings, deprived themselvs of all their possessions, and not only reduced themselvs to beggary, but their families also. Of all Jesus's precepts, perhaps those about alms-giving are the most easily obeyed up to a certain point, and hence hav made the most impression and hav been acted upon more widely than any others, and the practice has been of immense evil. Not only has there been little or no discrimination in the practice, but it is difficult to see how there could be if Jesus's own words are considered. The more exactly his words are obeyed the more harm there is done, and it is difficult to see how the "spirit" of his injunction is to be observed without a literal interpretation of it. It must inevitably lead, and has led, to indiscriminate alms-giving, and that is the most mischievous of all forms of charity. Modern opinion, whether Christian or unbelieving, has come to be that charitable gifts, bequests, endowments, etc., when based on the letter and spirit of these texts, is responsible to an immense degree in creating further pauperism by degrading the receiver into a state of permanent reliance on charity, and eliminating from the minds of large classes of men and women any healthy ideas of self-help. Foghorn Philosophy.

The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but thou canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is everyone that bloweth a foghorn (John).

Friend Hayes has been blowing the tariff foghorn for a long time, and the more noise he has made the less knowledge he has imparted.

A man who had no gun caught a panther in a trap. He said he caught him without help, but he wanted two men to help him let the animal go again, and I was afraid that I would hav to call for help in order to let friend Hays go. But I find by his last article that he has concluded to "close." That is probably the most sensible conclusion he has arrived at. If he had decided to "close" before he threw his last boomerang, which came far short of the mark, he would hav escaped the fearful wound which was inflicted when it returned.

He says "the McKinley bill placed a duty of thirty cents a bushel on barley, and promptly Canadian barley dropped thirty cents." And to my question, "Why do consumers smuggle goods?" he answers, "Simply because protection reduces the foreign price sufficiently to make smuggling profitable." If the duty on foreign commodities reduces the price equal to the amount of the duty, then a duty equal to the current price would reduce the price to nothing. So that at any time if we should lay a duty equal to current price, we could go over there and gobble up all that Canada produced, for the price would be reduced to nothing. All the "Professors" and all the "axioms" in the world cannot cover up the bare bones of such absurdity.

Well, it is a good thing that friend Hays decided to "close," for another such blast from his foghorn would burst even such a ram's horn as was used at the city of Jericho.

I hav before me a Canadian paper, and I find by the price-list that oats, hogs, butter, tallow, and produce generally are selling over in Canada at about the same price that they are selling for here. Potatoes are selling for more there than here. and yet I am informed that there is a duty of fifteen cents a bushel. Does this look as if foreign commodities dropped in price equal to the amount of the duty laid? I liv in the selvage of a great potato-raising district. If Mr. Hays could go through this region of country and see the number of acres devoted to the culture of potatoes, he would doubtless exclaim, "Why, what a great industry! How many are engaged in it? It ought to be protected; foreign potatoes ought not to be allowed to come into competition with it." It would be a good object-lesson for Mr. Hays if he could see all the potato raisers arranged in rank and file and all the potato eaters arranged in like manner. For every potato raiser who wants a high price for potatoes there will be a hundred potato eaters who would like cheap potatoes. Mr. Hays's philosophy would sacrifice the interest of the one hundred who eat potatoes to the interest of the one who raises potatoes. I do not think that friend Hays means to be dishonest, but he is laboring under a hallucination, the same as the Christian. He (the Christian) believes the Bible to be the word of God, and without thought or consideration takes it all in at a gulp. When reminded of the absurdities, impossibilities, and plain contradictions, he exclaims, "Great is the mystery of godliness!" and then he has got you up a stump, sure enough.

What the Bible is to the Christian the protectiv system is to Mr. Hays. He is laboring under such a spell that he cannot reason correctly. The Christian believes just what the minister tells him, but never stops to think that the minister's living depends upon his success in deceiving the people. So Mr. Hays takes all that Depew and McKinley and other interested parties say, without stopping to think that they, like the ministers, hav fish to fry—well knowing that if they cannot make Mr. Hays and others furnish the fuel they must procure it themselvs.

Eliminate the selfishness behind the tariff scheme, and it would fail to the ground of its own weight. It is estimated that one-half of the families in the United States hav no income above a bare living, and that two per cent of the people own two-thirds of the entire wealth of the country, and instead of defraying two-thirds of all the expenses, as justice would require them to do, through the tariff tax they are enabled to shift the great burden of taxes which they ought to pay on to the shoulders of the poor, who ought not to be taxed at all.

The tariff scheme is the old game of putting the burden upon the other fellow instead of bearing your own fair proportion manfully. It makes men pay according to what they consume—that is, according to their necessities, and not according to their ability.

All will see that the thousands of poor people and those in moderate circumstances will consume vastly more than the comparativly few who are really rich, and consequently are made to pay more. A greater outrage cannot be conceived. It is a scheme of robbery from start to finish.

There is but one fair and honest way to defray the expenses of the government, and that is by taxing the people directly according to the ability of each to pay. We elect three men in each town who are supposed to be impartial, and men of good judgment, to ascertain the amount of wealth possessed by each wealth owner. If A is worth twice as much as B, he must pay twice as much. The richest man in the town must pay the most. Could any plan be adopted which would prove more fair and equitable for raising money to defray the expenses of county and state? If this is fair for the county and state, why should it not be equally fair for the general government? Who would object to such a system of taxation? Nobody but the rich. Whereas, under the tariff scheme, a man in moderate circumstances may be made to pay more than a niggardly rich man. If he consumes more he must pay more. The tariff takes cognizance of only what you consume; it takes no thought of your ability to pay. The tariff tax falls heaviest on those who consume the most, regardless of their ability to pay, whether they are rich or poor.

The object of government should be to protect the poor and the weak; the rich and the strong through all history hav managed to get the lion's share. My only object is to raise the minds of men above old-time abuses and make them see the abomination of advocating wrongs simply because they are hoary with age.

I had nearly completed this article a long time ago when the old machinery got out of order. The valves leaked, the governor refused to do duty, the cogs slipped, and I had to lay up for repairs. And I expect that Mr. Hays and all good Christians will think that I am not yet sound in the head. Mr. Hays and myself hav been cantering along together for some time, and now, as we come to the "parting of the ways," let it be with good wishes and friendly feeling. And as we shall not probably ever hav another tilt, let us part with a fraternal shake! So mote it be. JOHN PECK.

News and Notes.

The Secular Pilgrim has to make long jumps, and a pair of seven-leagued boots would be very convenient, besides saving railroad fare, which counts up rather fast in Dakota, where the charge is four cents per mile. From Blair, Wis., I travel day and night to Grafton, North Dakota, which is about five hundred miles distant. However, when I arrive at Merchant's Hotel, where John Ildstad entertains the traveling public, I find such a hearty welcome that I am sure that everything is all right for the campaign in Dakota. Remsburg has already been at Grafton and broken ground, and I find a considerable Liberal element that is willing to stand up and be counted and do some work; while there is a still greater element of Freethought that is afraid of publicity, and does not wish to be identified with any forward movement. I giv the lectures in the Opera House. It is well-filled on the first evening, although but few ladies are present. I lecture on the following afternoon in order to accommodate those from the country, and there is a fair attendance. On the last evening, Thursday, December 6th, I hav the largest audience of any, and this time there is a great increase of the attendance of women, which shows that when people find out what Freethought is they are willing to listen and accept it. John C. Risvold, C. E. Anderson, and John Ildstad are among our earnest allies at this point. Mr. Sylvester comes from a distance of forty miles to join our forces; Mr. and Mrs. Woodbury are present from Voss, and Nels Berntson from Milton; and from various other points outside of Grafton there is quite a delegation. Grafton is an important point in North Dakota. It is a lively place for business. There is a good farming country about it. Two railroads run through it, the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern. There is quite a Freethought element, but only a few are willing to bear the brunt. But many are ready to fall into the ranks when the leaders are found to push ahead. Undoubtedly Grafton will in the future be a successful field for Liberal work. The forces are here if they can be fused together. As usual there are several churches, and they hav the spirit of old. They want to rule without opposition; but they cannot do this any longer. The people will not remain in the fold.

On Friday, December 7th, I take my journey by railroad to Hoople, fourteen miles away, where I ectured last summer. This is a small place, with two churches; but the Liberals prevail. I like to come to this frontier place, for there is a cordial reception. All are willing to do their level best. I giv three lectures here, one on Saturday evening, and two on Sunday afternoon and evening, in the school-house. Quite an improvement is made in the order of exercises this time. We are treated with both vocal and instrumental music, which makes a notable addition to the interest of our meetings. Mr. Thomas Simons, J. E. Flanegan, Miss May Flanegan, Frank Francis, Mrs. A. D. Marble, of Crystal, and Mr. Alfred Jones, the schoolmaster of the place, favored us with this delightful entertainment. One of the pieces, which they sang to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," was the Freethought hymn recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, written by C. E. Reynolds, of Oregon, which was enthusiastically received. My friends, Mr. and Mrs. Woodbury, of Voss, are also present at the Sunday meetings. Mr. and Mrs. Soll, of Park River, and Mr. A. D. Marble, of Crystal, M. A. Hewitt, L. T. Berdahl, and others of the immediate vicinity, always put their shoulders to the wheel. K. T. Gryte, D. W. Collins, Nels Berntson, Nils Monson, Charles E. Ebbighausen, Sander Soll, John Ofstedahl, C. A. Trovatten hav joined THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator roll. As on my previous visit, I enjoyed the genial Western hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Hewitt and Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Flanegan. I feel under obligations to my friend, the schoolmaster, Mr. Alfred Jones, who was ready to lend a hand. In every respect I had a profitable time at Hoople, with pleasant memories and hope for the future. Comrade Berdahl has been married since I was here, for which he receives our heartiest congratulations.

On Monday morning, with Mr. Thomas Simons and wife and baby, I enjoy a sleigh ride across the Dakota plains, my first experience of this kind, and it was an exhilarating drive. There was no storm nor piercing winds. It was a fine winter's day. I did not feel cold a bit, and although in some places there was bare ground, the team sped along quite lively. So far I hav had nothing but favorable weather in Dakota. I am agreeably disappointed. I looked forward to some blizzards, but as yet they hav kept out of the way. In fact, I discover that on the average December is a mild month in North Dakota. The storms and cold come later on. The thermometer has sometimes been sixty-five degrees below zero. I hope to escape such a "spell of weather" as that.

I arrive at Park River, which is quite a thriving little place, but terribly orthodox. There is a bitter theological element here which would like to crush out Freethought altogether; but the Freethinkers are not of a kind to be easily routed. These are the first Freethought lectures ever given in Park River and the results are quite a surprise to many. Some found Freethought much better than they expected, and some thought the lecturer should be stopped by force of law. The lectures were given in the town hall, and an effort was made after the first evening to prevent my having the use of the hall the next evening, but it was a failure. I gave two lectures and the audiences were large and appreciativ, showing that really the Liberal element is predominant in this place, if it was only courageously expressed. As the hall was engaged the third evening for other purposes, it is secured for Sunday afternoon, December 16th, and no doubt there will be a tremendous orthodox kick against this desecration of the Sabbath; but the Freethinkers are determined to fight it out on this line and vindicate the rights of free speech. There is some thought of arresting me for blasphemy, but it has been concluded that this is too risky a proceeding, for if the prosecutors did not succeed in the suit, then they would hav to pay the costs, and the orthodox are not ready to meet this issue. There is great agitation in the community. It is seldom that I hav come across so much bigotry as is now exhibited. But the tendency is to make the Freethinkers more decided and earnest, for they see that it is not a question of creed, but of human rights, and they do not propose to submit to the bulldozing of the churches. The orthodox hav made the fight. They hav threatened violence and persecution, and the broad and progressiv element in the community will take a stand in favor of fair play. I am waiting to see what measures will be taken to prevent my speaking here next Sunday. Mr. Thomas Simons and George Kapler favored us with excellent instrumental music at the two lectures. Mr. E. Smith-Petersen, John J. Kohnen, Sander Soll, and others are among our stanch supporters. I hav enjoyed the company of Mr. and Mrs. Smith-Petersen, Mr. and Mrs. Sander Soll, and Frank Hughes, of the Arlington Hotel. I hav received over a hundred new names as members of the Freethought Federation of America during the trip. This is a matter we need to push—the increase of the membership of our national organization. There are thousands, I believe, that will join and help us.

After Christmas I take my way to New Mexico and Arizona. I hope that the Liberals in these Western frontiers will be ready to push the campaign. Organize and arrange for lectures.

The Campaign Book.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of $2 from Dr E. B. Foote for eighteen copies of the book giving the report of our last Congress. I hope many others will follow the example of Dr. Foote. It will be a book that should be read by every Freethinker in the land, and thousands of copies should be handed to others to read, as it will set people to thinking, and help our cause along in better shape. Very able addresses were delivered. Reports of the officers and all the names of the donors will be included, and, as I understand it, one book goes free to those who contributed toward the Congress. I will report every week the names and amounts subscribed for the book.

Manhattan Liberal Club.

Lately the Manhattan Liberal Club has been going off after the strange gods of Socialism, Anarchism, and commonplace politics, but last Friday night it returned to its first love—straight Liberalism. Consequently the audience was large, and if George F. Train had been kept off the platform the meeting would hav been what one might call a grand success. Of course Mr. Train couldn't quite spoil a session of the club, but his profanity and vulgarity would diminish the interest in the proceedings of a person who didn't know Train and his mental irresponsibility. It is well that he has now hired a hall for himself, where his eccentricities will not be imposed upon people who attend meetings to hear something.

Mr. Remsburg has been lecturing in Massachusetts and Connecticut, and was persuaded to stop on his way South to enlighten New Yorkers and Jerseymen upon the Bible. Between him and Colonel Ingersoll that volume of legends and alleged history will get quite an extensiv circle of acquaintances this winter. Even some Christians will find out what is in it.

The title of the lecture was "Some Facts About the Bible." The facts he presented are not taught in the pulpit or Sunday school. Regarding the claims of theologians respecting the origin and authorship of the books of the Bible he showed that the authorship of a majority of the books, both of the Old and New Testaments, was unknown and that the greater portion of these books were written at a much later period than that usually claimed. He devoted considerable time to a consideration of the four gospels. He showed that they were not written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John in the first century, as claimed. He refuted the claim that we hav an unbroken chain of testimony to their credibility from the first century down to the present time. He showed that the most important links in this chain of testimony were missing—that the other writers of the New Testament, the apostolical fathers, and the early Christian fathers, make no mention of them.

Mr. Remsburg showed how the canon was formed by Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Jerome, and Augustine. He also reviewed the work of the various Christian councils. He gave a description of the various manuscripts and versions of the Bible, showing that no two copies were alike—that Christians had never been agreed as to what books should constitute the Bible—that even Martin Luther, the founder of the Protestant church, rejected no less than six books of the Bible. While Colonel Ingersoll's new lecture deals almost entirely with the internal evidence of the Bible in proof of its purely human origin, Mr. Remsburg confines his lecture almost entirely to the external or historical evidence respecting it.

The usual discussion followed the lecture. Mr. Case and a lady defended the Bible. Capt. R. C. Adams, of Montreal, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., and T. B. Wakeman opposed it, and heartily indorsed the views of Mr. Remsburg.

Mr. Remsburg spoke before the Brooklyn Philosophical Association Sunday afternoon on "Jesus Christ," and before the Newark Liberal League Sunday night on "Thomas Paine."

Observations.

A new finance scheme is reported from Washington, D. C. It has the following features: The issue by the United States of all the money necessary for the people; the retirement of the paper money of all kinds now issued by the government, and the free coinage of gold and silver at the United States mints. This looks promising; in fact, almost any scheme involving free silver, for those who want it, looks that way to me. The people in scattered communities are now in the condition they would be in if the government regulated the manufacture of wagons and had stopped making everything but buggies. Anybody can see that under such an arrangement, while the wealthy could continue to get around in carriages or cars, the producer would experience difficulty in conveying his produce to market. There would be a demand for a resumption of wagon making, which the fellows in the buggies would say was a scheme concocted by owners of white oak and ash timber to make a market for their material. And a whole lot of numskulls, believing the yarn, would go on paying big rent for wagons. They would likewise submit to government monopoly of wagon building, and would applaud the secretary of the treasury for issuing bonds to purchase buggies for government use instead of making them from the material at hand. They would go further and agree with the owners of the buggies that any man who should build for his own or others' use wagons with round wheels in imitation of those manufactured by the government should be put in the penitentiary. At least, I suppose this is what they would do. They take that position with regard to money.

The analogy between the functions of wagons and those of money can be carried a long way without a serious break. I got the suggestion from J. K. Ingalls.

The Socialist paper of New York, the People, is suspicious of the mission of John Burns, M.P., and his fellow delegates to this country in the professed interests of Labor. It charges quite directly that Mr. Burns misrepresents the facts about trades unions in England, and intimates that he is the cat's-paw of the enemies of workingmen. Now, the main object of Mr. Burns, as he states it, is to promote, and in fact to realize, harmony among organized laborers; but the attitude of the Socialists shows that he has not effected his purpose up to date. I judge there must be something unrevealed that, if known, would account for this hostility. Burns proclaims himself a Socialist; and the trades unions are getting there as fast as they can. I note that a proposition is before the Typographical Union to abolish the individual and substitute the people; the same to be effected by government control of agriculture, manufacture, transportation, finance, communication, and all sorts of effort. What more, or less, do Socialists want?

It is suggested by a comparison of the achievements of Socialism with those of trades unionism that the difference between the two methods is the same as that between preaching and practice; that one represents the gospel and does the talking, while the other represents the acts and does the work. Nobody can deny the superiority of Socialistic over trades union literature—"Looking Backward," for example, being a more highly idealized production than the "Speaking of Ellen;" but still the strike and the boycott hav been known to take effect, while nothing tangible has resulted from Mr. Bellamy's dream. A choice between Socialism and trades unionism involves the question whether it is better for the laborer to contemplate a sweet by-and-by or to hav sugar in his coffee this winter. Theories do not disturb the bloated capitalist. Even a political revolution finds him still serene, for he knows that the man with a sack or a barrel has the ear of legislators of all parties. It is another matter when he finds that he must pay living wages or not get his work done. My solution of the labor question is a general return to agricultural or rural life, greater simplicity in living, abolition of taxes, and so forth. Perfectly organized trades unions, with consequent elevation of wages and destruction of the "hives of industry" producing so many thousand things that are of no earthly use to anybody, would contribute to that result. I conceive that with nine-tenths of our people owning a few acres of land, producing what they consume and something more, and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, we should hav a nation which few foreigners would care to tackle in debate.

If everybody were to define the most heinous offense that any human being can commit, and also prescribe the penalty for the same, I am afraid that few of us would escape with our lives. The church has creeds which except a man do faithfully believe he shall without doubt be everlastingly damned; and thus she provides against errors of the head, while Dr. Parkhurst, Anthony Comstock, and their female coadjutors attend to the offenses having their rise in an opposit quarter; so that, with the Prohibitionists "in our midst," as the New York Sun would insist on expressing it, and all of them claiming their department as the most vital, we are tolerably well surrounded, invested, and hemmed in. These are matters that seem to deeply interest the conservativ world. They do not hit me as questions to be dealt with by courts, but I notice that Mr. H. L. Green has become impressed with the necessity of joining the Comstock and Parkhurst division. He knows that, as Lowell observed, "once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide, in the strife of Truth and Falsehood, for the good or evil side;" hence he is prepared to say:

"In our opinion the most diabolical crime that a person can commit is to circulate real obscene literature."

That sounds more like a preacher than a philosopher, and I think that upon reflection Mr. Green will modify his utterance. No one can hold, except as a preacher, that the dissemination of an impure thought ranks as a crime with the ancient slaughter of the Midianites, with the affair of St. Bartholomew's day, or even with the modern massacre of Christians in Armenia. The extravagance of the proposition almost excludes it from serious consideration. I once saw an old man arrested and taken to jail; from jail to the penitentiary, and from the penitentiary, I might say, to the grave. I called it a crime, and I would maintain that its atrocity exceeded any that could possibly result from simply transmitting printed matter through the mails. With this tragedy in mind could Mr. Green repeat his statement? I believe we hav a list of martyrs to Freethought—men and women who forfeited their lives by maintaining their opinions. We still wax indignant occasionally over the deep damnation of their taking off. In my humble opinion their murder was an offense greater than circulating reading matter to which objection could be made on moral grounds. To state it briefly, the enforcement of the Comstock law is a greater crime than its infraction.

Out in Arkansas a few years ago an Adventist was put in jail for working on Sunday, and from lack of his support his wife and child died. Nothing as criminal as his arrest and his imprisonment could occur through a violation of the obscenity statutes, and therefore I hav no hesitation in denying that the circulation of obscene literature, while it may be a serious offense, is as diabolical as the passage and enforcement of the Sunday laws. When murder, rape, arson, theft, and all other violations of the rights of person and property hav become unknown; when the history of the race, of church and state, has been forgotten, and when such a thing as an infringement of human liberty can no longer be imagined, then, but not till then, Mr. Green will hav some excuse for holding the opinion which he has expressed in the words quoted.

That ignorance—by some called "innocence"—which is fostered by statutory law is about as undesirable and shaky an article as the superstition which is supported in the same manner.

The latest spiritist imposture that has come to notice is a communication in the Spirit of Truth purporting to emanate from Ezra H. Heywood, late of Princeton, Mass. The prophet of Ahab represents Mr. Heywood as uttering this flubdub: "Heart in hand and soul in soul I gently and sweetly stand with the heroic Garrison." Ezra Heywood, with his heart in his hand, gently and sweetly standing! It is further represented that Heywood has forgiven Anthony Comstock—and Comstock still on earth and unrepentant! Get out, you fraud.

My Uncle Benjamin R. Tucker, editor of Liberty, reminds me that while condemning Lady Somerset's crusade against the concert gardens of London, I am speaking highly of John Burns, M.P., who was her assistant in that matter. I am thankful for the reproof, correction, and instruction in righteousness. The facts of the case had escaped my observation or memory; but I should hav guessed by a parity of reasoning that an individual who declares himself a Socialist, and in favor of nationalizing the principal departments of labor, would hardly overlook so considerable an industry as that alluded to. Still the inclination to attack the under dog is not peculiar to Socialists. As a Socialist, however, Mr. Burns has given us a fair illustration of what to expect under the reign of that system. If the government may conduct an industry, it follows as a natural consequence that the government may discontinue or suppress it. I doubt if any government in the world would make an appropriation for the publication of Liberty—and that is not the only kind of liberty that would be squelched. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The church has not allowed women to inherit or hold property. It was a general ecclesiastical rule that a woman could never take part of an inheritance with a man unless by the particular and ancient customs of certain towns and cities. This restriction upon woman's right of property so obliterated the sense of justice in men's mind that husbands hav not hesitated to use property coming to them through wives in the maintenance of a second or illegal family, while denying the legal wife and children the commonest necessaries of life. As late as 1878, when a law was enacted in one of the Swiss cantons allowing sisters to share inheritances with brothers, it met with great opposition from such brothers, many of whom protested their own ruin would follow.—Matilda Joslyn Gage, in the Truth Seeker Annual for 1895.

The Hit of the Season.

CENTER POINT, LA., Dec. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to congratulate Mr. Heston on his "Thanksgiving Reminder." It is the best thing of the season. I would like to see him and Colonel Ingersoll, as I think them great men, and hope they may liv long and prosper; also long may liv the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

LOD H. DANIEL.

It is Food and Drink.

ISHPEMING, MICH., Nov. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Four Hundred Years" all right, and I am wonderfully pleased with it. I hav read five hundred pages straight, besides ins and outs. It is meat for the soul. It created an appetite and then satisfied it. If it was three meals a day and no book, or two meals a day with the book, I am sure that I should take the two meals every time. If you please, send me Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible, four copies, and the "Godly Women of the Bible."

I am not living in the church, but almost. They are getting up all the time these cantatas representing the godly women of the Bible, and I want to giv them a look at their characters. I get into many arguments with them, but they cannot answer my questions. Find money inclosed for books. Yours truly,

JAS. BLACKNEY.

Would Not Giv Him a Chance.

CORTLAND, O., Dec. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, for which send me the best paper in the world, the dear old TRUTH SEEKER.

John E. Remsburg delivered three lectures in this place November 26-28 to small but intelligent audiences. His subjects were: "Bible Morality," "Some Flaws in Christ's Credentials," and the "Sunday Question." Our people consider Mr. Remsburg a splendid speaker and an honest gentleman. The writer extended a challenge to our clericals to be present and ask questions upon the subject, but they did not show up.

Last winter it was told the writer that the Disciple minister wished an Infidel to get up in his audience and state his reasons for being an unbeliever. A friend of mine wanted me to go and reply. I did go, but this moral dictator closed his services without giving me the privilege. He knew I was present. B. F. PARSONS.

Orthodoxy Weakened in Little Palo.

PALO, IA., Dec. 4, 294.

MR. EDITOR: To you, your Brother George and all the TRUTH SEEKER family, I send greeting. I do hope you will hav a happy Christmas and New Year's, and that the coming year will be a very prosperous one to one and all. I do not expect to see many more, as I am in my seventy-fourth year and feel the infirmities of old age creeping on very fast. But I am still able to work some in the cause I like so well, and I take great pleasure in THE TRUTH SEEKER and my books, what I hav left. I hav given away more than half of them, but I hav enough left to do good work with. I keep my paper and books a-going all I can, and I can see the good effects of it. This place cannot support one preacher well now. I hav seen the time when we had three and sometimes four, and I think I am to blame. I am well satisfied the church has not as strong a hold on the people here as it had years ago, and I do not intend it ever shall hav again if I can help it, for the older I get the more I am disgusted with the way it draws the money out of the people, and I ask the people what they receive for it? Well, they can not show much good for it sure. I must close now, hoping this may catch the eye of some that hav known me sometime in the past. I am, as ever, yours truly,

JOHN STRATFORD.

Good Words for a New Lecturer.

CINCINNATI, O., Dec. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday night Mr. E. C. Wilmot lectured for this society upon "The Orthodox Devil," and although this was the second time he delivered this lecture for us, it was very interesting throughout. Mr. Wilmot, in past seasons, lectured for us upon "Do the American Protestants Believe the Bible?" and "The First Transgression." He is drawing up a new lecture, "Faith, Fiction, and Folly," and he is now prepared to deliver the first three anywhere, and is willing to do so for a very low compensation. Mr. Wilmot is desirous of getting a start as a Freethought lecturer, and I recommend him to all as a very intelligent, brilliant, and unusually witty speaker.

I consider him the equal of a professional Freethought lecturer. He is a gentleman of about fifty years of age, a school teacher by profession, and his voice is very good, while his lectures are original and unique.

The Cincinnati Enquirer, the morning paper having the largest circulation, devoted almost a column to a report of his lecture delivered last Sunday night. This is the longest account of a lecture delivered for us by a Freethought lecturer ever published, which is quite flattering to Mr. Wilmot.

He would be a credit to the Freethought platform, and he stated to me that he would be willing to lecture for a very little above expenses. We all consider him a lecturer of much ability, and we are anxious to assist him. Any one desiring the services of Mr. Wilmot should address him at Pruett, Kenton Co., Ky.

Providence—alias God.

LOS ANGELES, Turkey Day, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The usual Thanksgiving editorials appeared in our city papers today, and one editor referred to the alleged fact that Providence directs not only the affairs of individuals but of nations, and he professed to believe it. Later on in editorial comments he took occasion to refer to the recent outrages in Armenia, and expressed it as his opinion that the signatory powers to the Berlin treaty should take immediate action to prevent other outrages of a similar kind. I regard this demand for immediate action to oppose Providence, alias God, as a direct insult to his intelligence and an unjustifiable effort to help him manage his own affairs. Those who think Providence is "directing" the affairs of individuals, and nations also, should be the last to find fault with the way things go, or to use force in warring against his will. Who made these barbarians with their brutal natures and bloodthirsty dispositions but this same Providence who now directs and controls them; and what right hav those who believe this to criticise their God or counsel opposition to his way of doing things? How can they affirm that "he doeth all things well," and then make efforts to defeat his possible intentions later on? It is remarkably inconsistent to giv God credit for wisely running the world according to his plan and purpose, and then to attempt to run it themselvs. It looks very much as though they were dissatisfied with the explanation that "God's ways are not our ways," and had an idea that they could "direct" some things better than he is now doing. Such beliefs must eventually plunge those who hold them into doubt of the God idea and all its attendant evils; and I wish to caution those who desire to retain the faith in the controling power of Providence, not to think too much on questions of this kind. "There must be a God or some of us would lose faith," is the purported remark of Armenians who survived the massacre, which leads me to wonder how much longer faith can resist facts that utterly disprove it. How long can credulity continue to swallow what reason rejects; and when, oh, when, will common sense cease to be rejected for idiotic nonsense?

C. SEVERANCE.

Prof. J. H. Cook on Right Living.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "Right Living"! Susan H. Wixon could not hav chosen two more suggestiv, expressiv, and comprehensiv words as a title for her book. I am tempted to write those two words over and over till my sheet is full. Right living is an ideal to aspire to and work for in this ignorant and stupid world. Right living is all that life is worth. It implies, in its widest and fullest significance, that unless we are conceived, gestated, born, and educated right, or in conformity to the laws of health, life, and parentage, there can be no right living. Right living is to be developed in every part of the brain and body, since all life or living is, to me, but the product of the organism. "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit," or right living, for, as is the organism, so is the living. Right living is the objectiv point, the goal, of all true Freethinkers and humanitarians. Right living would make our earth a paradise and supply all human wants. We want to keep open and free from all obstruction the road of human progress, that humanity may grow into conditions of right living. Right living implies a state of society in which the love of truth, liberty, justice, and humanity predominates. Oh, that the "soul savers," who lead their votaries away from right living and a true life, would come down from the regions of the man-made gods and "airy nothing," and liv right themselvs and teach right living. Right living pertains to the here and the now. Right living is to save and take care of the body. Right living in its fullest sense implies a basis of a strong, healthy body, with a dominant intellectual and moral brain—a fountain of physical and mental power and enjoyment. Right living implies right views and motivs. Right living includes every purpose of Freethought; all the objects of the Nine Demands. There can be no right living in slavery of any kind. Very few can or do liv right. How much I hav been cheated out of life by my ignorance and the false education of long ago! Our schools and "learned (?) professions" teach very little right living either by precept or example. O reader, aspire to right living.

Two Cartoons.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 8, 294.

MR. EDITOR: A very long time has passed since I hav listened to a Thanksgiving sermon from a pulpit, but the one on your first page the week preceding the day appointed by the president is worthy of comment. Certainly your artist surpasses all the preachers in his representations of a model Thanksgiving. I think it would be well to preserve that picture, frame it, and hang it in our dining rooms to giv appetite to those who hav not as yet suffered the pangs of hunger. In the old slavery days was a picture representing a runaway slave woman, barelegged and barefooted, only one ragged garment covered a part of her person, a most agonized expression of fear upon her face as she looked back upon her pursuers, who were running to overtake her. One of the persons represented was a Presbyterian minister of Boston who had emphasized from his pulpit the Christian duty of returning fugitivs to bondage, citing the example of Paul, who sent back Onesimus to his master; the other man was the "godlike Webster," with his saying that, however disagreeable, "a constitutional duty must be performed," written upon the picture. That picture was hung on the wall of more than one parlor and did effectual work in showing the wickedness of Christian and republican law. So this sermon so plainly preached by Watson Heston should be used to show people the wicked absurdity of thanking an unknown power for blessings which are curses when we consider the ignorance of a government which makes it possible that a few should be fed to repletion while the many die with starvation.

I am always yours for the redemption of the world from ignorance and superstition,

LUCY N. COLMAN.

"Home-Making."

YONCALLA, OR., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The question of "home-making" is one of the most important a man is called upon to decide, both for himself and his children. There are at this time hundreds and thousands of families living upon their small earnings or upon the bread of charity who, if they could get a small home farm, could at least raise what they need to eat and make a living and be independent, and be in a position to wait for the coming of "good times." Again there are many who hav saved something by years of toil and find themselvs thrown out of employment, with growing children who will need some place in which to start in life, and who are wondering if there may not be something better for them than a life of toil such as their fathers hav had, subject to periodical panics which stop manufacturing, cut down trade, and consume the savings of years in buying food during the months of idleness. A safe business is that of the tiller of the soil, where he has a good farm, well located, properly cared for, and intelligently handled. When he givs his attention to husbandry instead of "statesmanship" he is the most independent man in the world, free from care and sure of his comfortable living. I do not refer to men who are trying on the stony hillsides of New England or upon the impoverished farms of the Middle States, to force a living from the unwilling soil or trying to compete for a market against the fertil valleys and hills of western Oregon, where we never hav a failure of crops of any kind. Our land is very productiv. We raise all kinds of fruits except the tropical without irrigation. We raise wheat, oats, corn, and barley. We hav no blizzards nor cyclones. It is a warm, very healthful climate, well watered country, and land is cheap. The Yoncalla valley cannot be surpassed for fruit growing, the famous California fruit belt not excepted, and I am proud to say we hav a great many Liberals here who read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I take it and six other papers, but like it better than all the rest. I am now getting up a club for it. I think it the best paper published in the United States. I hav been requested by a great many readers of your paper in the Eastern states to write for its columns a description of western Oregon; hence this letter. Any who may desire further information address as above, inclosing stamp.

Yours for truth, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,

W. BRUMMETT.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

SAGINAW, MICH., Nov. 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "Honor to whom honor is due"—a very consistent apothegm; but it is often thrown aside as useless material in these days of advanced Christian ethics. But in the ranks of Freethought it holds its sway. I confess that I am profoundly gratified to know that my most sanguin expectations hav been eclipsed by the superb excellence of Putnam's new book—"Four Hundred Years of Freethought." To say that I am pleased with it is not half what I feel; I am vastly more than pleased. The introduction alone is worth the price of the book; it is one of the clearest and most profound statements of the principles and methods of all that is fundamental in the literature of Freethought. The author's definition of Freethought is unsurpassed in correctness and clearness of statement. The way in which Mr. Putnam presents the claims of the men and women who hav done so much to emancipate the human race from the cruel curse of religion and superstition deserves the gratitude and profound admiration of every Freethinker in the world. The record made by these noble workers is so faithfully drawn by the pen of this author, their merits and praiseworthiness so clearly set forth in terms that need no revision, that a sense of fitness says, Well done, Putnam! I wish a million copies of the great book could be placed in as many homes in this country. All in all, it is the great work of this century on the line specified in the introduction. I am not only proud of the book, I am also proud of its author.

I must also confess that I am proud of the way in which the Truth Seeker Company has done its work. In the presentation of this work to the thoughtful public, in the perfection of its printed pages and beauty of its artistic faithfulness in the presentation of the faces of those whom the author put upon these pages through his mental pen with such nicely shaded colors, I congratulate the Truth Seeker Company in the highest terms of praise. Its artist complements the author's mental pictures, while the author's mental pictures equally complement the artist.

I hope the Truth Seeker Company will reap a rich reward in shekels of gold and silver for the good work it has done in the gift of this book to the public. I also trust that the author will not fail to gather in a handsome reward for his hard work aside from the conviction of "Well done, good and faithful servant." It is not a season book, but a book for the coming ages as well as for the present.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Texas is After God as Well as Rockefeller.

LORENA, TEX., Nov. 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I am a subscriber to your excellent paper, I trust you will giv me some room to express my ideas on a few questions. I protest, and I voice the sentiments of thousands, against your treatment of the "God of Abraham." You claim that he is the creature of human fancy. So be it. Suppose you should invent something, and after mature deliberation you should decide that the universal use of your invention would clothe you with power, surround you with wealth, and make you all that a poor earthly mortal should wish to be, would it not make you "mad" if some one should abuse, malign, and otherwise seek to injure your invention and so far succeed as to very seriously shake your power? Now, I don't pretend for a moment that I possess any such power as above spoken of, but a few of those thousands do.

Your unkind utterances concerning God and Christianity shock my sensibilities (lucky in having them after having read THE TRUTH SEEKER) very much. Now I know that "my redeemer liveth," and it is very clearly demonstrated in those Kurd atrocities committed in Armenia the other day. The facts are well known, and some thousands of Christians were summoned before the judgment-seat of God, and the summons was served by Mohammedan soldiery! But when we think of the reward awaiting those faithful followers of the "meek and lowly Nazarene," who said, "If any man come unto me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters; yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple;" and whose disciple, after having fulfilled all the requirements, was inspired to teach, that "whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer"—I repeat that when I think of the reward awaiting those victims of religious persecution, I feel tempted to yell, "Hurrah for Texas!"

Of course, everyone knows that God is "omnipotent and omniscient" (whatever that means), and therefore he necessarily knew the impending doom of those poor faithful Armenians. And he knew also, ages ago, that these poor people would be ruthlessly murdered, tortured to death by barbarians; the men, bound and helpless, forced to see their wives, sisters, and daughters suffer indignities that would bring the blush of shame to the brow of a Fejee Islander—and they might hav averted it by renouncing their belief (had they been so-a-mind)—and he never raised a finger to prevent it.

There, you see, is where God's loving providence comes in. Well, it's a mighty good thing that God doesn't liv in Texas, for, if he did, and these things had occurred in Texas, along with the indictments against the soldiery for "murder, rape, and robbery" would hav been one against God Almighty as an accessory before the facts.

I received "Four Hundred Years" all safe, and am well pleased with it; also, Bell's "Handbook of Freethought." I would not be without them.

Hoping that you may avoid the "wrath to come," I am, as ever, the friend of liberty, WM. M. MATTHEWS.

A Clerical Prevaricator Called to Time.

CLAY CENTER, KAN., Dec. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 on books, and as soon as I sell the rest of the books I will send you more. Also find inclosed two articles taken from the Clay Center Dispatch. They speak for themselvs.

Yours as ever, J. B. WISE.

REV. MR. VENNUM'S UNGRAMMATICAL DENIAL.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say to your many readers that the statements made by Mr. Wise, and printed in your valuable paper, in which he (Wise) claims that he and myself had a controversy in regard to certain portions of the Bible. Now, Mr. Editor, this is false. Mr. Wise and myself never had one minute's conversation in regard to the Bible. Neither on my part hav we had a correspondence in regard to the Bible. Neither has Mr. Wise, up to this time, ever asked my opinion on any portion of the Bible. He has written me a great many letters which will show for themselvs when the proper time comes. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Wise is not seeking for truth, and his letters are such as no gentleman would write to another. I stood his slang writing for over one year. Coming home one day I found my wife feeling quite sad over a letter which he had sent me. The next day I wrote Mr. Wise and asked him in a gentlemanly manner to stop his letter writing to me, as I did not want to receive them in my family. Then came the postal card, which he wrote and mailed me, with his own name signed. This card will speak for itself in the proper time. When all his publications, regarding a discussion between he and myself, will recoil on his own deceitful head, for I defy him now, and shall in the court, to show his letters, which he claims to hav received from me. He has them not, for they never hav been written, and all his slush is utterly false.

H. B. VENNUM.

IN REPLY TO REV. MR. VENNUM.

EDITOR DISPATCH: I would be pleased to answer the article written by H. B. Vennum, and which appeared in your valuable paper of Oct. 25, 1894. Mr. Vennum put himself upon record as a persecutor to perpetuate his faith—rather than appeal to reason—thereby making himself ridiculous in the minds of all liberty-loving people—and now seeing his position, he, by falsifying, tries to make the public believe that he is innocent and only protecting his family against the sending, through the mail, such passages as are found in Isaiah xxxvi, 12, which he himself claims to be holy. Were they holy, they would injure no one, but the reverend's own actions show that he doubts their being holy, and is ashamed of his doctrin and does not even want his own family to know the kind of doctrin he patronizes. Mr. Vannum must not think that people are going to believe him simply because he is a preacher. There are people in Clay Center and in his own town of Industry that will testify under oath that they saw letters which Mr. Wise received from Mr. Vennum while he and Wise were having a controversy on the Bible through the mail, and the people of Industry know when Mr. Vennum first came to Industry he started the dispute between himself and Mr. Wise by misrepresenting Freethought, or Infidelity, as he was pleased to term it, and challenging people in many of his sermons (as is very common for the clergy to do) to show wherein Freethought ever did anything for the world, thus forcing Mr. Wise into the dispute which ended in the arrest of Mr. Wise.

Mr. Vennum is very bold in his assertions while having his own way, but when he thinks he will be beaten by argument and reason, he appeals to law to subdue his adversary, or he has business somewhere else, as in the case of the lectures given at Industry by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, Professor Bell, and myself. He is never on hand to defend his cause, though getting invitations weeks ahead, which shows there is something wrong with the man or his doctrin, or both.

Washington, Kas. JAMES PONTIUS.

A View of Freethought.

Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Lack of self-reliance, a prevailing sentiment of imperfection, a feeling of dependence, carefully cultivated and entertained for the benefit of a few, permitted feudalism to flourish, acknowledged the right of hereditary rule, and initiated, developed, and promoted the worship of supernatural gods.

Although weakness in human character is diminishing with the advance of education, mankind is yet unwilling to discard belief in religions incompatible with reason, a phenomenon that must find its explanation in the fact that routine, conservatism, and superstition are united to maintain the customary and ancient theories. The older these theories are the more difficult it is for science to present direct proof of their apocryphal character.

Religion is adjusted to the intellectual faculties of the masses. The Egyptian Iris succeeded to the fire and the sacred bulls of the earlier days; then came Zeus and Jupiter with more firmly established reputations. They were supplanted later by a unique divinity which himself underwent several modifications and transformations, represented in his succeeding phases by the various creeds recognized up to date in civilized countries.

Notwithstanding we admire mythologies for their sometimes ennobling personifications of the beautiful and the heroic, we rebuke the idea of worshiping ourselvs, Jupiter, or Woden, or of possessing a satisfactory substitute in a more powerful and independent God. A Moses, a Jesus Christ, or a Mohammed, who should appear to-day, claiming to be inspired by a God, could awake only the commiseration of all thinking people, the commiseration that we all feel for the insane. We are advanced enough to refuse to believe that miracles can be performed in our day, but are willing to admit that miracles were possible some twenty centuries ago.

It is true, science is so far powerless to solve the problem, the origin of our existence; it is, however, an even more difficult task to prove the existence of a creating God, although the assumption is the easiest of explications and therefore accepted by those having no use for difficult problems. The faithful believer is content to end all discussions on this subject with the double interrogation: "But who has made us and all our surroundings? Can anything come out of nothing?"

Freethought as well as the church claims to teach the good and to condemn the bad. The difference lies merely in the method, the latter employing hypothetical illustrations and invoking supernatural sanction; the first contenting itself with the use of known, proven facts to fortify its teaching. It seems logical to assert that supernatural examples are more difficult to comprehend, by both children and adults, than historical, simply human facts. Is it not as easy to educate our children in the love of the good and the hatred of the bad as in the fear of a God's anger? Are we compelled to seek moral illustrations in legends and stories the authenticity of which can never be proved?

If it is pleaded that civilization is due to the religious influence of Christianity, it is answered that it is an acknowledged fact that the Egyptians and the ancient Greeks, three and four thousand years ago, attained the hight of civilization.

Further, it is inexact to affirm that morality cannot exist without religion. Not taking into account that we hav to condemn as immoral a considerable number of passages of the (alleged) holiest of books, we find that in a broader sense morality means happiness; he who creates happiness for himself and others, injuring none, is moral. Everybody is aware that the church never claimed earthly happiness as the most desirable condition of things, assuming that humanity is too weak to do good if there is no further punishment for the bad. We hav, however, no warrant to indulge the degrading supposition that, for instance, charity would cease without the hope of direct and material remuneration. It is, on the contrary, morally elevating to suggest that people are capable of doing good without hope of compensation. On the other hand, it may easily be ascertained that the simple belief in religion does not prevent immorality and crime—ignorance grasping quickly, through simple repentance, pardon for any mischief.

Cultivation of the mind is essential to the comprehension, the propagation, and the living of ethical principles. One can further safely state that eternal punishment, being exaggerated, cannot be moral; in fact, the question arises here: How can there be peace for a real moral soul in the expectation of seeing the eternal torture of a large part of humanity? When we subtract damnation from religious teachings we deprive all religious creeds of their foundation. EUG. TEWELS.

Would Exorcise "Him" by an Ejaculation.

FAIRFAX, MINN., Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In view of the fact that nature absolutely solves the great mystery of life, creation, and phenomena, in our presence and under the immediate view of our senses in a light wherein we may perceive and read the entire details and logic as expressed by her functions of power in bringing into existence the products and reproducts of the globe, which are actual fruits of nature's functions and not problematical creatures of assumption, and compelling them to pass through a career of definit stages of existence from a non-organized state of matter, to an ultimate entity and a final destiny—why is it, in view of all this, that science, with so many discriminating students, has so long signally failed to explain the details of the operation in some common-sense, intelligent manner?

The answer to the query can be looked for only in the postulated Theistic idea expressed in the first verse of the Bible, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The belief in the assumption has been almost universal, and has become so deeply rooted in the minds of mankind that it is almost impossible for them to perceive that the entire functions of creation are inherent in the primeval matter composing nature, and that fills all space, instead of in an ideal personal being called God, who is represented to be entirely alien to and independent of the principles, powers, and functions of nature, and who is endowed with the most extraordinary super-human powers that can be conceived of by mortals, an image in the form and likeness of man and possessing his attributes and propensities.

Besides being represented as a monstrous superhuman being, he is represented as being a God—the creator of the entire universe and all belonging to it, as his empire, and the inhabitants thereof his created subjects, who were created by his autocratic majesty, as emperor, for his especial purpose and for their especial benefit while subjects of his worldly empire, over which he rules with despotic power by his mere will and providence only, promising to all his subjects who are loyal and faithful to him and obey his edicts in this world, a perpetual seat near his throne in a spiritual empire, which he has erected and prepared for them somewhere outside, or in some remote corner of this material empire. The disloyal and unfaithful are to be confined in a horrid prison especially prepared for them in some Siberian corner, the localities both being unknown to mortals.

This postulated God is assumed to be the only true god over and above many other supposed gods. He is eternal, everlasting, most high, almighty, all powerful, all-knowing—knowing the end of all things from their beginning—omnipresent, Lord God, God of gods, Lord of lords, a great King above all gods, a God of hosts greater than all Gods. He is a spirit, a living God, the great God of Israel in whom all powers reside and than whom there are no higher powers, for "there is no power but of God and the powers that be are ordained of God" (Rom. xiii, 1), thus alienating all powers of nature entirely from the domain of his empire and [assuming] authority over it.

Thus there is supposed to be but "one God—the father, of whom are all things, . . . one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things" (1 Cor. viii, 6), who is entirely independent of the principles, powers, and functions of nature; in fact, who is the supreme being, author, designer, and creator of nature. And that it was absolutely necessary that he should be and exist, in order to design and create his own empire and all belonging to it without any kind of matter or raw material, or even a hint of any other law or power than his will; that he might govern, control, and execute by his providence, his will power, over his entire domain. All that is necessary for him to do in order to carry into effect his commands and laws is for him to speak his will and say, Let it be. His voice is so powerful that his entire limitless empire—the bounds of which are inconceivable by mortals—instantly hear, obey, and it is done.

To overthrow the entire Theistic idea and the Theistic theory based upon it, it is only necessary to exercise a little common sense and repeat the oft expressed ejaculations of women, "How ridiculous!" "The idea!"

The number of essays and books that hav been written, since records began, based upon the postulated idea of god—which has been taken for granted as being true without actual proof or knowledge or even a hint of law—if piled upon a plot of ground ten miles square would make a mountain a mile in hight. As yet a solution upon that foundation appears to be no nearer a satisfactory answer than when records first began. Why? It is because the assumption to begin with is not true.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Little Arm-Chair.

Nobody sits in the little arm-chair;
It stands in a corner dim;
But a white-haired mother gazing there
And yearningly thinking of him,
Sees through the dust of long ago
The bloom of her boy's sweet face
As he rocks so merrily to and fro,
With a laugh that cheers the place.

Sometimes he holds a book in his hand,
Sometimes a pencil and slate;
And the lesson is hard to understand,
And the figures hard to mate;
But she sees the nod of the father's head,
So proud of his little son,
And she hears the word so often said:
"No fear for our little one."

They were wonderful days, the dear, sweet days,
When a child with sunny hair
Was here to scold, to kiss, and to praise
At her knee in the little chair.
She lost him back in her busy years,
When the great world caught the man
And he strode away past hopes and fears
To his place in the battle's van.

And now and then in a wistful dream,
Like a picture out of date,
She sees a head with a golden gleam
Bent over a pencil and slate.
And she lives again the happy day,
The days of her young life's spring,
When the small arm-chair stood just in the way,
The center of everything. —Harper's Bazaar.

Correspondence.

Milford, Mass, Nov. 17, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am interested in The Truth Seeker as a liberal paper, and especially interested to see the Children's Corner made of value to the children. I think there ought to be not only a Children's Corner, but a paper for children. As we hav no such paper, I want to see parents and children take hold and at least show that they are interested, and consequently write to ask if there is anything I can do to assist in that line.

I hav three daughters between the ages of twelve and sixteen, and the middle one, aged fourteen, has written a letter for the Corner. I hav asked the children several times if they would like to write for the paper, but they said they had nothing to write about. They did not want to say, "This is my first letter to the Corner; I am a Freethinker, and hope this letter won't find the waste basket." I told them to write about something they knew, but they are so much like their mother that they can't write without something to call them out. Lillian Boyd's letter struck Bertha as something to write about, so you hav it. I think, perhaps, I can get the others to write later. They do not know that Bertha has written.

I hav my own ideas about the religious education of children, and the principal thing, I think, is to leave the religion out. I would, if I could hav controled the matter, never hav had them hear the word God nor religion until they were old enough to study and compare religions. As it was not possible to do this, I treated the matter as one of no importance, and when Bertha was six years old a Catholic girl began to talk to her about God, and Bertha said, "Emma, you must stop. My mamma don't want us to talk slang. She don't allow us to say, 'You bet,' nor 'By golly,' nor 'By George,' nor talk about God, nor anything bad." She had heard men swear, and heard women use slang, and hearing the word God in the swearing considered it all one thing. When children talked religion to my girls, they would ask me about it. Once one of them asked me about Jesus, and I told her I did not know anything about him. The Bible represented him as a good man who died for his belief; but historians differed, some claimed there was no proof that he ever lived, and some thought he did liv. "Well," said my little girl, "you don't know about it then." "No," said I, "I don't know." "Well, I guess the whole thing is mixed," said she, and dropped the subject.

I never allow the girls to attend Sunday school (where the purpose is to control the thinking of children). I did not teach them that they were Freethinkers, but merely kept them thinking, not on religion, but on other matters; on how they wanted a dress made, how they wanted their hair arranged, how to control themselvs, to observe others' actions, and through their own experience and observation know what was right and wrong; to read what they could understand on dress and hav clothes made sensibly from choice, and I saw to it that comfortable dress was beautiful dress as far as possible. Now that they are old enough to reason on religion, they are as rational on that as on other things. Of course, in results, I hav not reached my ideal with them, but, considering their inheritance, I hav done well, or hav succeeded in having them do well. The children hav always been free in thought and in expression, and sometimes the expression would be a surprise to me on a line that was quite new.

I bought a colored doll for my youngest when she was four years old. The doll looked so much alive that I liked it myself. I dressed it up nicely, and the children all loved it better than any doll they ever had. A lady visited us and wanted them to dress the doll in calico and put an apron and cap on her and hav her for a servant for the other dolls. The children could not understand it. "Why make her a servant?" "Because she is black" "What has black to do with it?" "Why, folks used to make slaves of black folk." "I don't see why?" and then, "Isn't a servant as good as anybody? When Hannah [the girl who helped with our work] goes out, she dresses as nicely as anybody, and she takes as good care of us as mamma does, and we like her. I guess the black doll can keep her nice clothes." I said to the woman, who was a Democrat during the war, "You see how old slavery ideas stick to you, and how almost impossible it is for one taught to respect the rights of others to understand the possibility of slavery."

Then conversing on woman's equal right, their ideas came out as unexpectedly. There were two boys that used to play with about eight or ten girls in our yard, the largest and the smallest were boys. They used to play "cars"; the big boy would go ahead and the largest girl take hold of his coat and so on down, the little boy being in the rear. They would puff and scuff their feet and call stations, and hav a good time. One day the older boy was away, but I saw the train going on regular time; presently Pearl, my oldest, then six, came in and sat down. I noticed she looked as though something was wrong. I asked, "What's the matter, Pearl?" "Mamma, it's the funniest thing; it doesn't make any difference how little or how weak the boy is, he thinks a boy must be engin!" and she would not play so. So all through their lives I hav noticed that children brought up to think will think, and there is little danger of "Christians stealing our children" if we do not put our children under their influence.

Pardon this long letter. I hav written this much to you to show you that I am really interested in the subject, and let you see whether or not I could help in any way in booming the Children's Corner.

I wish C. Fannie Allyn would contribute regularly. Her mother's heart is always full of love for the little ones. I hav heard her speak of you many times, and she has wanted me to meet you.

I was away from home on Bertha's fourteenth birthday, so wrote her a long letter on Freethought and intellectual hospitality, etc. It is from that she makes her quotation. I thought her old enough to hav me help her formulate a definition of Freethinker, and not get the idea that many older persons hav, that you must accept some particular Materialist's or Agnostic's view to be a Freethinker.

Sincerely yours,
M. Florence Johnson.

[The above was not written for publication, but the ideas presented are so good that we prevailed on the writer to consent to its appearance in print. We feel sure all will appreciate the thoughts expressed, and mothers may find some ideas in Mrs. Johnson's views for guidance in bringing up their own children. We had a delightful meeting with Mrs. Johnson in Boston, on the 2d of December at our lecture in Paine Hall. She is a fine elocutionist, being a graduate from the Emerson school of oratory, and among her dramatic recitations she includes one from "Apples of Gold"—"Jack Howard's Stepmother"—which, she says, never fails to interest her hearers, especially the boys. Mrs. Johnson is a talented lady, and we commend her to those seeking such service as she can so well render. Her three lovely daughters, Pearl, Bertha, and Olive, are violinists and giv rare promis for the future.

We also met that Sunday our esteemed friend, Fannie Allyn, as bright and winsome as ever. She has occasionally illumined the Corner by her poetic effusions, and she will always find a royal welcome there, whenever she may come again.—Ed. C. C.]

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the price named.

"The Better World," by E. B. Southwick, M.D., is published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. The title suggests heaven, but the writer is only concerned with the heaven he has dreamed on earth. His work is a Utopian romance, narrating his fancied experiences among an ideal community, in which wisdom, virtue, and happiness prevail, and women take the lead in most things. One point is rather odd—the women, in consequence of suckling their young artificially, hav no more bosom than the men; and, as both sexes dress alike, it is only by the broader hips and smaller feet that you know you are talking to a female. Dr. Southwick's romance is in some respects interesting, but in other respects rather tiresome. It is a form of composition to which only great art and high literary form can reconcile us. We think Dr. Southwick would be better advised to deliver his message to the world in a straightforward exposition.

"Religion and the Bible," by F. D. Cummings, reaches us from the same publishing house. It contains much shrewd criticism of the orthodox faith from the standpoint of a Spiritualist. Being written with great simplicity and lucidity, and with unmistakable candor and earnestness, it should be useful in introducing Freethought to orthodox readers. That the writer still believes in immortality, not as an article of faith, but as the disclosure of reason, perhaps adds to its utility in this respect.—London Freethinker.

Weak Lungs.

Extracts from Dr. Hunter's Famous Book, showing Remarkable Success in Lung Cases. (Continued from last week's Truth Seeker.)

The mind has such a controling influence over the healing powers of the body that there is little chance for the recovery of any one who believes his disease incurable. Once convinced that he can reasonably hope for the resteration of his health, by knowing of the cure of others similarly afflicted, his vitality increases and every function of his body responds to the ministrations of the physician.

I have in thousands of cases, including all stages and forms of Consumption, effected the removal of every symptom and the complete restoration of health.

The following cures show what can be accomplished by a proper treatment of the lungs:

I.—Mr. Frank E. Lewen, of Delury's, corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth street, New York City, was attacked in March, 1893, with a deep congestion of the lungs which rapidly developed into phthisis. His disease continued to increase until Nov. 28th, at which time he came under my care. His left lung was then solid with tubercles, and his condition so critical that I feared he might not live a month His cough was incessant, his expectoration a thick yellow matter, and his breath extremely short. He was placed at once under treatment by antiseptic inhalations and showed signs of improvement from the first. His breathing was freer, the solidified portion of his left lung gradually diminished by the absorption of the tuberculous matter, and his condition became hopeful of cure. In eighteen months from the commencement he ceased treatment a well man. He has not required a prescription for the last nine months, and has passed through the severe weather of last winter without any signs of relapse.

II.—James Bynum, of Brooklyn, N.Y., had been for several years afflicted with catarrh before his lungs became affected. He had had several attacks of hemorrhage, and was just recovering from one when he first consulted me. His cough was attended by purulent expectoration. Every afternoon he had a chill, followed by a high fever, and at night became bathed in a cold sweat. In the three and a half months preceding the 10th of October he had lost twenty-seven pounds in weight. On examining his lungs I found a large cavity in the apex of the left, from which he was coughing up a mixture of pus and softened tubercle, and the lung around the cavity was dull under percussion and partly solidified by the deposition of tuberculous matter. Considering the rapid progress the disease had made, the emaciated condition to which he was reduced, and the violence of his present symptoms, it was impossible not to feel the gravest doubts of his recovery. My first prescription was made on the 10th of October, and I continued to treat him through the winter and following summer. In a little over a year from commencing treatment he was able to attend to his business, and in six months more every symptom had entirely left him and he had nearly regained his best weight before his sickness.

III.—Mrs. Edward Raynor, of 24 Lake street, East Orange, N. J., was another bad case which had resisted all the usual remedies and been pronounced hopeless. Her left lung was ulcerated and a large cavity existed in the upper lobe. The disease began in a severe congestion of the lungs in the great blizzard of March, 1888. This was followed some two years later by a severe attack of la grippe She coughed up bloody matter from the lungs, had hectic fever and night sweats, was very short of breath, greatly emaciated, had an ulcerated throat, and her nervous system was utterly broken down, Under the direct treatment of the lungs by antiseptic air inhalations her life was saved. All the symptoms of her disease have disappeared, her lungs are restored, and her general health fully reestablished.

IV.—David Hiscox, of 390 Webster avenue, Long Island City, a wealthy manufacturer, writes: "Every part of my system was breaking down under the weight of cough, profuse discharge, night sweats, and my chest seemed as if held in a vise. Under your treatment my strength came back, cough and night sweats disappeared. I was once more able to breathe. I could get a full, deep, satisfying breath of fresh air, and it was a glorious satisfaction that I had thought I would never realize again."

V.—Jesse F. Hiscox, of Long Island City, N. Y., says of his case: "My experience has been of the most satisfactory and substantial kind. I contracted catarrh, which gradually developed into bronchitis and a bad bronchial asthma. I treated with five different physicians, two of whom were specialists in lung diseases, but they had no control over my case. Under your treatment I have not had the slightest return of asthma, while the catarrh and bronchitis have been entirely overcome. I am perfectly convinced that yours is the only treatment for diseases of the breathing organs"

VI.—Mr. A. B. Tuthill, of 67 Perry street, New York city, was attacked by la grippe in April, 1891, which rapidly developed into catarrhal bronchitis, threatening to end in quick consumption. Under antiseptic air inhalations all his symptoms disappeared and he entirely regained his health.

VII.—Mr. Lambert Miller, of 324 Willow avenue, Hoboken, N. J. (with the wholesale house of Claflin & Co., New York city), was afflicted for eighteen months with catarrh of the throat, nose, and lungs, which affected his whole system—brain, nerves, and breathing. He derived no benefit from the usual treatment by his physicians, but under local treatment by antiseptic air inhalations he steadily improved and completely recovered his health.

Here are seven cases of Lung disease—three of them confirmed Consumption, two of chronic Bronchitis and Asthma combined, and three of Catarrhal Bronchitis—all of which were radically restored to health by local treatment applied directly to the lungs. They prove that tuberculous matter can be absorbed and tuberculous cavities healed in the lungs by antiseptic inhalations. No other treatment known has ever accomplished such results. Antiseptic air inhalations constitute the only hope that exists for any form of lung disease.

REV. JOSEPH NORWOOD, American Bible Society agent in Venezuela, was imprisoned because of his religion. The American minister at Caracas demanded his release. The secretary of the interior, by order of the president ad interim, at once telegraphed to the president of the state of Los Andes—where the arrest occurred—to instantly release Mr. Norwood and punish those responsible for the arrest, reminding the executiv that religious propaganda is not an offense under Venezuelan law. The preacher was immediately released and the chief of police who ordered the arrest was dismissed from his office.

FIFTY years ago twenty-eight weavers in the mills of Rochdale, Eng., started a coöperativ society. Each contributed one pound sterling to the capital of the company. The aggregate capital is $90,000,000, and the annual output is about $250,000,000, with profits amounting to nearly $23,000,000. BI-CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

November 21, 1894, was the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of François Marie Arouet (VOLTAIRE).

NAME me one nation where miracles hav not been performed, especially in times when reading and writing were unknown.—Voltaire.

To be free, to hav none but equals, is the true and natural life of man. Every other plan is an unworthy artifice, a bad comedy, in which one plays the part of master, another of slave, another parasite, and another pimp.—Voltaire.

THE lovers of miracles say they must be true. There are so many monuments in proof. And we say they must be false, since the vulgar hav believed them. A fable is current in one generation, it is established in the second, becomes respectable in the third, and the fourth elevates temples thereto.—Voltaire.

ON the whole, Englishmen are generally not at all aware how completely Voltaire succeeded in the great controversial object of his life, and that on the continent there is certainly not above one educated man in ten who has not very great doubts of the reality of any of the miracles in the Bible; and this I believe true even of Germany.—John Sterling

MORE than a century ago Catholicism, wrapped in robes red with the innocent blood of millions, holding in her frantic clutch crowns and scepters, honors and gold, the keys of heaven and hell—trampling beneath her feet the liberties of nations, in the proud moment of almost universal dominion, felt within her heartless breast the deadly dagger of Voltaire. From that blow the church never can recover. Livid with hatred she launched her eternal anathema at the great destroyer, and ignorant Protestants hav echoed the curse of Rome.—Ingersoll.

IN the presence of this society, frivolous and dismal, Voltaire alone, having before his eyes those united forces, the court, the nobility, capital; that unconscious power, the blind multitude; that terrible magistracy, so severe to subjects, so docil to the master, crushing and flattering, kneeling upon the people before the king; that clergy, vile mélange of hypocrisy and fanaticism; Voltaire alone, I repeat it, declared war against that coalition of all the social iniquities, against that enormous and terrible world, and he accepted battle with it. And what was his weapon? That which has the lightness of the wind and the power of the thunderbolt—a pen.—Victor Hugo.

VOLTAIRE'S task, however, was never directly political, but spiritual, to shake the foundations of that religious system which professed to be founded on the revelation of Christ. Was he not right? If we find ourselvs walking amid a generation of cruel and unjust and darkened spirits, we may be assured that it is their beliefs on what they deem highest that hav made them so. There is no counting with certainty on the justice of men who are capable of fashioning and worshiping an unjust divinity, nor on their humanity so long as they incorporate inhuman motivs in their most sacred dogma, nor on their reasonableness while they rigorously decline to accept reason as a test of truth.—Right Hon. John Morley, M.P.

Two hundred years ago, this 21st of November, was born the brilliant Freethought soldier, Voltaire. His name was long a terror to the orthodox. None was more hated, none more reviled. The reason is simple. He attacked bigotry and superstition, not in the dull and decorous fashion of pedants writing for the few, but with the wit and pleasantry of a practiced writer for the people. He made the bigots and tyrants appear ridiculous as well as odious. Those who felt the sting of his lashes denounced him as a Mephistopheles, whose writings all good people should avoid as they would a pestilence; and all whose interest lay in the perpetuation of absurd dogmas stigmatized Voltaire as a mere mocker, railing at all things holy.—J. M. Wheeler.

VOLTAIRE'S motto was, "Straight to the Fact." He brought all histories and creeds to the test of fact and common sense. Was it true or not that an Infinit Deity had chosen barbarous Jews as his peculiar people? Was God born of a virgin? Did he liv in obscure circumstances, and was he put to death with ignominy while deserted by his disciples, in spite of the signs and wonders which he wrought among them? To ask these questions in the light of common sense, to subject them to the cross-examination applied to ordinary principles of evidence, was to answer them with laughter. But, as Mr. Morley has said with truth: "There is no case of Voltaire mocking at any set of men who lived good lives. He did not mock the English Quakers. He doubtless attacked many of the beliefs which good men hold sacred; but, if good men take up their abode under the same roof which shelters the children of darkness and wrong it is not the fault of Voltaire if they are hit by the smooth stones shot from his sling against their unworthy comrades."—J. M. Wheeler.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD.
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed – probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.	$1.00
Fifty copies,	4.50
One hundred copies	8.00
Larger quantities at special rates.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES
A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Not for Parsons.

Two little children looking at the moon one evening, the younger asked: "Is the moon God's wife?" Older Child (patronizingly): "No, you silly child, God is a bachelor."—Life.

MOON (to Sun): "Say, pard, couldn't you stay out with me a little while tonight?" Sun: "I'd like to stay very much, but since Joshua's dead I don't know who to ask for an order, so I must decline."

MRS. BEECHER STOWE tells how she taught her child that anger was sinful, whereupon he asked, "Then why, mamma, does the Bible say so often that God was angry?" She replied (mother-like): "You will understand it when you are older." The boy pondered seriously for awhile, and then burst out: "O mamma, I hav found it out. God is angry because God is not a Christian!"

A COLORED woman presented herself as a candidate for confirmation in the diocese of Florida, and was required to say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer and the Commandments. She got through with the first two fairly well, as somebody had evidently been coaching her, but when it came to the last she bungled and hesitated, and then remarked in a confidential tone to the clergyman: "De fac' is, Mr. Turpin, I hasn't been practicin' de Ten Comma'dments lately."—Life.

"I DON'T like to say anything against my neighbors," said Miss Philenda Fortysmith, cautiously, to Mrs. Longnecker, who had come up from South Squann to spend the day; "but it 'pears to me that Deacon Trilligan is a leetle mite too hasty and violent for a perfessor of religion and a pillar of the church." "Mercy on us!" returned the visitor hungrily. "What has the deacon been a-doin'?" "It ain't what he 's done, but what he said, that struck me as bein' kinder unwarranted. You see, last Friday, jest as he was startin' off to market with a load of produce, the colts he was drivin' got frightened at something and began to cut up terribly. They overturned the wagon on top of the deacon, and then ran in through our gate, which happened to be open, and tore around through the lot, crashin' through the grape-arbor and breakin' up the hotbed, and then tore out again and out of sight up the road, leavin' the wreck of the wagon piled up against the gate-post, with the deacon all tangled up in it. I 'spose likely he felt pretty badly aggravated when he crawled out; but it seems to me that he ought to hav at least stopped and counted one hundred before he spoke." "Good land! What did he say?" "Why, he threw up both hands and said 'Gosh!' loud enough to be heard clear across the lot!"—Puck.

THE CREATOR'S RECREATION.

The deity, tired of eternal passivity,
  Awoke to the fact that existence was tame,
Unless it was spiced with the pleasing activity
  Of terrified creatures bepraising his name.

He, then, out of nothing created the universe;
  Created it all out of nothing, 'tis said;
I'm told by the Muse of my truthful though puny verse:
  'Twas all out of nothing—all "out of his head."

Said God: "As my principal reason for making it
  Is merely amusement, I'll make it to spin;
With creatures all squirming, like lime when they're slaking it;
  Amusingly, spitefully seething in sin.

"A perfect creation would simply mean weariness;
  Amusement's my end; I will therefore create
A world of malignity, slaughter, and dreariness;
  Of pious dissensions, religion, and hate!

"To start it imperfect would damage my dignity,
  And hinder my creatures from praising my name;
I'll, therefore—to hide what they'd call my malignity—
  Cause devils to spoil it, and bear all the blame.

"The dodge will succeed, through its silly simplicity,
  For few of my creatures I'll burden with brains;
And those of the few who'll detect my duplicity
  Will simply be roasted in hell for their pains!"

THE president nominated Gen. John C. Black, ex-Commissioner of Pensions, and now a Representativ-at-Large in Congress for Illinois, to be District-Attorney for the Northern District of Illinois.

ON December 16th a royal decree prorogued the Italian Chamber of Deputies because the deputies—or a few of them—were determined to revive the bank scandals of last year and so delay or prevent legislation.

NEWFOUNDLAND is in the throes of a commercial panic. Through the death of one of the financial agents of a fish exporting house certain notes were allowed to go to protest, and this was the initial force that let slip the financial avalanche.

ON December 15th Judge Goff at Charleston decided against the state in the case involving the arms of the Washington Light Infantry, which Governor Tillman required the company to surrender for insubordination during the dispensary riots.

ON December 11th Ex-Governor Tillman was elected Senator from South Carolina by a vote of 131 to 21 over Senator Butler. He says that he stands on the Chicago platform and will act with the Democrats of the anti-Cleveland wing.

SECRETARY-OF-WAR LAMONT, who has the deciding voice in the New York and New Jersey bridge matter, forbids the putting of a pier in the river. So it is a suspension bridge or none. The decision is generally condemned, as it is almost certain that the cost of a single span will be prohibitiv.

CAPT. T. J. CREEDEN of the Morrisania precinct testified before the Lexow Committee that he paid $15,000 for his New York police captaincy. Promotion was impossible without pay. Ward-man Thorne also made a confession—to the assistant district-attorney — implicating several captains.

AT the municipal election in Boston on December 11th the Republicans elected Edwin U. Curtis mayor by a plurality of about 2,000. Two years ago Matthews, Democrat, had a plurality of over 10,000, and last year he was re-elected by a plurality of 5,000. Dissatisfaction with the local Democratic machine is said to hav been the chief cause of the change.

AT the Federation of Labor convention a resolution in favor of postal savings banks in connection with the post-offices was voted down by a large majority, while another favoring occupancy and improvement as the only title to land was adopted. Direct government issue of all money was demanded. The Socialistic political resolutions were generally defeated.

THE national convention of the American Federation of Labor was held in Denver last week. Several labor delegates from England were present. Charges of bad faith against party leaders were freely made. Samuel Gompers was defeated in his candidacy for re-election as president and John McBride of Columbus was chosen. Headquarters were removed from New York to Indianapolis.

ROBERT LOUIS BALFOUR STEVENSON, the novelist, died of paralysis of the brain and collaps of the lungs in Samoa. He has been very low with consumption for some time. His breakdown is attributed to the excessiv use of cigarets, one hundred to one hundred and fifty per day being the number he usually consumed. He was born in Edinburgh on Nov 13, 1850. At the time of his death he had a new novel half completed.

ON December 16th the engin-house of the Stevens colliery at West Pittston, Pa., caught fire. The engineer, Thomas Lloyd, realized that the stoppage of the machinery meant the death of the forty miners at work on the levels below. He signalled the fact of danger, but it was some time before they responded and then it took three trips of the cage to bring all to the surface. Lloyd stuck to his post to the last and saved them all, but was very badly burned himself.

THE commission appointed by Governor Flower to investigate the alleged abuses in the Elmira Reformatory has just made its report. The majority—Messrs. Deyo and Flint — exonerate Superintendent Brockway from the charges of cruelty, while the minority — Judge Learned — finds that the charges were based on fact. Governor Flower seems to accept the report of the majority as in harmony with the facts, for he has reappointed two of the board of managers of the reformatory who refused to remove Superintendent Brockway when the State Board of Charities recommended his dismissal.

EUGENE V. DEBS, leader of the A. R. U. strike, was sentenced by Judge Woods at the conclusion of his trial in Chicago to six months' imprisonment in the county jail. This was for contempt of court in violating the injunctions issued by Judges Woods and Grosscup last July. G. W. Howard, Sylvester Kelliher, L. W. Rogers, M. J. Elliott, James Hogan, William Burns, and Leroy M. Goodwin were given three months each. The sentence is considered a light one, as it was in the discretion of the court to sentence the men to any term of years it chose within the constitutional limits, and to impose any fine it thought fit. An appeal is to be taken to the Supreme Court. Clarence S. Darrow is the defendants' counsel.

OLD YAHWEH BLOWETH ABOUT HIS DIABOLICAL WORK.

To the Senate and Assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York:

We citizens of the State of New York, respectfully request you to repeal the Sunday law of this State. We ask this because,

First, Sunday being a period of time of precisely the same nature as Saturday or Monday, there is no natural reason for its being elevated above or depressed below the other days of the week.

Second, Said Sunday law is, in the best possible view of it, useless; it is wholly inoperative as a conserver of the rights of any inhabitant of the State.

Third, It is invasive of the equal rights of the citizens of the State, an impertinent meddling with their private affairs, and its effect is to disturb their peace and rob them of their earnings.

Fourth, In making or amending our laws, common sense and experience should be the guides, instead of sentiment—religious or otherwise. Experience has demonstrated that Sunday laws are not observed by the people, and common sense teaches that, in the nature of things, they never will be, for it cannot be wrong to do on one day what it is right to do on another. The people, feeling this and knowing this, will not be governed by the dead churchmen who made these laws, which are anachronistic and have been perpetuated by hypocrisy. Here we will call your attention to the words of Martin Luther, a churchman we are willing to put against the ecclesiastics of to-day: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it—to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Fifth, Sunday laws are vicious, for they are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities, as the revelations of the Lexow Committee abundantly show. They produce more crime than they could possibly prevent, for blackmail is more immoral than drinking.

Sixth, All such laws are essentially religious in their intent and effect and as such they are opposed to the spirit of our institutions, which do not favor the union of church and state. The Sunday law of the State of New York is no exception to the rule, and it should be immediately repealed in the interest of religious liberty, if for no other reason. This law is a survival from the time when there was a state church and the civil power enforced the Sunday law of the state church, just as it enforced that church's blasphemy and heresy statutes. But where there is no state church the state has nothing to do with the enforcement of the domestic rules of any church or those of Christianity in its entirety.

For these and other reasons we ask the entire repeal of the Sunday laws rather than a patching which shall discriminate against one business and foster another. We ask that the liquor trade be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days, and the same with all other kinds of business. It is not proper for the state to legislate in the interests of any legitimate trade as against any other legitimate trade, and we ask your careful attention to this admitted fact and particularly ask you to bear in mind the also admitted fact that Sunday laws are a fruitul source and an adequate means of blackmail.

141 FULL-PAGE HALF-TONE PORTRAITS

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers and Philosophers, Living and Dead, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY has pleasure in announcing that this splendid work, which has been in preparation so long, and for which nearly 1,100 persons hav subscribed in advance, is now ready for delivery. For more than twelve months FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT has been advertised, and if it had appeared as originally designed it might hav been out half a year ago. The Prospectus has stated all along that the book would contain six hundred pages of printed matter, and fifty portraits were mentioned, but it has so grown upon the hands of the author and publisher that the pages of type hav reached nearer nine hundred, while the list of pictures has extended to almost three times fifty. As the portraits hav proved the most expensiv—as they will no doubt prove to many the most attractiv—part of the book, their multiplication, together with the added pages of text, will giv the subscriber about twice as much for his money as was at first promised him. He is getting an Album as well as a History; for what are called "half-tone" pictures, like those in the present work, are the most finished and satisfactory product of the artist's and engraver's skill, being exact reproductions and therefore equal in accuracy to the original photograph. We feel considerable pride in this collection of photographs, and call especial attention to them.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development, and presents them in such orderly sequence as to giv the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we hav Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who hav taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promis of its inception, and is the most magnificen work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

CONTAINS AN ARTICLE BY

A. H. HAMILTON:

"FREETHOUGHT IN THE CHURCH AND IN THE HIGHER LITERATURE."

Bigotry Ablaze in Texas.

It seems that we were mistaken when we stated that the Sabbatarians had succeeded in closing the Cotton Palace at Waco on Sunday. We had read of their organized movement to secure that result, and had also read the threat of Rev. J. B. Cranfill, editor of "the most widely circulated religious paper in the South," that if the Sabbatarians were not obeyed the Palace would be boycotted, and we did not think that any organization of business men in that part of the country would dare defy the church. Besides, in perusing the Waco dispatches in the Galveston News, we had failed to see anything about the Exposition being open on Sunday. But we are glad to know that it is open, as we learn from the Denison Gazetteer, which states that on a recent Sunday there were between 7,500 and 10,000 visitors, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and that among these visitors were two hundred employees of one Dallas firm. If the Rev. Mr. Cranfill and the American Sabbath Union could hav had their way those work-people of Dallas could not hav visited the Palace without serious inconvenience to themselvs and their employers. They got their weekly "rest," and recreation and instruction at the same time, and they got the last two by disregarding the Puritans and their Seventeenth Century notions. But still the Texas bigots hav not learned anything; they are the real American Bourbons, they and their confrères in the other states. A press dispatch of December 11th from Dallas states that at the meeting that day of the stockholders of the State Fair and Dallas Exposition Association, a delegation of preachers headed by Rev. C. A. Seasholes appeared and demanded that hereafter the gates be closed on Sunday; that no gambling be permitted and that paintings in the nude be excluded and statuary draped. The communication was received, but no pledges were given. These clerical gentlemen are excessivly modest in their demands. Why did they not ask for the arrest and decapitation of all people who read Sunday newspapers in Dallas during the continuance of the Fair? If there were no buyers of Sunday papers there would be none printed, and thus one of the worst of Sunday "desecrations" and the cause of many other "profanations" of the "Lord's Day" would be prevented. And then why should not all the live stock and flower exhibits be removed or draped? That would be not one whit more ridiculous than the removal of paintings of the nude human form and the draping of statuary. Let the Freethinkers of Texas encourage the officers of the Fair Association to kindly but earnestly take up the free passes or half-fare permits of Rev. Mr. Seasholes and his associates and politely tell them to mind their own business in future.

The Source and Nature of Sunday Legislation.

In its decision affirming the constitutionality of the Sunday law of that state, the Michigan Supreme Court quotes from Tiedeman's "The Limitation of Police Power," as follows:

"If the law did not interfere, the feverish, intense desire to acquire wealth, so thoroughly a characteristic of the American nation, inciting a relentless rivalry and competition, would ultimately prevent not only the wage-earners, but likewise the capitalists and employers themselvs, from yielding to the warnings of nature, and obeying the instinct of self-preservation, by resting periodically from labor, even if the mad pursuit of wealth should not warp their judgment, and destroy this instinct. Remove the prohibition of law, and this wholesome sanitary regulation would cease to be observed."

Certainly the supreme court or any other court that feels itself under the necessity of invoking the support of such an "argument" as this is sincerely to be pitied. When a jurist seriously contends that were it not for the law the wage-earner and the employer would both work themselvs to death the first thought suggested is that it is deplorable that the law has not fixed an earlier date for the retirement of judges—assuredly Judge Montgomery has been lamentably overworked. The old Jewish Sabbath law compelled every one to rest every seventh year as well as every seventh day; Judge Montgomery and his associates should at once adopt this "wholesome sanitary regulation," but if their unholy and "mad pursuit of wealth" has "warped their judgment" and destroyed in them the "instinct of self-preservation," so that they will not yield "to the warnings of nature"—as appears to be the case—then the law should compel them to rest one year in seven; and as their mental condition indicates that they hav not heretofore rested at all in their "feverish" chase after fame and material rewards, it will be a great kindness to them to giv them an opportunity to rest for the remainder of their lives. They will undoubtedly be greatly pleased that the state has had the thoughtful benevolence to so considerately apply their principles.

While the state is in the business of looking after the physical health of the citizens who are too busy to attend to the job themselvs, it can well afford to turn its paternal gaze upon other than the "Sabbath breakers," for there are many other ways besides working on Sunday of letting the "feverish, intense desire to acquire wealth" lead one to disregard the "warnings of nature." There are the multitudes of business men and clerks who swallow their mid-day repast in seven bites and three minutes—that is very bad for the digestion and consequently for the morals, for as a man feeleth in his stomach, so is he. Then there are the many men and women who do not go to bed early enough; they defiantly ignore nature's warning that night is the time to sleep. They, too, need looking after by the ward man or township constable. Others get up before they hav had enough sleep, while more injure themselvs by remaining in the vitiated atmosphere of their sleeping apartments altogether too long; and this compels the observation that the dear old state is very remiss in its duties in not forcing the ignorant citizen to ventilate his whole house, but especially his bedrooms, in a scientific manner. We do not see what the law carpenters are about to permit poor people to ride all night on the train sitting in the day coaches; they should be compelled to buy berths in the sleepers; no man should be allowed to sacrifice his comfort and health in the "mad pursuit of wealth." What can the Michigan judges be thinking of that they hav taken no steps to prevent all this slow suicide? Beyond these mere palliativ measures the state should certainly go, but before cutting off by the adoption of the Socialistic program all opportunity to injure the health through rivalry and competition, it might be prudent to try the experiment of forbidding all night work, in which some hundreds of thousands of people are engaged in this country alone. There does not appear to be any imperativ necessity for having our bread fresh in the morning, and the morning's milking could be deferred to a more seasonable hour, thus giving the milkmaids a morning beauty sleep and preventing the running of early trains. We do not need the morning papers—evening will do just as well, while there is not the slightest necessity of expediting the transmission of mails by keeping the cars going during the night. If there is anything so very important to be written that the letters containing that news ought to be sent along without delay it can be telegraphed. It is all nonsense to suppose that travelers should proceed on their journeys right on through the night. Let the trains stop at sunset; it will be a bonanza for the proprietors of wayside hotels; never mind about the pockets of the travelers. We do not see that there can be any serious objection on the part of the Sabbatarians to this proposition; they say that the adoption of this scheme is just the thing for Sunday, and what is good enough for Sunday is certainly good enough for the common, plebeian days of the week. It should not be forgotten that night work is far more likely to be harmful than labor performed on Sunday. We always feel depressed and nervous after working at night, but Sunday activity never fazes us a bit more than similar activity on Tuesday or Saturday. We hope that Judge Montgomery will take kindly to our suggestion that he interest himself in the prohibition of night work. Rest at night is undoubtedly good for the system, and he must see that in the absence of legal control this "wholesome sanitary regulation" has ceased "to be observed."

Inasmuch as the most activ promoters of Sunday laws are opposed equally to work and amusements on that day, we do not see how the "rest" plea could hav been accepted by the Michigan court as applicable without exception to the defense of a law which, if without objection to those Sabbatarian propagandists, must be as oppressiv to Sunday players as to Sunday workers. If the court supposes that the friends of Sunday legislation will be contented with the prohibition of labor, while no restraining hand is laid by the law on Sunday baseball, Sunday theaters, Sunday concerts, and the many other forms of Sunday recreation, it is very much mistaken. On the other hand, if it proposes to suppress these amusements, it will utterly destroy its own argument in favor of "rest," unless it defines rest as absolute abstention from all activity save that necessary to going to church. In this contingency, it will be impossible for it to escape the odium of adjudicating directly and solely in the interest of the church —which is precisely what it has done, all pretenses to the contrary notwithstanding. This will be made clearly apparent by what follows, although such demonstration is not needed by either Sabbatarians or Freethinkers; it is for the enlightenment of the classes intermediate between these two that we write.

In the American Sentinel of November 29th, its editor, Rev. A. T. Jones, under the head of "The Puritan Sabbath for 'Physical Rest,'" very pointedly exposes the sham of the claim that the demand of the Sabbatarians for Sunday laws is made really in behalf of the cause of "physical rest," that men may "recuperate their wasted energies." He examins the plea for the purpose of discovering its basis and its origin, that we may know what it is worth. We must greatly condense his statement of facts and ignore his able arguments, but trust that we can giv an intelligible summary of the former in the brief space at our disposal:

"The theory of 'one-seventh part of time' for rest originated in the controversy between the Puritans and the Episcopalians in the latter part of the sixteenth century, and the authority for the theory was the Rev. Nicolas Bownde, or Bound, D.D., 'of Newton, in the county of Suffolk,' England. Dr. Bownde was a Puritan, and promulgated his theory for the first time in a book which he published in 1594, entitled, 'The Doctrin of the Sabbath.'"

This was in the hight of the controversy between the Puritans and the Church of England concerning "habits and ceremonies, and church disciplin," and the Church of England held, to state its position in the most condensed form, that, "whatever the scriptures do not forbid, in matters of church disciplin and church government, may be done without sin." The Puritan position, stated with equal brevity, was that, "whatever is not commanded in the scriptures, in these things, cannot be done without sin."

"The Puritans therefore dropped all festivals and feast days, surplices, habits, and ceremonies, and charged the Episcopalians with 'popish leaven and superstition, and subjection to the ordinances of men,' because they retained these. As proof which, they thought, ought to convince the Puritans that the church had liberty in such things as these, the Episcopalians produced the fact that the observance of Sunday is only an ordinance of the church, and rests only upon the authority of the church; and that the Puritans therefore contradicted themselvs in observing Sunday while denouncing the authority of the church, the only authority upon which that observance rests. This put the Puritans in a box, and they had to cast about for some way to get themselvs out."

They could not afford to observe the day on the mere ordinance of the church, and yet they could not giv up its observance. To observe it without any authority was equally out of the question, for they insisted, as against the Episcopalians, "that there must be a commandment of God for everything that was to be done." Dr. Bownde rose to the occasion; he deliberately "wrested the scriptures" to his own purpose, and formulated this theory:

"It is not the definit seventh day, but 'a seventh part of time' that is required by the fourth commandment to be kept for the Sabbath; it is 'not the seventh day from creation, but the day of Christ's resurrection, and the seventh day from that;' 'the seventh day is genus' in the fourth commandment, so that 'the seventh day from creation, and the day of Christ's resurrection and the seventh from that' are 'both of them at several times comprehended in the commandment, even as genus comprehendeth both his species.' Thus the fourth commandment was made to enforce the seventh day from creation until the resurrection of Christ and then the first day from that time onward!"

This lifted the Puritans out of the pit into which they had fallen, and they eagerly embraced the doctrin set forth by Rev. Mr. Bownde. The book soon attained an immense circulation. But to what use was this "seventh part of time" to be put? Was it to be a day of "rest," as the Michigan judges now maintain it to be? Writing about that period of time, Neal says:

"This year [1594] Dr. Bownde published his treatis on the Sabbath, wherein he maintains the morality of the seventh part of time for the worship of God."

Dr. Bownde himself said that the man was called to dress and keep the garden, but charged to keep holy the seventh day, "meditating upon the wisdom and mercy of God," "giving thanks to God," "praying for the continuance" of his blessings, and teaching his posterity regarding them.

"It was needful that the seventh day should be unto him (and it was indeed) a Sabbath day, that is, a day of rest, resting from all his other necessary business, that so he might with his whole heart and mind attend upon these, as the worship of God requireth."

There is in all this not even a hint that the day was set aside by the Puritans for the purpose of physical rest; the cessation from work was to giv the opportunity for worship and religious instruction, and for nothing else. Had it been suggested to a Puritan in the Puritan ages that the day was to be used primarily for the purpose of resting the body, and that its observance should be legally enforced on that ground, he would hav thought that the suggestion was prompted by the devil. The "rest" theory has been advanced because there is a constitutional prohibition of religious legislation and because there is also a strong, although largely latent, prejudice against the union of church and state. As Rev. Mr. Jones says in his summing-up, the Puritan theory of one-seventh part of the time for the Sabbath is a fraud upon the command given in the Bible which Christians take for their authority; the theory of one-seventh part of the time for physical rest is a fraud upon the original Puritan theory, thus making the theory of the seventh part of the time for physical rest a fraud upon a fraud.

Sunday Silliness in Boston.

Poor old Massachusetts is still suffering from the terrible effects of that awful dose of Puritanism that she took some hundreds of years ago. As Charles Francis Adams tersely says, "the question of religious toleration was, so far as Massachusetts could decide it, decided in 1637 in the negativ. On that issue Massachusetts then definitly and finally renounced all claim or desire to head the advancing column, or even to be near the head of the column; it did not go to the rear, but it went well towards it, and there it remained until the issue was decided." Unfortunately, the issue is not yet decided, but Massachusetts is still in her old place well down towards the foot of the column.

On December 20th the Board of Police Commissioners of Boston revoked the licenses granted to the Howard Athenæum, the Palace Theater, and the Grand Dime Museum for the holding of Sunday concerts. The revocation was distinctly made on the ground that the concerts were "too secular" in their character. That is, they were not sufficiently "sacred." The action of the Board is a clear-cut victory for the Sabbatarians, and is the sequel of a long series of inquisitorial investigations and hearings that were a shame to even moribund Massachusetts. The Herald, of Boston, in its report of the examination before the Board of Police Commissioners on December 17th, says that there was a "large attendance of the clergymen of the city." Of course; it was a matter of business with them; they were engaged in an attempt to crush out their rivals, and it could not be expected that they would neglect any precautions; it is not their habit to let their personal interests suffer by default; they realized that their presence at the hearing would help to awe the Commissioners and cloud their judgment.

The witnesses were examined and cross-examined as to the jokes that were told at the concerts, the songs that were sung, and the costumes and actions of the performers. The manager of the Grand Museum testified that "the concert consisted of instrumental and vocal music; there was no shifting of scenes, no dancing on the stage, and no one in costume." As though it was the business of any outsider whether there was shifting of scenes or dancing, or whether the singers wore costumes! The Police Commissioners had just as much right to ask these questions as they would hav had to ask whether a certain clergyman wore a surplice in the pulpit or spoke in a dress or business suit, or whether the singing was by a choir or was congregational—that is, no right at all. One of the complainants was a theological student who found fault because Ella Caldwell sang "Ave Maria" at the Palace Theater! She was put on the stand by the defense and it was asked that she be allowed to sing the "questionable" piece. The attorney for the prosecutors objected; he said that he would admit that the hymn was in the Roman Catholic communion, and would also admit that the theological student, being a Protestant, "was not competent to judge whether or no the performance was sacred." Finally the song was rendered. Was there ever a more contemptible farce put on the boards in the interest of bigotry and monopoly than this "hearing" before the Police Commissioners of Boston?

The attorney for the defense called attention to the fact that at a meeting at a church the night before a quartet of colored persons had sung plantation songs to a distinguished and select audience. Darling, for the prosecution, in his closing argument, said that it was an absolute stultification of common sense to compare a meeting at the church Sunday evening with the concerts at the theaters. No doubt—from the point of view of Christians; they are not in the habit of asking for or abiding by the rule of equal justice for all classes of citizens. Darling also said the "Christian public of the entire state were anxiously awaiting the result of the investigation." No doubt, again; their predecessors watched with a like anxiety for the result of the trials of the "witches" at Salem. The virus of intolerance and cruelty is still in their blood and the defiled stream has filtered into almost every nook and corner of our land, carried in the veins of the consanguineous and mental descendants of the persecutors of 1637 and 1691–2.

Mr. Galvin, counsel for the defense, did not make any argument at the close of the examination, a failure to take advantage of a great opportunity for the presentation of fundamental truths for which we can find no adequate excuse.

On the same day that the Police Commissioners were considering the matter of the Sunday concerts the subject was brought up in the Board of Aldermen by Mr. Hallstram, who moved that all licenses heretofore granted to any persons to hold Sunday concerts at any place in Boston be revoked. A heated debate ensued. Some members thought that the "sacred" concerts were really sacred and therefore should be protected. It does not appear to hav occurred to a single alderman that the right of the managers to giv the concerts and of the people to attend them is what is sacred, wholly irrespectiv of the alleged and disputed "sacredness" of any performance. Alderman Hallstram said that dancing should not be permitted at Sunday evening concerts; Alderman Berry was glad there were places where young men could go Sunday evening—the cranks who now want the theaters closed are the same who some time ago wanted to stop the Sunday sale of baked beans and wanted to close the barber shops; Alderman Dever started out well—he said that he was opposed to the proposed order and to the people who were behind it; they wanted to suppress everything, they were fanatics. So far, quite good, but it was too good to last. Mr. Dever proceeded:

"It was disgusting to see so much fuss made over sacred concerts, while there is no rumpus whatever over Bob Ingersoll. Ingersoll comes into Boston Sunday nights, gets a theater without a license, and proceeds to blaspheme. He outrages his God, and traduces everything sacred, and there is not a word of protest from the so-called religious fanatics. Why don't they stop Ingersoll, the blasphemer? There's a chance for reform, if they are real reformers."

We'll venture something that Mr. Dever is a Catholic; that would explain why it is that while he can stand Sunday concerts he is driven into a frenzy by Colonel Ingersoll's "blasphemy." The Protestants, on the other hand, fear blasphemy less than they do "Sabbath desecration"; they know that their more independent adherents will read and listen to heretical lectures anyway, while Sunday laws are necessary to drive them to church. The Catholics, however, do not apprehend, as a rule, that the free Sunday would very much reduce attendance at their churches while the devotees of that faith are protected from the contaminating touch of heresy. If the two parties could unite their forces it would be a very short shift for liberty. Fortunately the same influences that are breaking down the lines between them are disintegrating all theologies and educating the people in the principles of secular justice. Conditions are bad enough when bigotry and injustice can dominate a city like Boston as it is now dominated, but it would be infinitly worse if it were not for the dissensions among Christians. The desire for "church union" is in effect the desire for the return of the rack and stake, although, of course, many who wish for that union would not persecute. But think seriously of what Massachusetts would be to-day if she had never been inhabited by other than Puritans and had never felt the influence of freer currents of thought. Under such conditions "Sabbath desecration" would be a capital crime.

The rector of Trinity church complains of the treatment accorded to the Corporation by the newspapers during the present agitation of the condition of its tenements. He denounces the "startling headlines" and the "sensational wood-cuts." The World kindly informs the reverend gentleman that he is mistaken—that he is putting the blame in the wrong place—it is the sun that is responsible for the objectionable pictures, not the imagination of the newspaper artists. The illustrations of Trinity's wretched hovels are not wood-cuts, but process engravings from photographs.

Two clergymen are reported to hav sent to the committee on libraries of the board of education of one of the Eastern cities a communication protesting against the putting of "Trilby" on the shelves of the public library. They assert that this famous novel, of which one hundred thousand copies hav already been sold in this country, and which was also read by the multitude of buyers of Harper's Magazine, is "immoral and antagonistic to Christianity." There does not appear to be any doubt about the latter part of the statement, but as to the other it is respectfully submitted that the clergy are not competent judges.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we hav to get behind with others. We hav no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to giv others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we hav said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

Providence is sadly neglectful of its own. We recently chronicled the fact that a woman in Ulster county, in this state, while kneeling by the stove saying her morning prayers, was burned to death, her clothes having ignited from the fire she had just kindled. Recently Mrs. Mary Bannon, living near Nevada, Missouri, was weeding her rose garden when she scratched one of her fingers on a brier. The hand soon became swollen, the inflammation extended to the shoulder, and the hand and arm became discolored. She suffered great agony for a day or two preceding her death. She was ninety-two years and six months old when she died. For ninety-one years and six months she had lived outside of all churches, but a year ago she united with the Christian church and was baptized in Tucker lake, near her home. It does not appear why Providence could not hav let her die in a less agonizing way, especially as it had tolerated her for four score and eleven years while she "lived in sin." It may hav been angry because she gave the devil all the best years of her life and brought to its service only the worn and broken fragments? While she could think and act for herself she kept out of the fold.

In our issue of January 5th the reader will hav a rare treat in the report of the proceedings of the Manhattan Liberal Club's celebration of its Twenty-fifth Anniversary. The special meetings of the Club are always crowded because it has come to be known to the Freethinkers and other fun-lovers of the city that the program will be one of exceptional merit. Those who cannot hav the delight of seeing and hearing Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., in his rôle of satirist and all-around humorist will hav the next greatest pleasure in reading our account of what he said and did at the Jubilee meeting.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th we shall giv Franklin Steiner's "Christianity and Crime," which contains a mass of figures that will be very convenient for reference. Single copies of the paper, 7 cents. Five copies, 25 cents. Now is a good time to subscribe.

The fall and winter being more particularly the reading season, and naturally the renewing of subscription season, we hope that our friends will make a little effort to send THE TRUTH SEEKER some new subscribers. A good many of our old ones hav had to drop off during the past eighteen months of panic and dullness in the business world, and we need some more to take their places and push on the work. Our friends hav never failed us in an emergency, and we again venture to ask them to do something to help by inducing new subscriptions. We hav tried to make this easy by the premium offers printed on the second page of this paper, and we think considerable can be done by our friends if they will take the trouble to speak a good word for us to their Liberal acquaintances.

To those who feel like presenting THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time to some dear friend, our Trial Subscription offer opens the way at a small cost. A great many of the Liberals to whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is first sent this way become permanent subscribers and earnest workers in the cause of mental liberty.

And lastly, after you hav induced some acquaintance to subscribe, and sent THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to some friend, send us the names of all the Liberals you know, and we will send them sample copies, and see if they, too, will not subscribe. We need them all.

The more closely the tenements of Trinity Church Corporation are examined the worse it appears for that exceedingly wealthy association. Of about one hundred buildings investigated by the Department of Buildings, forty-five are defectiv; in many instances the law has been flagrantly violated: Walls are unsafe; fire escapes are useless; drainage is bad; water has to be carried from the ground floor to the top stories even of the tall tenements, and this sadly interferes with that cleanliness which is so essential to health, while the many women tenants who are washerwomen are thus subjected to needless additional hardships. Colonel Cruger, the comptroller of the corporation, insists that it spends its entire revenue in improvements, but the books of the Building Department show that the tenements hav got but an infinitesimal part of this princely revenue. In twelve years the Corporation has bettered the physical, the sanitary condition of its tenants to the extent of five small houses and two small tenements, while it has put $780,000 into new factories and warehouses and millions into churches. Claiming to be too poor to improve its tumble-down and unhealthful tenements, it has expended $1,000,000 on the magnificent new Episcopal church on Ninety-second street, miles away from the human hives where the money that built it was earned in squalor and tears. This church—St. Agnes—is one of the finest Episcopal churches in the country. There are five churches of that denomination in that part of the West Side. But the "spiritual needs" of its tenants down town hav not been provided for by new churches nor their physical necessities by improved homes. As the Times says, the zeal of Trinity for the spiritual welfare of the city has not led it to do what is needed to lower the death rate in the tenement district, nor put water on the floors, nor repair the fire escapes, nor make the buildings safe, but it has seen to it that the Episcopalians of the upper West Side should not hav too much pedestrian exercise on Sunday, and has given them the choice of five splendid churches of their faith in that part of the city where before they had been compelled to get along with four.

They hav a decidedly independent Baptist minister at Atlanta, Ga. There is a bill before the legislature of that state to exempt church parsonages from taxation, and several members of the body invited Dr. Hawthorne to preach a sermon on the relation of church to state. He consented to do so, and improved the occasion in a masterly manner. The bill to exempt church parsonages was denounced in no uncertain terms; the employment of chaplains was declared to be "inconsistent with our principles, and incompatible with true religious liberty"; appropriations for religious purposes were handled in a like uncompromising manner; the movement to secure the Christianization of the Constitution was unsparingly condemned; the American Protective Association was weighed in the scales and found wanting, and the taxation of all church property was demanded. Unfortunately he did not mention Sunday laws and the Bible in the schools, but otherwise he placed himself squarely on the secular platform. He said he hoped that the parsonage exemption bill would be voted down "by a majority that will be absolutely paralyzing to its friends." Here is a striking passage from his sermon:

"When Constantine, by an imperial edict, abolished Paganism, and established Christianity as the religion of Rome, he was more an enemy to the truth and kingdom of Christ than the inhuman Nero, who illumined his public gardens with the burning bodies of the saints."

The people of this country were declared to be theoretically a unit for the separation of church and state, "but practically they are far from being united." After enumerating some of the principles for which our people stand in theory, Dr. Hawthorne proceeded:

"But the people of this country are not consistent with the views which they hold upon this subject. They believe in the absolute non-interference of the state in all matters of religious faith and practice, and yet, millions of them seek the help of the state to propagate and establish their religious doctrins and worship. Every year they are asking the Federal Congress, and the state legislatures, and city councils to do things which violate the rights of conscience."

Dr. Hawthorne's ringing remarks concerning chaplaincies we commend to the consideration of Dr. Buckley:

"In appointing men to these offices, and paying them for their services with money taken from its own treasury, the state does more than protect the Christian religion. It patronizes it, and any governmental patronage of religion is a violation of the rights of conscience. These chaplains receive their commissions as is prescribed by the government. They perform such religious services as are prescribed by the government. They are responsible to the government for the manner in which they perform the duties of their ministerial office. Could there be a more real alliance between religion and the state? Hav we not in this country a state religion? I am absolutely sure that we hav. We hav made Christianity the religion of the state. · · · While these abuses of civil goverment exist let no man speak of this country as 'a land of religious liberty.' We hav nothing but religious toleration. Religious liberty is found only where there is a complete severance of church and state."

Some of Dr. Hawthorne's animadversions on the exemption of church property from taxation are excellent.

When renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER add twenty-five cents for a copy of the ANNUAL. It is great.

At the Book Table.

We hav scarcely begun to measure the effect of Herbert Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy on the world's thought. We are too near him in time to grasp even partially what it involves and prophesies. The magnitude of his accomplishment repels multitudes whose lives are filled with work; they hav not the leisure to sit down and read, much less study, the many ponderous volumes which embody the fruits of his profound cogitations. The few hav mastered the principles of his epoch-making philosophy; the millions of fairly well-informed people hav read only a little here and there of all the many books he has written. This is their loss, of course, but until the masses hav more time for serious reading there does not seem to be any help for it—they must get all, or nearly all, they will assimilate of the teachings of Herbert Spencer from those who are his pupils, critics, and interpreters. In view of these facts, every such work as this "Introduction"* of Mr. Hudson's is most welcome. It will help to remove the misconceptions which so generally prevail concerning the evolutionary philosophy, and will also giv its readers something of an understanding of the character of Herbert Spencer, the man, and a glimps of the environment which helped mold the greatest English thinker of the century.

Mr. Hudson thinks that there is a "wholesome spirit of inquiry" abroad as to the "personality and writings of Herbert Spencer. To him, as the philosopher of evolution—as the systematic exponent of the new thought in its wider relations—attention is turned from almost every side; and countless readers, whose own studies hav taken them but a small way below the surface of the questions to the consideration of which he has devoted the energies of his life, are none the less imbibing from the very atmosphere around them a vague but strong impression that his teachings and speculations hav been, of all men's, the most influential in directing the intellectual movements of the nineteenth century." The author does not trace over the arguments or summarize the conclusions of the Spencerian philosophy. Still less does he feel called upon to enter into any discussion of its more debatable aspects, and least of all does he venture to offer a substitute for the synthetic system itself. Those who would really understand Mr. Spencer's ideas must go to his writings; "no short cut can be pointed out that can be other than unsatisfactory; no patent method can be devised that will relieve the student of the need for a first-hand study of Mr. Spencer's own arguments, or even render such first-hand study a very light and easy task." Nevertheless, Mr. Hudson thinks that something can be done to make the way smoother and easier for the feet of the untrained explorer, and this is what he has tried to do, and, in our opinion, with no small measure of success. He has given what he claims the "Introduction" to be—an outline map or hand-guide of the principal features of the Synthetic philosophy.

The contents of the volume, as indicated in the chapter headings, are: Herbert Spencer—a Biographical Sketch; Spencer's Earlier Work—Preparation for the Synthetic Philosophy; the Synthetic Philosophy; the Spencerian Sociology; the Ethical System of Spencer; Religious Aspects of the Spencerian Philosophy; Chronological List of Mr. Spencer's Writings. Of the men who hav profoundly impressed the thought of this age probably less is known of Mr. Spencer personally than of any other. The chief cause of this is the ill-health which for nearly forty years has kept him confined within the circle of a few immediate friends. Then he has been so closely kept to the great task which he set for himself that, even when his health was comparativly good, he has not had time to mingle much in the stirring activities of the less studious world. Not only does he not seek notoriety, but he resents, "as something akin to outrage, any attempt to thrust notoriety upon him. He began his vast work paying but scant heed to the fierce and fiery criticisms by which it was assailed; and now that, after so many years of hard struggle and patient effort, his place as a thinker is acknowledged on every hand, he concerns himself as little with the praise which is showered upon him as he formerly did with the blame."

Herbert Spencer was born at Derby, England, on the 27th of April, 1820. His father, a teacher, was a man of strong character, unusual breadth of culture, and very original views. Mr. Hudson says that he was in advance of his time, and of ours as well, it may be feared. He did not believe in loading the memory with a great mass of undigested facts and leaving the mind untrained to habits of personal observation and reasoning. Therefore, "he regarded it as of more importance to foster originality and independence of thought, to excite interest, and nurture the reflectiv powers, than to store the memories of his pupils with any quantity of merely bookish learning. His ambition was to produce a well-balanced and self-reliant human being, and not a walking encyclopedia of more or less useless information." With such a father it is natural that Herbert Spencer should hav developed—with the heritage of brain power he received—into one of the few really deep original thinkers of the age. From his thirteenth to his sixteenth year the young Spencer studied under the care of his uncle Thomas, a clergyman of the Church of England, a man of robust independence and whose views on educational matters do not seem to hav differed essentially from those of his brother the teacher. "A radical at the time when nearly the whole English church was in bondage to the Tory party; a teetotaler when the temperance movement was held by the general religious world to be a subtle form of Atheism; a Chartist, and the first clergyman of the English church to take an activ and prominent part in the anti corn-law movement, a vigorous and unwearied lecturer upon all matters touching the physical, moral, and social welfare of the people—the Rev. Thomas Spencer was assuredly a man marked out from the rank and file of the clergy of his day." While under the care of his uncle, Herbert's successes and failures in his studies were repetitions of those of the past—in the classic languages he showed an "inaptitude almost astounding," and with French it was but little better. "Rules and vocabularies proved perpetual stumbling-blocks to him; and what little was with infinit difficulty committed to memory was almost as soon forgotten." But a counterbalancing aptitude was shown for studies "demanding a different kind of ability—constructiv and coördinating power rather than a memory for unconnected details. In mathematics and mechanics such rapid advancement was made that he soon placed himself in these departments ahead of fellow-students much older than himself. What was noticeable, too, was his early habit of laying hold of essential principles, and his ever-growing tendency toward independent analysis and exploration." His uncle, himself a graduate of Cambridge, wished him to be coached for admission to that university, but Herbert steadfastly refused. In the end his objections prevailed and all idea of an academic career was abandoned. Mr. Hudson concludes that while he lost something by this decision he undoubtedly gained vastly more than he lost.

As a school-teacher the embryo philosopher possessed a rare faculty for luminous exposition; he easily aroused the interest of his pupils in the subjects with which he dealt, and he always "recognized and appreciated the individualities of the pupils committed to his charge, realizing in this direction the lofty ideal of the relations between teacher and taught which he afterwards so strenuously insisted upon in his book on education."

In the early edition of the "Social Statics," Mr. Spencer accepted the intuitional theory of morals as opposed to the utilitarian, but the difficulty of reconciling this theory with the wide disparity of views regarding what is moral which has always prevailed in different countries and among the people of diverse races led him to greatly modify his opinion as therein expressed, and to say in his recent "Inductions of Ethics" that it has gradually become clear to him that the current belief among us that it is wrong to rob and that the unrepentant thief will be eternally damned, while it is an accepted proverb among the Bilochs that "God will not favor a man who does not steal and rob," cannot be reconciled with the theory that men hav in common an innate perception of right and wrong. Yet he did not at this take his stand with the utilitarians. The struggle between the two schools had reached a deadlock when evolution stepped in to reconcile them. One thing they had always had in common—"both had based their arguments and formulated their conclusions upon the conceptions of special creation and fixed types; and the discussion, with the full consent of both contending parties, had been in this way limited in range to the experiences of the individual life. Could the conscience ever hav arisen after the manner alleged, within the span of the separate mortal career? This was the form that the issue had taken, and to the question in this shape one side had answered Yes, and the other No. Evolution at once widened the issue. Behind the individual it placed the race; behind civilized humanity, the ages of barbarism and animality, out of which, through untold centuries, we hav been slowly and painfully struggling upward into higher developments of life. The problem was no longer that of explaining the fine, sensitiv conscience of the modern adult Caucasian as the outgrowth of a few years of personal intercourse with his environment. The gradually acquired experiences of countless generations, slowly registered through long periods of social consolidation, and handed down from age to age as slight but persistent modifications in the nervous organization of evolving man, these were the new factors which the development theory introduced into the discussion. An explanation which had properly been condemned as absurdly inadequate, so long as attention was confined to the brief terms of a separate life, assumed, immediately that account was taken of the element of hereditary transmission, the appearance of a rational and complete solution of the problem. In merging the life history of each single generation in the life history not only of the human race at large, but of all sentient existence, and in postulating the thread of a continuity that, running through almost imperceptible gradations, binds the highest forms to the lowest, the evolutionist at once secured a new standpoint, and escaped the obvious charge of extravagance or specious reasoning."

Thus we are again brought face to face with the fact that the modern Freethinker must build his superstructure upon the solid foundation of the evolutionary philosophy. It is passing strange that there is occasionally an Infidel to be found who laughs at and ridicules the development theory. Such a man does not seem to realize that, facing the supernaturalist, the rationalist stands unarmed if he flings away the sword of science, and that the now seemingly inevitable induction from the facts known to the student of science is that man is the latest of a practically endless succession of living forms that hav slowly evolved through uncounted millions of years. Until the advent of the science of development from earlier forms all that the rationalist could do was to point to the flaws in the argument for design and in the assumption of a god given scheme of morals, but now, thanks to the investigations of Darwin and his fellow observers and the synthetic work of Spencer and his fellow philosophers, the rationalist has positiv principles for which he can stand and which will not fail him in the hour of comparison. He commits logical suicide when he flouts the philosophy of development. Without science he must fall back on God or Chance, and science has been synthesized only in the evolutionary philosophy.

A careful study, under the guidance of Mr. Spencer, of the problem of the development of the religious emotion, leads to the revision, or, rather the rejection, of one of the most popular of the modern readings of the mind of primitiv man, and the effect upon it of the phenomena of nature. Formerly those who sought a natural genesis for religious ideas held that early man was led by the sense of wonder or fear to reverence and directly personi y the objects of nature—those influencing his daily life. The theory is a fascinating one and appeals to the poetical temperament, and, moreover, is congruous in its alleged experiences with the mental processes of our more developed state. But the primitiv man had "neither the emotional tendencies nor the intellectual tendencies requisit to produce the supposed chain of effects. The familiar sights and sounds of surrounding nature, suggestiv as they may be to the civilized adult, aroused in him no greater feeling of awe than they do to-day in the child or the village clown, who watches the rising and setting of the sun, the waxing and waning of the moon, the ebbing and flowing of the sea, without the slightest impulse in the direction of worship." The religious emotions of which we may be conscious as we stand face to face with such phenomena are distinctivly modern, and are obstacles in the way of our comprehension of the emotional attitude of early man. The savage, like the ignorant and brutal among ourselvs, has no curiosity. He does not speculate or ask questions concerning his environment; he does not seek an interpretation. He lacks the traits from which a system of nature-worship would hav to originate. The conclusion is that nature-worship is not the primordial form of the religious idea, but a development from it. In shadows, reflections, and dreams religion was born. From these came the notion of the duality of things, the underlying concept in all systems of religion, no matter how refined and complex. He saw his shadow, his reflection in the water, and, knowing nothing of their physical causes, he simply and naturally regarded them as appended entities. The savage sleeps; but not all his mental forces are quiescent, and hence he dreams. He eats, he hunts, he fights; he awakes and learns from others that during this time his body has been lying on the ground, unmoving and voiceless. From this grows up the notion of the wandering double that goes away in sleep for a short time, and longer in fevers, swoonings, and trances. Subsequently comes the identification of this other self with the appended entity shown in shadow and reflection. So is born and developed the belief in the double or ghost. Naturally this belief assumes special proportions in connection with the phenomenon of death. Now the other self is permanently detached. It vanishes into the shadow world, carrying with it many of its bodily characteristics, and naturally endowed with suggestions of superadded power, by a process akin to that by which we invest our absent friends with capacities and virtues not perceptible when they were with us. By-and-by the surrounding world is filled with these shadowy doubles. At first the doubles are short-lived, for the savage is not likely to dream often of any except the recently dead, and when the deceased friend is no longer dreamed about, he is no longer thought of as still existing. Later, this conception of temporary after-life expands into the conception of an unending after-life, immortality. Later still comes the division of the shadow world into places of probation, punishment, and reward.

The Sermon on the Mount.

IV.

It is often claimed that "Christian" charity and alms-giving are the outcome of the love, pity, and sympathy with suffering humanity that spring from Jesus's teaching. But that is diametrically the opposit of Jesus's teaching. He does say, "Lend, hoping for nothing again" (Luke vi, 35); he does indorse the old law, "Love thy neighbor," and he does say, "Love your enemies;" but he distinctly teaches that this is not to be done from any good that there is in charity, love, pity, or sympathy, or from any obligation to help the needy, but because that is the only thing out of which you can get any profit or reward. You are to think of the profit or reward to yourself, first, last, and all the time. But the only reason why you are not to expect any reward from those you do good to is that the reward is to be in the next world. These people cannot reward you thus, but as you are entitled to your profit on the transaction, God will himself repay you in the next world. You are always represented as having made a bargain with the Lord, one so good that it will pay you to sacrifice everything for it. Thus—

> If ye love them which love you, what thank hav ye?
> If you do good to them which do good to you, what thank hav you?
> If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thanks hav ye?—Luke vi, 32, et seq.

That is, if your good will is repaid in any way, if there is good will in return, what reward hav ye? You hav been repaid by some one else, and your bargain with the Lord is "off," and you are in debt, not he! No, you are to do it "hoping for nothing again;" and "your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the highest."

So far from our action, as recommended by Jesus, being unselfish, or springing from any doctrin he taught about love, pity, good will, or sympathy with human suffering, it is, on the contrary, selfishness of the grossest kind, grossly immoral, and has prov.d disastrous in practice. Not only is no attempt made by Jesus to enforce a distinction between the deserving poor and those poor from laziness and vice, but he is unable to see any. Poverty itself is the merit, and if you are not poor, to hav your reward you must become so, or else you will go to hell like Dives, who went there, not because he was a bad man, but simply and solely because he was rich. As to any recommendation as to how to get rid of poverty by better government and improving men's ideas, Jesus is not only silent, but he had to be, because he saw no merit in abolishing poverty. "Ye hav the poor always with you" (Mat. xxvi, 11), and you were to add to the general poverty by becoming poor yourself.

In any community where there are poor, as a last resort, in their extreme need, they must depend for sustenance on those who hav more or less wealth laid by. In this way the wealthier hav an interest in the matter, and Jesus tells them that their duty is to become themselvs enrolled among the poor by giving up to them what they themselvs possess. Socrates, centuries before Jesus, had a friend named Aristarchus, who in times of trouble and distress had taken into his house, and supported, in idleness, fourteen poor women, his own relations. The strain on his resources was so great, and his means being so rapidly diminished, that he saw the end staring him in the face, and that the time must soon come when he could no longer support them, and they must starve. In plain words, Aristarchus was a primitiv Jesus, living centuries before Jesus; and he was giving all he had to fourteen poor people, with the result that he saw that there would soon be fifteen poor people in danger of starvation instead of fourteen. Socrates, meeting him one day, saw that he was troubled about something, and questioned him. When he learned what the trouble was, he said, "Shall I tell you my mind, Aristarchus? Well, then, I am of opinion that, in the condition you are in, you cannot love your guests, nor they you, for this reason, that you, on the one hand, feel that they are a burden to you, and they, on the other, perceive you uneasy and discontented on their account. · · · The discontent will increase on both sides, and the sense of past favors will wear off." Then Socrates goes on to advise Aristarchus to set his poor friends at work, instead of keeping them in idleness and always poor. The advice was followed, to the mutual satisfaction of both parties, and both "had their reward," as Jesus would hav said. But Jesus looks for no "reward" or good result on earth; it is all to be looked for in heaven. Jesus's method results in fifteen starving malcontents in place of the original fourteen; wise old Socrates's method resulted in fifteen contented people here on earth. Surely, if there is a hereafter, Aristarchus is still just as much, nay, more, entitled to the kingdom of heaven for the help he afforded under Socrates's guidance, as he would hav been for the increased helpless poverty that must hav resulted to fifteen instead of fourteen people by following Jesus's command. Wise old Socrates, simple Jesus!

The Chinese Mencius, centuries before, said: "The feeling of commiseration is the principle of benevolence." Surely a proper motiv for giving help. The old Jewish law (Deut. xv, 8) said, "Lend him sufficient for his need." Surely a proper limitation. But Socrates taught Aristarchus, as we hav seen, to help his poor to help themselvs. Surely that was the best direction for the benevolence arising from commiseration. Socrates's teaching includes the essential points of all good teachers—viz., the right ground, the extent, and the best direction. Jesus perverted benevolence at its fountain head when he made it to begin with the desire of future reward from a hypothetical god in a hypothetical future life. As a result those countries which are still the most imbued with the doctrins of Jesus are the most involved in abject poverty and misery; and the mass of the people, learning to depend on charity, become a race of beggars and beget a race of beggars. Go to Italy and Spain and see the crowds of lazy mendicants that swarm there. As a learned friend, himself a believer in Jesus, told me, his experience with these beggars was that they did not ask for alms thus: "Giv me a sou;" but they say: "Giv me my sou." That is, giv me the daily dole that I hav a right to—that which is mine. So true is it that Jesus's teachings about charity are mischievous that Christians themselvs are being driven to reorganize their ideas upon secular models. To whatever extent their charity may hav been useful they hav been heathens; to whatever extent they hav been guided by Jesus they hav been mischievous

"But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you" (Mat. v, 44; Luke vi, 27, 28, 35 is similar). Portions of this command hav long been known to be interpolated (S. R 291) and they hav been omitted in the revised version, where it reads thus: "Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you; that ye may be the sons of your father which is heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust." And he ends with, "Ye therefore shall be perfect as your heavenly father is perfect."

Here again Jesus steps as much outside of nature as he does in his ideas about charity, and about family life. If he had told us to deal charitably in thought and action with our enemies, to moderate our resentment at their enmity, he would hav been wise; but he himself is the best evidence to show that his extreme command, "Love your enemies," is unnatural. He did not act on it himself, and neither he nor any of his followers has ever pictured God as acting on it or as going to act on it in the judgment day. Let us see in what manner Jesus carried out his own precept. In sending out the disciples to preach Jesus tells them: "Whoever shall not receive nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city" (Mat. x, 14, 15). Again: "Whoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my father, which is in heaven" (Mat. x, 33). Again: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 25, 26). If we are bidden to hate our nearest relations, what is the good of telling us to love our enemies? What is Jesus's own account of how he or God will show his love to his own enemies at the last judgment? Listen: "Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Mat. xxv, 41). Jesus asks men to love their enemies, but on earth he is intolerant and unloving to his enemies, and he promises that on high there shall be no love shown them by himself or God If man's natural want of love for his enemies is wrong, surely Jesus's or God's wrath and cursing theirs with eternal torment is devilish. Again we may say to Jesus, "Physician, heal thyself." Jesus is supposed to lay his life on the altar as a sacrifice for men. We may retort to him in his own words. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother has aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift" (Mat. v, 23, 24). If the divine perfection does not include any love or forgivness for its enemies it is useless to ask men to love their enemies in order that they may be perfect "even as our father which is in heaven is perfect."

The Religion of the Savage.

In the confused crowd of his impressions the savage perceives chiefly that he is beset on every side. He feels the blows dealt him by the invisible. He sees ghosts in the visions of the night. Slain animals, no less than slaughtered men, inhabit the places to which his spirit wanders during sleep. It does not, for a long while, occur to him that this multitude of influences may be summed up in a few grand poetical abstractions, any more than it occurs to a child now-a-days to strike out a theology for himself. The most ancient idols are without shape, not even human, nor even bestial; and such, too, are the conceptions they body forth. Men worshiped the fire in the tree, which their own hands had kindled, ages before they rose to the idea of a supreme, all-seeing sun-god. They adored the animals, tame or wild, in their neighborhood, by no means symbolically, but with a deep reverence for the wisdom, strength, and power of evil possessed by these other-shaped mortals who disputed the world with them. In vegetation they recognized gods many and lords many, born with the spring, dying at harvest, and needing to be helped by the solemn magic ritual which made things flourish or turned aside mischief. The animal, the tree, and the god were all bound up together, incarnate in king and priest, liable to injury and even to death, so that a continued succession must be provided lest their life should fail.—Quarterly Review.

Observations.

Evolution gets in its work on judicial tribunals as well as upon the animal kingdom. It is a long way from the monkey to the man, and it is also a considerable distance from the Star Chamber to the Lexow investigating committee. And the thought may be inserted here as a corollary, or as a side issue, that as a good many worthy, though savage, anthropoid apes hav been sacrificed to the law of progress in order that we might hav a number of disreputable men, so we hav shoved aside some quite respectable old legal institutions to make room for the show that Mr. Goff has been running. Whether the world gained anything when our evolutionary ancestor disappeared from his tree and the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage showed up in his pulpit, and whether the Lexow committee is a desirable innovation on the Star Chamber, are questions worth thinking of, even though there may be but one answer.

The apologists for the Star Chamber probably inquired, "If you take away our tribunal, what will you giv us in its place?" exactly as religious people ask us how we propose to fill the hole left by an uprooted superstition. The question was partially answered by the grand jury, whose proceedings, like those of its predecessor, were ex parte—a legal disguise for one-sided. Between a grand jury and a Dorcas society or sewing-circle, I should choose the latter, for the reason that its findings hav less legal force.

Nobody now defends the Star Chamber, which convicted and hanged people without accusing or trying them. Many lawyers object to the grand jury, which may indict a citizen without giving him a chance to explain, or force a witness to giv testimony calculated to degrade himself.

The Lexow committee has burlesqued the good old Star Chamber, and differs from the grand jury in holding its sessions with open doors. It is an extra-judicial but strictly intra-political tribunal, established by politicians out of office to investigate the conduct of those who were in, with the contemplated result that the relativ positions hav been changed. It is not restricted in its operations by any rules of procedure, wherein it resembles the grand jury; but here the resemblance ends, for whereas the grand jury summons credible witnesses, it cannot be recalled that any reputable person has appeared as an accuser before the committee. The Lexow tribunal drags a citizen's reputation across the tongue of a professional liar or blackguard, and then turns him adrift. He cannot even obtain a transcript of the testimony in order that he may proceed against the witness for perjury, nor can he be heard through counsel. If he goes upon the stand in his own defense, he is lost; insult by Mr. Goff being the salve applied to the injuries inflicted by the witnesses. The following is a stenographic report of an examination made in such a case:

Q. Hav you not stolen anything?
A. No, sir.
Q. What, never stolen anything! (Looking around in horror.)
A. I insist—
Q. (Breaking in.) Naturally! (Sardonically.)
A. But, sir—
Q. But me no buts. I ask you a simple question; you grow confused. Why, if you are so innocent (lingering on the "innocent"), do you get confused?
A. I can explain—
Q. Oh, we want no explanations.
A. But—
Q. Excused!
A. Sir, I—
Q. Step down! You're excused. Step down, sir! We hav had all we want of you.

The examiner was the man upon whom the people of New York city hav bestowed the highest judicial office in the political market. The language is not that which a gentleman would use when addressing another, but Mr. Goff may be excused from observance of such courtesies on the ground that he is not acquainted with them.

The Lexow Senate committee, if the truth were told, has only cleared land where its predecessors at Albany sowed the seed of blackmail and rascality. The religionists, the mock moralists, and the suppressors, co-operating with small-caliber legislators, gave us laws not demanded by public opinion or necessity—laws that nobody pretends to observe, and which hav no other uses than those to which they hav been put by the police, namely, blackmail and oppression. Persons with political influence hav of course enjoyed immunity from their operation; others, without such influence, hav bribed the police, which was the most natural thing they could do. Everybody has known such to be the fact, and the Lexow committee has merely classified public information on this subject. The official corruption did not begin in the submerged quarter, but in the churches and societies which used their "moral" influence on the legislature. And, by the way, out of this same "moral" influence arises a scandal ten times greater than any the Lexow committee could unearth in a century. I refer to the immunity of seventy-five millions of church property in this city. Compared with that, ten or a hundred dollars paid by a saloon keeper or a "madam" to a "ward man" is as a flea to an octopus. Yet the persons pushing the present investigation are the identical corrupters of legislatures who profit by their religio-political pull. I would like to see a committee of citizens sent to Albany with power to call the legislators and even the governor to the witness stand and make them tell how special bills exempting this church and that church from assessment for street, water, and other improvements were put through, and why all the churches are permitted to escape general taxation. Here is a scandal, flagrant, glaring, and notorious, for there is no moral difference between evading a fine and evading a tax that is in justice due. The ministers and the legislators having communicated a bad disorder to the body politic are doctoring it with otions that aggravate the disease, and then stripping the patient and exhibiting him for fees and notoriety. But it is the doctors themselvs who need the caustic.

That the Lexow investigation was needed will not be here denied. That municipal officials hav worked their jobs for all they worth seems apparent; but anyone who thinks that the investigators, in harassing the police, are actuated by less selfish motivs than actuated the police who neglected to harass some of the offenders against the law, could not be deemed an apt student of human nature.

The constitutionality of the income tax is to be tested by various gentlemen who object to paying it. This circumstance recalls a warning addressed to the British Parliament by William Pitt, who said: "To levy a direct tax is a dangerous experiment in a free country, and may invite revolt; but there is a method by which you can tax the last rag from the back and the last bite from the mouth without causing a murmur against high taxes, and that is to tax a great many articles of daily use and necessity so indirectly that people will pay them and not know it; their grumbling will then be of hard times, but they will not know that the hard times are caused by taxation."

Wise Mr. Pitt! The same citizens who now revolt hav been paying when they must, or evading when they could, tariff and revenue and other indirect taxes all their lives without a thought about appealing to the Constitution; and still, if rightly comprehended, the income tax is as constitutional as any.

The bloomer girls who ride the bike
Can now indulge in smoking too.
Since they at last a match can strike
The same way that their brothers do.—Puck.

Which seems to prove, as we are pained to say,
That Mrs. Martin's wrong, and girls are built that way.

The book "Trilby," which is now so conspicuously before the public eye, has a defect which, if all readers possessed my prejudice against polyglot writing, would condemn it to remain in the hands of the publishers. As a work represented to be English prose, it is a fraud, for about ten per cent of it is French or Latin. No amount of merit as a novel can make it anything but an imposition on the reader. Mr. Herbert Spencer observes that quotations from foreign writers are made as a rule "less for the sake of throwing light upon the topic in hand than for the sake of effect." In this case it is all effect, and the effect is all bad. So far from advising anybody to read "Trilby" I would advise everybody not to. And if I should find it in a library, instead of recommending its exclusion, as the Pennsylvania clergymen hav done, I would urge that it be left there.

In one chapter of "Trilby" a young man who is engaged to a minister's daughter gets to thinking over the subject of religion, and makes out a fairly strong case against the church. Its value consists in the fact that it will be read by others than Freethinkers, who hav already had the same matter presented to them in a not inferior form.

Mr. D. C. Wismer, of Quakertown, Pa., notes that the Hon. Mr. Carlisle, secretary of the treasury, has approved a design for a five-dollar bill decorated with angels. Mr. W. thinks that Secularists should protest. I hav already written Mr. Carlisle suggesting that he omit the wings.

In view of the great services which the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst has performed for the city of New York a grateful people are going into their pockets to provide a Testimonial which shall express their thanks. It is thought proper that the offering shall also be a Memorial to perpetuate his achievements. We know, of course, that the benefits accruing from the Parkhurst crusade hav not as yet assumed material or appreciable form except in an appropriation of $50,000 for the expenses of the Lexow Investigating committee, but practical considerations of that kind cut no figure in a crisis like this, when the emotions are aroused. The amount subscribed for the Parkhurst Memorial fund has already reached $10,000, and as the form of the contemplated testimonial is still not decided upon, and as suggestions are in order, I take this occasion to make some. Beyond doubt, the most appropriate Memorial would be a large seven or eight story Home for Unrepentant Magdalens, where visiting clergymen could be entertained and afforded opportunity to witness the wickedness of the city without the dangers and expense of "slumming" in company with corrupt policemen. As the Parkhurst habit is likely to spread to other cities, the Memorial might be made an interstate affair—Massachusetts, for example, contributing the Crispus Attucks monument to be set up in the front yard. It would be sure to attract attention. If this scheme is objected to as too elaborate or expensiv, then how about a Fountain, erected in the Tenderloin district, with statuary representing the young men of Dr. Parkhurst's Bible class playing leapfrog with nymphs? That would perpetuate the initial feature of the crusade. Or, third, let a souvenir Coin be struck, the obverse side showing the easy-going savior forgiving the woman taken in the act; on the reverse side, Dr. Parkhurst, with a stern expression of countenance calculated to denote that he is for giving her three months on the island. That, I take it, would serve to illustrate the progress of Christian charity during the past eighteen centuries. These designs, I admit, are unique, but so is the occasion; and new occasions teach new duties.

News and Notes.

Conway, North Dakota, is my next point after Park River. This was thought to be somewhat of a dark place with the shadow of Rome over it and that possibly brickbats might be used upon the adventurous reformer. But Conway turned out to be one of the best places I hav visited. I gave three lectures in the school-house, and it was full every evening. I had most attentiv audiences, and the Catholics present admitted that the Demands of Liberalism were about right. I had a fine drive from Park River to Conway with John J. Kohnen. It was a perfectly lovely day. The distance was twelve miles, and it didn't take much over an hour to go that distance. Half way between Park River and Conway is Pisek, a Bohemian settlement that is Roman to the core. A ten-thousand-dollar Catholic church has been built here, and farms hav been mortgaged in order to pay for it. At the last election every candidate was obliged to put up something for the benefit of that church. It presents a very handsome appearance, and can be seen for miles over the wide plains. I reckon I shouldn't get a corporal's guard to listen to me at Pisek. The priest has got his work in here, and the people bow down. So I lingered not. At Conway, however, it is entirely different. There are many Bohemians here, but almost all of them are Freethinkers. The spirit of John Huss flames out. In fact, the majority of the people are Freethinkers, and, take it all in all, Conway is one of the most Liberal points in North Dakota. The lectures—the first of the kind ever delivered here—were well received, and the membership of the Federation was increased by many names, among them the leading business men of the place. Mr. Kohnen made a fine opening address in introducing me to the people, speaking in behalf of human rights and free and honest investigation. Wm. E. Black, the schoolmaster of the place, F. E. Vorachek, Math Vobayda, Geo. W. Fraine, O. Davidson, R. A. Wavsanek, F. J. Ponzar, F. D. Worthing, etc., are among the Liberal friends at Conway. I found them stanch and generous supporters, and all the time I spent at Conway was pleasant and encouraging for future work. It was wonderfully fair weather the first two days I was there—sunshiny days and moonlight nights, brilliant and beautiful—but Saturday closed in with a white frost and heavy mists. Thinks I, the blizzard is on my track now, I guess, but I must grin and bear it. It remained dark and gloomy all day Saturday; and after sunset it was so dark that one could scarcely see an arm's length ahead. This prevented those who lived in the country from attending, but the school-house was full nevertheless. To my surprise E. Smith-Petersen, of Park River, was present. He had taken his chances and driven over from his home, twelve miles, to attend the lecture and take me back with him for Sunday services. It was rather dubious weather for such a midnight journey in almost total darkness, but of course I must get back to Park River, or else the Methodist minister would be too happy. Well, during the lecture it partially cleared off, and the moon shone dimly through the fleecy clouds so that we could easily see our way, and it was a delightful drive. We had a good pair of horses, and they sped along nobly over the slippery ground, and about one o'clock Sunday morning we were in Park River.

Sunday dawned in gorgeous array. There was scarcely a cloud in the sky. There could not hav been a more favorable season for a battle-ground with orthodoxy. The forces were out indeed on both sides. There never before was such excitement in Park City. It beat even election. The effort to prevent my speaking proved unsuccessful. The Opera House was rented, paid for, and there was no interruption. It was crowded in the afternoon, and I delivered my lecture on "The Bible and Modern Thought." Mr. Petersen made the introductory address, and it was a good one—a bold and splendid presentation of the whole matter as to whether a Freethinker should be allowed to speak in Park River or not. It was a question which concerned the interests of all, a question of justice and human rights. This opening address struck the keynote of the situation and won the attention and sympathy of the whole audience. I spoke for nearly two hours, I believe, for I felt that the occasion demanded a full exposition of our principles; for no doubt Park River will be shaken for many a day to come with this revolution in behalf of Freethought. Messrs. Simons and Kapler furnished us with inspiring music, as before, and we closed the great meeting with singing "America" to Freethought sentiments; and that closed our part of the dramatic contest, and our colors were victorious.

But an event of even more tremendous import to the orthodox faith occurred in the evening. It was a splendid culmination of the existing campaign It completed the revolution, and announced that hereafter Park River was not to be under the dominion of a gloomy orthodoxy; that light and truth and humanity were triumphant. The Rev. Mr. Campbell, of the Presbyterian church, announced that he would preach Sunday evening upon Freethought. He had attended every lecture—is an educated and able man—capable of holding his own. He is besides a man of good breeding—of courtesy and social culture, a true gentleman; and also one who dares to speak his honest thought. Now the impression in the community was that he would train his well-mounted theological guns upon me, and that nothing would be left of the Infidel lecturer. The editor of the paper at Park River, who is a true-blue Methodist, had written the following exquisit bit of criticism, which, of course, as a genuin expression of the orthodox spirit, I am sure that the readers of "News and Notes" will appreciate.

A Freethought (so-called) lecturer was billed to occupy the city hall a couple of evenings this week. This irreligious specialty sometimes has a poisonous effect upon bright half-grown lads, and upon ignorant people of larger growth, but the intelligent man or woman who has given any previous thought to the subject finds such a lecture only "flat, stale, and unprofitable." The "Freethought" platformist of to-day is generally only an echo or a contortionist.

In connection with this he published a notice of the Rev. Mr. Campbell:

Rev. D. Campbell will, on Sunday evening next in the Presbyterian church, speak upon the subject of "Freethought." As a rule, Scottish Presbyterian ministers are soundly logical and well able to discuss metaphysical questions, and the Gazette-Witness expects that Mr. Campbell will prove himself no exception to a national rule. It is urged that all who can should go and hear this address.

Well, the editor came to hear the preacher whom he had so extolled, and a more woe-begone countenance was never witnessed. It was nearly a yard long and as solemn as the grave. It was as if the day of judgment was right upon it, and this was the general effect upon the orthodox mind of this radical discourse. It was Freethought in spirit from beginning to end. The speaker practically indorsed the demands of Liberalism. He was willing to admit that Freethought was constructiv; and that skepticism had benefited the church; that it was what the church needed to bring it into line with civilization. He affirmed that Christianity was capable of growth and improvement. He repudiated the doctrin of infant damnation and eternal damnation. He said he sincerely hoped that hell would sometime be turned "upside down." He thought that hope should be immortal. It was a discourse in the line of my own, for it was progressiv, and infused with a broad and splendid spirit of inquiry. The church was crowded to its utmost capacity. All the standing room was occupied. It was the largest audience that any church in Park River had ever held. The Freethinkers were delighted with the utterances of this brave preacher.

Mr. Campbell, of course, is not an Infidel as generally understood, except in the method of inquiry. He still believes in God, in immortality, in the divinity of Jesus, in the Bible as to a certain extent an inspired book; and believing in these things, he claims his right to stand in the Presbyterian pulpit. Of his duty in this matter no one can judge except himself. I certainly do not claim the right to mark out his pathway for him, any more than he can claim the right to do the same for me. But he is not bigoted. He is broad-minded. He is willing to agree to disagree in spite of wide divergences; and that is the spirit of Liberalism, and this spirit is more than the particular mental results to which one arrives. At present Rev. Mr. Campbell is neither an Agnostic, nor Atheist, nor Materialist, nor Deist. He is a Christian Theist, accepting Christianity in its universal principles rather than its special doctrins. He has no desire to draw the sword or compel others to follow his dictum. He is evidently a man who knows what he thinks, and I do not believe he will take any backward step. What he said on Sunday evening, without doubt, is the result of much thought and deep study. He spoke with deliberation and great earnestness.

Of course I do not agree with his criticism on Ingersoll and the old-time Infidels who hav done such good work, more destructiv than constructiv perhaps; but such is the necessity of the situation. We must remove in order to build. Mr. Campbell distinguishes between orthodoxy, the church, and Christianity. The church is not so bad as orthodoxy, and Christianity is not so bad as the church. There are faults in all of them, but the church and Christianity can be and are improved, while orthodoxy must be left behind. The distinction is a good one; and it is possible that in the onward progress of man the church and Christianity will be severed from orthodoxy and become humanitarian.

The criticism of Ingersoll was that he confounds orthodoxy, the church, and Christianity, and makes them one and the same thing. I am sure that Ingersoll does nothing of the sort. He recognizes the distinction, but so long as the church and Christianity are based upon and cling to orthodoxy should we not deal with them as identical? If the church will frankly say that it does not believe in, but repudiates orthodoxy, then we will no longer accuse the church of the sins of orthodoxy. But until the church does this—so long as it is logically and historically connected with orthodoxy, and orthodoxy is its creed—hav we not a right to hold the church responsible for orthodoxy, and for the savagery it contains? It is said that Ingersoll attacks a creed that is no longer believed by the intelligence of the race. This is true. But this is still the creed of the church, and through the church this creed is still powerful and dangerous. We must keep on attacking the creed until the church and all Christians are so ashamed of it that they will publicly and forever repudiate it. Our chief work at the present is to strip off the cowardice and hypocrisy of the church, imposed by a creed which, if not any longer truly accepted by the advanced Christian, still haunts with terror the minds of many millions. I think Mr. Campbell, in his endeavor to defend the church from both Ingersoll and orthodoxy, made some illogical statements, but he did this in a courteous and honorable manner, and he himself certainly occupies no "coward's castle."

I do not mean to convey the idea that Mr. Campbell is in full agreement and sympathy with myself. No doubt hereafter there will be intellectual battles between us on great questions, but he is a foeman worthy of one's steel. He will take no unfair advantage. But the difference between us, be it noted, is in result, but not in spirit and method. He is a free thinker, as he declared Jesus and Luther to be free thinkers, in that he affirms the right of private judgment, declares that each one should think for himself, that the highest authority is human reason itself, and that doubt is a necessary condition of progress. Hence there is no reason why we should not shake hands, since our moral ideals are practically the same. Of course the orthodox will misrepresent Mr. Campbell and call him an "Infidel" and all sorts and varieties of harsh names. They will not realize the depths and hights of his philosophical ideas; that he is trying to make the church a better and more humane institution; to bring it in accord with civilization, and to make it a more splendid factor in modern life. They will not see the nobility and value of his efforts. They will crucify him, I believe. But if he is excommunicated it will be to the injury of the church, and will redound only to his credit. He will hav the support of the best people in Park City.

On the other hand the Methodist clergyman is a unique specimen of the inquisitor and persecutor. He can smell out heresy afar off. He knows it all. His nasal protuberance is an arch detectiv, as the following incident exhibits. One of the citizens of Park River, who had really never violated any law, was arrested for selling intoxicating drinks. The defendant offered a bottle of the accused liquor to the prosecuting attorney, and asked him to taste of it, and see if it was intoxicating, a short and easy method of settling the question. The officer did so, and at once declared that it was not an illegal beverage. It had no intoxicating quality. "Will you please let me smell of it?" said the reverend Methodist, who was present at the trial. He was allowed to do so, and by his wonderful sense of smell instantly declared that the liquor was intoxicating, and that the defendant should be prosecuted with the utmost rigor of the law. I think this reverend smeller could almost equal Jesus, who turned water into wine, in his prodigious knowledge of the constituents of liquor. He must hav an amazing experience of liquor to know simply by putting his nose to it how drunk it will make a man. That is a theological nose indeed, fitted for the grand inquisitor himself. Who can withstand such a proboscis, truly elephantine in its capacity, which would rule Park City with a rod of iron? Fortunately other people had more brains than nose, and the suit was dismissed. This is a specimen of the despotism of the church. It not only puts its foot in it, but nose and all. It would not only crucify a man for false doctrin, but also for a false scent. If he does not please the olfactory nerves he is to be executed without benefit of clergy. Deliver me from the tyranny of the nose! If that is established, what will the end be?

I shall not forget Park River, the good fellowship I hav had here, and the varied experiences. This is a typical Western town, with Western pluck and enterprise, and no doubt it has a bright career before it. The leading people are of the right sort and are in favor of progress. I thank the friends of this place who hav stood so noblv by the colors, and I feel sure that hereafter Park River will enjoy the golden days of humanity. The midnight of orthodoxv is on the wane. The "priests of the evil faith" are passing.

Their swords and scepters I floating see,
Like wrecks on the surge of eternity.

It is hoped that friends in the vicinity and throughout Arizona will make arrangements for lectures at this time, and push the Freethought work. Mr. Putnam will also arrange to lecture in New Mexico, Colorado, and Kansas on his return from Arizona. Those wishing lectures in any of these states will communicate with S. P. Putnam, 234 South Water street, Chicago.

L. K. Washburn in the Lecture Field.

Colonel Ingersoll says:

"NEW YORK, Dec. 16, 1894.

"I hear that L. K. Washburn is going to lecture, and I hope he will.

"Mr. Washburn is thoroughly informed—knows the popular theology in all its moods and tenses—is perfectly familiar with the history of Freethought, and with the sophistries of superstition. He is a natural orator and is full of enthusiasm for what he believes to be the truth. He has the courage of his convictions, and presents his arguments in a logical, forcible, pleasing, and poetic way.

"Good luck to him—and long life!"

Capt. Silas Latham, late of the schooner Gertrude Summers, laid his course down Lafayette place the other day with a small cargo of bluefish under his arm and a snug wad of greenbacks in his pocket. The fish he contributed to the Editor's table, while of the greenbacks he deposited a generous bunch for the good of the cause and for value received. The captain has been fishing down Norfolk way this fall. The Gertrude Summers became too small for his business, and was sold, but it is safe to predict that he will soon be plowing the brine again with new planks under his feet.

Letters of Friends.

That Libel on Lowell.

JERSEY CITY, Dec. 14, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I was glad to see George E. Macdonald's "Observation" this week about the James Russell Lowell paragraph. I hav the paragraph down on my memorandum for investigation, as I could not believe he ever wrote it when I first read it.

C. B. COOPER.

Beyond the Eightieth Mile-post.

ATCHISON, KAN , Nov. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and Helen H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods." This is probably the last time I can send for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I am now in my eighty-third year, but I do want to liv as long as I can.

HENRY BENDER.

Carlisle is Dead to Reason.

QUAKERTOWN, PA., Dec. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the papers that Secretary Carlisle has approved the design for a five-dollar silver certificate illustrated with angels. I think the Letter-Writing Corps should get in their work on Secretary Carlisle at once.

Very truly, D. C. WISMER.

Is in a Hurry for Them.

WHEELING, W. VA., Dec. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $7. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and two copies of "The Holy Bible," by Colonel Ingersoll, come along quick.

Wishing you much success, I remain, a stanch Freethinker, LOUIS ROESSLER.

Substantial Thanks.

TROUTDALE, OR., NOV. 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As to-day is Thanksgiving, and as I don't know of anyone to thank but you, for your noble work in the Freethought cause, I therefore inclose $8 50 for the following books: "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," two "Story Hours," one "Right Living," "All About the Bible," and "Crimes of Preachers."

C. F. KUNATH.

It Is a Demolisher.

ILWACO, WASH., Dec. 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received Colonel Ingersoll's latest lecture, "The Bible." The entire foundation of the Christian religion has been demolished. The colonel shows as plainly as can be that the clergy know no more about psychology and other worlds than they know about how or where Mrs. Eve got the needle and thread to make fig-leaf aprons. J. A. SEEBER.

Sowing the Seed.

OTTAWA, O., Dec. 5. 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find within $6. Renew my subscription for two years and send me eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." I will distribute the same where I think they will bring forth fruit in due season. We are the most priest-ridden county in the state, equal to Russia or Spain, excepting the thumbscrews. See Putnam county in your prospectus.

C. E. BEARDSLEY.

A Crime and No Crime.

SNOHOMISH, WASH., Dec. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: If two men pull their guns and commence shooting at each other, it is a high crime. But if we organize in large armies and kill by the thousand it is no crime, and the victorious party is treated with distinguished consideration. If a man should copy a verse in a certain book and send it through the mail to another person, it is a crime. But if he should send the whole book through the mail it is no crime, provided it carries the holy brand. J. S. MARTIN.

A Cyclopedia of Freethought Achievements.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I procured nearly a month ago. I hav at different times of late received over $60 worth of Freethought literature published by the Truth Seeker Company, but "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is the greatest book of all. It is a cyclopedia of Freethought achievements, and is worth its weight in gold.

Very truly yours, J. W. HODGE.

A Good Missionary.

ORANGEVILLE, PA., Nov. 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, for which send eight copies "Age of Reason," and one each of Ingersoll's latest works, "The Holy Bible," "Shakspere," "Lincoln," and "Is Suicide a Sin?" I had a half-dozen "Age of Reason," and I got my Christian neighbors to read them till I can't find them any more. There are several Freethinkers now in this neighborhood, though but few are out-spoken, and they are widely scattered. They talk of getting J. E. Remsburg, if they can, to giv a lecture or two. M. S. HAYHURST.

Is Thankful for a Roast.

KENT, O., Dec. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Right glad am I that you so cleverly roasted the narrow-viewed Inter-Ocean for its unwarranted attack on the Press Club of Chicago. I hav mailed it a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing your exposure of its meanness; hav also ceased allowing the Inter-Ocean to come into my family, since I do not want to contribute in any way to making sectarians to divide humanity into hostil camps only to squabble about the unknown rather than to learn and obey natural law. Yours for exposing Christian superstition, MARIUS HEIGHTON.

A Mistake as to Fact.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send "Bible Temperance" and a catalog of publications.

I hav a communication from the spirit of D. M. Bennett. He says he has not changed his opinions any in regard to the holy Bible or the divinity of Jesus Christ since he left us, but that he has learned that he was entirely mistaken in regard to a future life, and he is happy and well satisfied with his work on earth.

HIRAM F. HOVER.

[The trouble with the communication of Mr. Bennett is, the medium did not know that Mr. Bennett was a Spiritualist while living, and that if he has changed his mind he must now *dis*believe that he is living as a spirit.—ED. T. S.]

For Stirring Up Purposes.

WOODBURN, IA., Dec. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which send me the following books: "Answers to Christian Questions," "Was Christ Crucified?" "Bible Morals," "Crimes of Preachers," "Resurrection of Jesus." "Thumbscrew and Rack," and "Self-Contradictions of the Bible."

I hav just finished reading "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is a great and grand work. Brother Putnam should hav the praise of every Freethinker in America.

There are not many outspoken Freethinkers here, but several who are too timid to let their views be known to the public.

I think a little Freethought literature dropped in their homes would do a good work. E. H. HORTON.

Sunday Meddlers at Work.

NORTH BALTIMORE, O., Dec. 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, for which send me one dollar's worth of Paine's "Age of Reason," and for the other dollar send me the best you hav for distribution on the Sunday question. The preachers hav gone through the town and notified all to close business on Sunday and threatened to boycott and prosecute those who do not obey. The majority of the people here are Liberal and it has stirred them up, so it will be for the interest of Freethought. The reverend gentlemen say as they go around that they do not want any controversy on the subject.

S. M. BOWER.

[Of course the Sabbatarians want no controversy—it is not recorded in the history of the world that a tyrant ever wanted to argue the merits of the case with his victim; it is precisely to prevent argument that the despot enacts repressiv laws; to his mind there is more sound logic in a club than in all the reasoning that has been done from the beginning of human life to the present moment. The despot or would-be despot is sure that the imprisonment, disfranchisement, or banishment of his opponent will answer for all time the objections made by that opponent. Down with the Sunday laws. ED. T. S.]

How She Shames the Thoughtless Youth.

FORESTVILLE, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7, for which send "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," "About the Holy Bible," "Thumbscrew and Rack," and "Age of Reason." I would like to giv you a little description of the town in which I liv, but am getting almost too old to write much, being nearly eighty-four years of age, but will say there are eight hundred inhabitants and five churches and not an outspoken Liberal but myself so far as I know.

I sent a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to our local editor, and I inclose the comment he made on it:

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the name of a New York publication which makes money by pandering to the tastes of those who criticise and disbelieve the teachings of the Bible. A copy of it has been sent to this office by one of our lady subscribers, and from a perusal of it we conclude its editor will never find the "truth" as it is held by the majority of our intelligent and best people.

I wish to say to Brother George E. Macdonald that "Observations" are right to the point every time. This from your friend and well-wisher,

MRS. J. W. BENNETT.

[This givs us the occasion to remark that the respect the average country editor has for the beliefs of "our intelligent and best citizens" is induced by a healthy appreciation of the numerical fact that they do constitute "the majority." That is why they are, in his sight, the most intelligent and the best.—ED. T. S.]

Unanswered Prayers.

EAGLE, NEB., Nov. 28. 294.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.75 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ingersoll's "All About the Holy Bible." This is all I can send at present, as times are very hard. The Christian God saw fit to send us hot winds and drouth last summer, thereby causing untold misery this winter. This has been the worst failure our state ever had. The corn crop was nearly a total failure, and still people are foolish enough to pray and trust in such a good-for-nothing God.

There will be great suffering this winter, and if it was not for weak and frail men starvation would stalk through our land. God will do nothing, so it is left for man alone to alleviate the suffering of the unfortunate. During the drouth there were at work the rainmaker with dynamite to halt the clouds and the preacher with his prayer-meeting to appease the wrath of God, but they all were miserable failures. I asked a good Christian why their prayers were not answered and he said that those were things of nature which we could not regulate. If a good rain had followed their prayers and saved the crop, I venture to say that this Christian would hav said it was all God's doing.

These sky-pilots are a stumbling block in the way of progress. We hav one old crank here who tells his young sheep not to associate with doubters and unbelievers, as it is very dangerous to the welfare of their souls (of the preachers' pocket-books he means). He is a Lutheran minister, and while officiating at the funeral of a neighbor's boy which I attended, he had to attack the public schools from the pulpit—said they were godless schools, schools of the devil.

Yours for free speech and free thought,

O. R. BOUSEWETTER.

Inter Alia.

GRAY, N. M., Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: How limited and finite are the many theories (logical ones, too) essaying to explain the freaks indulged in by Mother Universe so long ago, and, too, guided by an eye, as scientific as prophetic, depict an atlas whereon is thrown a panorama as abstract as the future itself.

However, rational theory is the only means of acquainting ourselvs with what might be called anything, for without theory we are without thought, and without thought, not susceptible of any understanding whatsoever, and, if you please, not eligible to the acquaintance of even an iota.

Among the logical theories referred to we make special mention of chemistry and geology. These we consider the superior pair of philosophic keys that yet may unlock to a great demonstration the question of the past and future.

Religion, as we now see it every day, is entirely too weak and absurd to be admitted by any thinking mind for farther consideration than the Indian ghost dance of a short time ago. These things were born of a like or similar source and cannot be fostered by others than the ignorant.

And should we admit the validity of religion or the ghost dance, what is it at best? Would not Abraham's bosom and the environments of the "great white throne" soon wear to the meanest monotony? Christian, would not the crown you speak of be a burden to bear? Now, to be "honest Injun," would not you prefer a nice Mexican sombrero? It is much more desirable!

That there is no individual being ruling the universe; that time, space, and matter make up the whole; that life is nothing more than nature's fungus, are postulates too plain to question.

Time exists and defies any god; space occupies regardless of all things, and matter pervades time and space, forever and forever.

What business can a god play at among these independent elements?

S. T. GRAY.

Don't Know Their Own Platform.

SOUTH BEND, WASH., Dec. 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am way behind with my subscription this time, but nevertheless I hav been hard at work all the time for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav now got you a club of four new subscribers at last, but I hav never had such a time in my life as to get the fourth subscriber. I hav had three a long time, but the trouble commenced in getting the fourth. But you may not think it strange at all, when we take into consideration the fact that we hav seven churches in our place, a town of about two hundred voters. Well, sir, we hav church sociables for breakfast, church sociables for dinner, and church sociables for supper, in this place, and it is a fact that it is an impossibility to hav any amusement at all, unless it is for the benefit of some church. The Women's Christian Temperance Union is also having quite a boom at the present time. I don't know their exact number, but judging from the noise they make they must be numerous; but I hav been told as a fact that few of them hav ever read or known anything about their platform. They hav been after me several times to join them, but I hav told them that I know too much about their platform; that it is too narrow for me, and that I feel better at home in THE TRUTH SEEKER family.

I think I am the only one in this place that has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER heretofore; but from now on, our family will be five, and I hope it will bear its fruit in due time.

We hav quite a number of what they call business men in our town, who profess to be Liberals, but when I approach them for a subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER they always find some excuse; the most common is that they cannot take it because of their wives. Well, it seems a pity to me that men are afraid to let their wives read common-sense literature, but such is prejudice.

I must bring this to a close with a happy New Year to THE TRUTH SEEKER family; and with the best wishes to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Mr. Heston, I remain, yours for truth and liberty, HENRY ELLISON.

In a Contented Frame of Mind.

ALEDO, TEX., Nov. 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send $10—seven of it is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and four copies of the "Age of Reason," to be sent to Mr. J. K. P. Brown. The remainder is for the same old ship that I hav been sailing in for several years, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and four copies of the "Age of Reason." I hav three friends that I want to save, and I think that they are worth saving; and I also hav their promis that they will read the "Age of Reason" carefully. So you see that is all I can ask for. I feel sure that it will knock more superstition out of them in a short time than the preacher can talk into them in a whole year, for the preacher doesn't talk common sense or use reason, but talks nonsense and tries to scare, and does scare, a great many by picturing to them the wrath of God and opening the gates of hell, and letting them hav an imaginary peep at the fiery furnace, and maybe telling them while they are looking that their old grandma or some other near relativ is surely there, because she did not believe the apple story, the rib story, or some other foolish story equally as absurd, with which their old scrap-book is crowded.

I asked a preacher a question once, and this is the way he answered it: "I don't propose to waste my shot on dead ducks." I did not know until then that I was a duck at all, and don't know it yet. But there is one thing that I do know, and that is, I hav never been ducked by a gospel pounder yet, and am not likely to be; don't think that it would do any good, unless he used a cake of soap and a good coarse towel, which he would not be likely to do, as there would be some work about that, a thing which the most of them don't like very well. Sometimes I think that if there is a God, and he uses any class of men for spokesmen, it must be such men as Paine, Ingersoll, Putnam, Remsburg, and other men of that type, men who tell the people that they must save themselvs and not pay for prayers by holy drones who cannot show one instance where they ever had a prayer answered or show a receipt for any soul they ever saved. Well, as I am not much of a church-goer, and think that Christianity as it is taught is a holy humbug, I may be one of Satan's boys; if I am, it doesn't bother me any. Take the Bible for it, he is a pretty good old chap, and as sharp as a tack, and he and our dear old mother Eve are the whole sources of our knowledge. Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER lamp may hold out to burn and shine brighter and brighter, J. C. MILLER.

S. P. Putnam's Works: His Great Book.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Dec. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: My conditions are such that I hav read only part of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." As I am struggling to liv and life is uncertain I hasten to giv my opinion as far as my few feeble words can. Being a born lover and seeker of truth and having for seventy years, with insatiable love of knowledge, read a vast amount of literature in search of truth, I am, I think, somewhat qualified to appreciate Putnam and his work. His writings for the past fifteen years or more hav been to me an inexpressibly great mental feast. His poetical prose and his poetry are always full of literary gems—far more important to me, they are gems of truth; gems of nature; gems of realities; gems "that will glitter on the forefinger of all time" to emancipate, elevate, save, and bless humanity. S. P. Putnam is (to me) to our present mental revolution what his namesake, General Putnam (whose history I know), was to the great Revolution that preceded our American liberty, so called, but practically to a great extent a misnomer compared to my ideal of liberty.

Yes, I glory in what S. P. Putnam has done and is doing for truth and humanity. I am proud and elated that he has, or seems to hav, a working and thinking organism so full of exhaustless (?) life and energy, from sole to crown, to inspire and awaken the ignorant, stupid, and apathetic; to penetrate and explore, and spread the light in new fields from North to South and East to West (this also applies to John Remsburg) to pioneer the way as I did in my way long ago.

Oh, that we had a thousand or even a hundred Putnams in the field (Remsburgs too) to "carry the war into Africa"; to defeat and rout godism and priestcraft; to "put to flight those silly superstitions with which tyrants hav enthralled man's reason and liberty." Then would old Error flee from his victims as ghosts troop home to graveyards at the approach of sunlight. Yes, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is a great book in material, size, weight, and mechanical finish; but far greater in its immeasurable worth to spread the truth.

A Methodist lady is reading one of the two sent me, and I intend to lend it to all orthodox people who will read it, as I hav ever been doing with all my books and papers. The price is only $5; it is worth $500—money cannot measure its value. The proem is worth $5; the introduction is priceless, so much saving, basic truth "in a nutshell," so well expressed.

Reader, if you hav not read the book, go without something for your back and stomach that you may feed your mind. I must stop. J. H. COOK.

The Fruits of Priestcraft.

VINELAND, N. J., Dec. 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The papers tell us that there are a hundred and eleven thousand priests and clergymen in this country. Instead of making the people brothers and sisters, all working together in love for the general good, they hav got them divided into a hundred and forty-four different sects, each sect hating all the others. And this is all done by preaching from the same man-made Bible about its man-made God, the object of each priest or clergyman being to fill his own purse and liv at ease.

The priests are impostors,
Their trade is a fraud;
They teach that the Bible
Came from a wise God;
But it proves him a being
Of vengeance and wrath,
Dispensing injustice
Throughout his whole path.

The priests start revivals
That are but a fraud—
Mere animal passion
And not from a god;
They frighten the weak ones
By preaching of hell
And soon hav them dupes
To their noisy old bell.

But the converts when made
Are worse than before,
For they think they are saved
And they "go it" the more.
Churchmen in trading
Will cheat and will lie,
To build a grand church
Pointing up to the sky.

And their church frolics, festivals,
Feasts, fairs, and fun,
Intelligent heathen
Would carefully shun;
Church-women start
A brisk temperance hum,
But still hug the Bible
That bids men drink rum,

Building up with one hand
What the other pulls down—
Too blind to observe
That no progress comes round.
Church girls sell kisses,
A quarter apiece,
To help raise the wherewith
To pamper the priest.

And some when they get it
Are so awfully glad
They whack the old Bible
As though they were mad;
I hav seen the leaves fall
From the pulpit to floor,
And wished they would whack
Till there was not one more,

For the sooner that book
Is out of their sight,
The sooner the people
Will learn to do right.

Variation of the Magnetic Needle.

LOCUST CORNER, O., Dec. 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of Sept. 29th last, there appeared a letter from J. B. Johnson, of Chattaroy, Wash., containing some questions concerning the probable cause of the variation of the magnetic needle.

I, too, hav been much interested in this subject and can but regret that Mr. Johnson's letter did not bring out the information he desired.

I wish to advance a few ideas, which, I hope, may provoke some criticism, if nothing more.

All the variations of the needle will no doubt be due mainly to magnetism of the earth itself, though affected slightly, perhaps, by the magnetic influence of other planets, especially by Venus and Jupiter.

Professor Norton, author of a number of scientific publications, has undertaken to show that the earth derives its magnetism from the collision of the molecules of its revolving and rotating mass with the ether of space. This, if true, will partly explain the variations; at any rate, it will serve as a basis for some further ideas.

The professor furnishes much evidence in the known properties of magnetism to sustain his theory, which, in the absence of inconsistent or controverting facts, may be accepted for the present as a basis for the writer's theories.

It is evident that the equatorial regions encounter greater friction with the ethereal medium than the poles because of the greater motion of the former.

It is equally evident that the side of the earth which is opposit the sun at any instant meets greater friction than the side next to the sun, and for the same reason. Owing to the inclination of the earth's axis, the poles are alternately presented to the sun in the solstices, and at right angles in the equinoxes; thus the relativ inclination of the earth's axis to the sun performs a complete revolution each year, which must cause a corresponding variation in the ethereal friction in the different parts of its mass. This may in a measure account for the departure of the magnetic from the geographical pole, which departure, in the absence of rotation and other influences, would seek a point of equilibrium at about twenty-three and one-half degrees. But the rotation would naturally counteract this tendency and drive the magnetic pole to a point nearer the geographical pole, where the two opposing influences would balance.

A magnetic center reached in the manner here supposed would be permanent unless disturbed by outside influences.

Of these there are possibly two: 1. The precession of the equinoxes causes a slight but constant variation in the annual revolution. 2. The varying positions of Venus, Mars, and Jupiter, both in their distances and the inclination of their poles to or from the corresponding poles of the earth, must result in complicated and ever-changing effects upon the magnetism of our planet.

Magnetic variation is here "explained" by theories based upon a theory based upon facts, and if errors in reasoning are visible to any truth seekers, they will oblige the writer, and no doubt Mr. Johnson, by pointing out the same.

CHAS. O. HAYS.

Is Life Eternal?

Dec. 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The day was when I would hav given much, hav given life itself, to hav answered the above query in the affirmativ; but now, since the goblet of life appears less sweet, since experience has shown the lees in the cup, and since our greatest joys are found, when grasped, to be but bubbles, I, wavering, pause on the dizzy hights of the granit cliffs whose bases are washed by the murky waves of death's dark river—wavering, pause and ask, If there be a life beyond the seething flood, were it worth the living?

The flower blooms to wither and decay; fruit ripens to fall and rot; man grows old to die; and then the flower, the fruit, the man are dead. And, may I ask, does death end all?

The Spiritualist says, "No; there is another life beyond the cares of this; beyond the surge of time; beyond the festering pit, where souls immortal while eternity away basking in the rays of an eternal sun on the flower-strewn banks of a celestial stream, where sorrow is unknown and pain is never felt? The Materialist says, "Yes; there is no beyond. 'As the tree falleth so shall it lie.' Death is the end; then comes the corroding worm, the loathsome pit, the dreamless sleep, and eternal oblivion." Then, again, comes the Agnostic with "I don't know." In truth we are all Agnostics, for we don't know. We may think we know, we may hope we know, but we don't know.

I am a Spiritualist—a medium. I hav seen some manifestations; yet I cannot say I know, nor can I say I hope.

Those who profess to know the most about that life on the shoreless deep tell us that life there is an eternal progression. Then there must be there, as here, a perpetual struggle for existence, an eternal jostling, jolting, striving to excel, to surpass, to overcome, the spirits by which we are there surrounded. They say that this is to be preferred, as eternal rest would be eternal stagnation.

To the young, in the activ heat of strife, when laurels are seen within their very grasp and victory, with her rainbow-tinted banner, ever waves them on, peace and rest may seem stagnation; but to the old, aweary with the toil and strife, sorrow-laden, tear-stained, heart-broken, in whose souls the grim phantoms of despair hold revel, the quiet found in a dreamless sleep, in a nameless grave, seems a boon greatly to be desired. If there be a future life, whose environments must be guessed by what we learn in this; if it be but the continuation of this, then I would sleep the quiet sleep of endless forgetfulness, and instead of playing upon the harp of a thousand strings I would play upon the stringless harp of eternal silence; and I would pray in the last throes of expiring nature, as the death damp bedewed my brow; ere the eye had glazed, the pulse had ceased to throb; whilst yet the tongue the power had to lisp—I would pray: "O God—if God there be—grant that death may be my end, and raise me not up to a life of endless toil and pain, but let me sleep, sweetly sleep, the quiet sleep of non-existence through all eternity."

It is sweet perhaps when death steals from us our kind, fond parents, who hav battled with the cares of life to make ours less hard, to think, There is a future where we can meet that father and that mother, and tell them how much we loved them, how much we missed them when they were taken away. But it is a selfish thought. They were aweary, aweary with toil, aweary of life, longed for rest; yet we, who claim to love them, would cause them to rise from their peaceful sleep to liv a life of which we know nothing and can hope but little; a life of toil more wearisome perhaps than this; a life to last as long as endless God exists, for the selfish pleasure it might giv us to tell them of our love. It is here that man's unwonted selfishness looms forth in all its horrid hideousness—at the graves of those we love. We would not giv them up to the destroyer worm, and so we raise them to a life more sad, more drear, more damnable than this.

Or, when death came among your flowers and took away little Alice, took that one cherished rose, how the tears chased themselvs adown your ashen cheek; you felt the clasp of that little fevered hand grow weak; you saw those pretty blue eyes, which had seemed for days to wear a heavenly light, put on a lusterless film; you felt, as you held her little form against your anxious bosom, a spasmodic quiver of limbs and trunk and knew that all was over, and as you laid her little wasted form upon its couch and left her little body to the sacrilegious care of stranger hands, you felt that if the power were yours you would call her back; but as this power you lacked you built for her another life in the many-mansioned heaven, and then 'twere sweet perhaps to think you would some day meet again your little Alice to tell her how much she had been to you—how dear, how sweet, how loved. But that too was a selfish thought. You hav raised her to a life—you know not of what; you hav raised her to liv you know not how—you know not where. She missed a few roses, but many thorns; some sunshine, but more shadow. We who hav lived and not in vain hav learned that in this life, though there be flowers and gilt, glitter and gold, yet there are many more thorns than roses, more clouds and shadows and shade than sunshine.

They tell us that heaven is built alone on desire. We wish for it, therefere we believe in it. It may be so with some, perhaps with many, but as for me, though I believe in a future life, yet I know not if it is desirable. As I said before, if it be but a continuation of this life, then giv me instead the tuneless harp of endless silence, and with it folded to my breast let me lie down to that sweet peace found alone in a dreamless sleep, an endless sleep, a sleep that feels no awaking. Would I liv another life like this? No, no, no. If the power were mine to will I would not choose another life, nor had I in the past chosen this. JAMES POE CRYDER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a panse in the day's occnpations
That is known as the Children's Honr."

A Gentleman.

I knew him for a gentleman
By signs that never fail.
His coat was rongh and rather worn,
His cheeks were thin and pale—
A lad who had his way to make,
With little time for play—
I knew him for a gentleman
By certain signs to-day.

He met his mother on the street,
Off came his little cap.
My door was shnt—he waited there
Until I heard his rap.
He took the bnndle from my hand,
And when I dropped my pen,
He sprang to pick it np for me,
This gentleman of ten.

He does not push and crowd along,
His voice is gently pitched;
He does not fling his books abont
As if he were bewitched;
He stands aside to let yon pass;
He always shuts the door;
He runs on errands willingly,
To forge and mill and store.

He thinks of yon before himself,
He serves yon if he can;
For in whatever company
The manners make the man,
At ten or forty 'tis the same,
The manner tells the tale,
And I discern the gentleman
By signs that never fail.

A Gallant Rescue.

Here is a very charming cat and dog story, for the truth and accuracy of which the proud inhabitants of the Swiss village where it occurred quite recently are, one and all, ready to vouch.

A troublesome cat in the village had been doomed to a watery death, and the children of the owner had been told off to take it in a sack to the river Aar and there to drown it. The house dog accompanied the party to the execution, which was carried out according to parental instructions. But, much to the surprise of the inmates, a short time after the cat and dog, both soaking wet, reappeared together at their owner's door.

This is what had happened: The dog, on seeing that the sack containing the cat was thrown into the river, jumped after it, seized it with his teeth, dragged it to the bank, tore it open and restored his friend the cat to life and liberty. It goes without saying that the death warrant of the cat was destroyed after this marvelous escapade.—London Million.

Jimmieboy's Letter to Santa Claus.

Dear Santa Claus, if you could bring
A patent doll to dance and sing,
A five-pound box of caramels,
A set of reins with silver bells;

An elephant that roars and walks,
A Brownie doll that laughs and talks,
A humming-top that I can spin,
A desk to keep my treasures in;

A boat or two that I can sail,
A dog to bark and wag his tail,
A pair of little bantam chicks,
A chest of tools, a box of tricks;

A scarlet suit of soldier togs,
A spear and net for catching frogs,
A bicycle and silver watch,
A pound or two of butter scotch;

A small toy farm with lots of trees,
A gun to load with beans and peas,
An organ and a music box,
A double set of building blocks—

If you will bring me these, I say,
Before the coming Christmas day,
I sort of think, perhaps, that I'd Be pretty nearly satisfied.

—Harper's Young People.

Christmas in the Backwoods.

"Well, my good man, going to hav a Christmas tree this year?"

"Yes; done got it."

"Indeed!"

"That's what!"

"Where is it?"

"Hit's down thar in the swamp, an' ef the dogs don't tell no lies, thar's a 'possum up it."

What Boys Should Know.

Six things a boy ought to know:

That a quiet voice, courtesy, and kind acts are asessential to the part in the world of a gentleman as a gentlewoman.

That roughness, blustering, and even foolhardiness are not manliness. The most firm and courageous men hav usually been the most gen'le.

That muscular strength is not health.

That a brain crammed only with facts is not necessarily a wise one.

That the labor impossible to the boy of fourteen will be easy to the man of twenty.

The best capital for a boy is not money, but love of work, simple tastes, and a heart loyal to his friends.

Looking Up.

Dick: "I wish we had a great big dictionary."

Tom: "Do you want to look for something?"

"Dick: "Yep; the preserved cherries grandma put up on the shelf, that I can't reach standing on a chair."

Teaching His Teacher.

Jack: "Miss Sharppin, tell me how many peas are there in a pint?"

Teacher: "How can I tell, you foolish boy?"

Jack: "Well, I can. There's always one 'P' in a pint, yah!"

Correspondence.

McPherson, Kan., Nov. 29, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: I take pleasure in writing to the Children's Corner. My little sister Susie is just taking her first steps. I hav a little brother by the name of Ingersoll Stanley; he is three years old. I hav a little cousin three years old, and he has no name yet. Let us try to find him one. I forgot to tell you we liv in the country five miles from McPherson. Mamma said, "If Miss Wixon would see little Susie she would not think her very sweet, her face all smeared up with apple-butter." I am twelve years old and go to school. Yours, Carrie S. Kubin.

P.S.—I would like some boys and girls to write to me, and I will gladly answer.

[Little Susie's apple-buttered face is just as sweet, and sweeter, if anything. Now, who will suggest a name for the dear little three-year's-old boy? Surely he ought to hav a name by this time.—Ed. C. C.]

Andover, Kan., Nov. 22, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon and Friends of The Truth Seeker: I presume that all of you hav forgotten me, but I hav not you. I am away from home at school, and do not see The Truth Seeker very often, as the place where I am staying is of that turn of mind that dates back to the time of David (only they do not like dancing). My teacher quotes scripture in school a great many times, but we Infidel pupils hav to hold our tongues. One day he explained the six days and six nights to the school. He said that the days and nights, as used in the Bible, meant long periods of time. He was clear of saying anything about the morning and evening, as does the Bible. Of course Clark Braden made that plain to him, for he is my teacher's idol. He also said that David was a man after God's own heart until he became bad. He did not tell us whose heart he was after then. My opinion is he was after human hearts.

I am secretary of the Social Science Union at present. We hav done nothing very wonderful as yet, but we are progressing rapidly. It is still in its infancy. Many of its members are young people, and are very busy in school. We are going to giv a dance Thanksgiving eve at the G. A. R. hall, Andover. I think it will be a success. I will close with good wishes for all of my Liberal friends, and success to The Truth Seeker,

Yours for truth and justice,
Lottie Wolfe.

[It is too bad that your teacher does not know that his business is to teach and explain secular subjects, and not the scriptures. Schooltime is too precious to waste in that way.—Ed. C. C.]

[extract from a letter.]

South Butler, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav been reading your book, "Right Living," and find it very interesting. Hav also loaned it to a number of my pious friends, and they concur in my judgment. I wish more such books could be read by the masses. We might then hope for greater progress in this poor world. Your book is a practical one. That, in my judgment, is the very best way to light the dark places in this world, and drive from the mind of the human race the illusion regarding God and hell and the old ideas that hav so long held the mind of human-kind in bondage. When I think of the injustice practiced on those who are unable to discern it, I almost lose faith in the fidelity of human-kind. I am somewhat of an optimist, after all, and believe, with Tennyson, "that good shall fall at last—far off—at last, to all—and every winter change to spring." But I do not believe that what is called God is going to bring it about. Humanity will make all the changes that are ever made. What people call God is simply a myth, nothing more or less. And every intelligent man and woman is aware of that fact to-day.

Like Ingersoll, "About the phantoms called gods and their impossible hells, I I hav no care, no fear."

I hope you will hav a good sale for "Right Living." The merits of the book deserve it.

Feeling interested in your welfare, because I believe you a benefactor, I sincerely wish you a great degree of success. Yours sincerely, C. Newton Wheeler.

[Thank you, dear friend, for kind appreciation of our efforts.—Ed. C. C.]

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By George J. Romanes.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Gems of Thought.

MEN are builders of their own destiny, and more especially of the destiny of their children.

IN all ancient Christian literature there is not one word that tells the slave to revolt, or that tells the master to liberate the slave, or even that touches the problem of public right which arises out of slavery.—Ernest Renan.

STUDYING Sociology scientifically leads to fairer appreciations of different parties, political, religious, and other. The conception initiated and developed by social science is at the same time radical and conservativ—radical to a degree beyond anything which current radicalism conceives; conservativ to a degree beyond anything conceived by present conservatism.—Herbert Spencer.

WHATEVER givs literature spontaneity, candor, profundity, bringing the word direct from its human background, must commend itself to a ripe intelligence. Genuinness is inestimable. Genuinness plus breadth adds by more than double to the wealth of expression. Dialect may be classic. By independence of model and tradition, by entire abandon to immediate inspirations, an artist accomplishes a comprehensiv purpose.—Horace L. Traubel.

MOST people nowadays think, either explicitly or virtually, that the highest and noblest thing in life is to dwell upon the attributes of imaginary beings, and to merit by more or less ascetic observance their aid and approval. The hedonist sets men free from such slavish ideals. He shows them that it is better to stand erect like a man than to grovel like a dog before an angry master; to face the cosmos than to tremble at it; to love beauty and goodness and purity for their own sakes, than to reject the first, to pursue the second through hope of gain, and to confound the third with repression and unwholesomeness.—Grant Allen.

IT is only dull people who associate brilliancy with superficiality, and imagin that because a man is witty he must, therefore, be shallow. Going over the writings of Voltaire, I am as struck by the soundness of his judgments as by his facility of expression. · · · A book might be written on Voltaire's anticipations of modern thought. He accepted the view of man's savage origin. He derived the belief in ghosts from dreams, and discerned the magical nature of early religion. He anticipated most of the social and political problems of our time. He stated the population question before Malthus. He cleared the way for modern science.—J. M. Wheeler.

WE are superstitious, and esteem the statute somewhat; so much life as it has in the character of living men, is its force. The statute stands there to say, Yesterday we agreed so and so, but how feel ye about this article to-day? Our statute is a currency, which we stamp with our own portrait; it soon becomes unrecognizable, and in process of time will return to the mint. Nature is not democratic, nor limited monarchal, but despotic, and will not be fooled or abated of any jot of her authority by the pertest of her sons; and as fast as the public mind is opened to more intelligence, the code is seen to be brute and stammering. It speaks not articulately, and must be made to. Meantime the education of the general never stops.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

WHY the outcry made against the nude in art? If we are to hav truth, why not pure truth? Why half truth? The answer comes from the jungles of India, where prehistoric anchorites sought, by mortification of the flesh, to achieve a life, half in this world, half in another; from the desert cells where early Christian devotees, deriving a half knowledge from Indian sources, sought salvation in starvation, scourging, and neglect of the body—the temple of the soul. During the formativ period of the now so-called Christian faith and dogma (orthodox), during the time when the pure knowledge and belief of the early disciples was aggregating to itself the vast mass of Indian, Greek, and other folk-lore, myths, traditions, rites, and customs, in which it now lies incrusted, the question of clothing the body was, among other things, by degrees, considered and settled. As physical culture had formed part of the Græco-Roman system of nature worship, and as men had shown honor to the gods by appearing nude in the arena and the temple, so these monkish factions rapidly settled upon the opposit theory, that the right way to honor god was to degrade and conceal the body. All bodily perfection and physical beauty were condemned, and in conformity with these ideas the degraded art of the early Christian centuries shows us drawings of shapeless, attenuated bodies, with pipe-stem arms and legs, swaddled in masses of drapery. Such was the origin of the modern attitude toward the nude in art.—Roger Cunningham, in American Art Printer.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE
THE
BETTER WORLD.
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will hav the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies. - - - - - - $1.00
Fifty copies, - - - - - - 4.50
One hundred copies - - - - 8.00

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES
A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

A good story is told of a number of boys who were playing on Saturday in front of an Episcopal church. The rector suddenly came out of his parsonage and told the boys to be quiet in front of the Lord's house. "That is all right, mister," said the boys. "The Lord is not here to-day. He is down the street at the Jewish synagog."—Jewish Messenger.

The South Carolina Presbytery, at a recent meeting, received into its membership, after examination, the Rev. James Woodrow, D.D., who has been under a cloud for some time on account of certain views about the descent of man which he is supposed to hav entertained. He was asked if he believed the holy scriptures contained in the Word of God, and answered that he did. Further: "Do you believe that Moses wrote the Pentateuch?" "Most of it, sir." "What portion do you think he did not write?" "The account of his own death."—Argonaut.

DAMP! OR BE DAMNED!

A CHRISTIAN RONDEAU.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."—Jesus Christ.

Unless you're damped you'll go to hell,
Howe'er your trustful faith may swell!
  As Jews perforce were circumcised,
  Believers must be all baptized:
Or else, as scriptures plainly tell,
In endless fires be made to yell
By him that "doeth all things well."
  O yes! you'll all be carbonized
    Unless you're damped.

Belief alone will ne'er repel
Old Nick, nor break his wicked spell;
  But faith and damp, we're all advised,
  Will render Satan exorcised.
Now, don't forget! you'll go to hell
    Unless you're damped.

FIXING THE RESPONSIBILITY.

"How did you fiad matters over at Boomopolis?" asked the able editor of the Hawville Clarion, of Colonel Handy Polk, the enterprising real estate agent, who had been spending a few days in a neighborlng settlement.

"There is nothing going on over there worth mentioniug," replied the colonel, "except a lively row between the rainmakers, the Salvation Army, and a few other parties, over who deserves the credit for breaking up the long drouth. You see, the town offered a purse of two hundred dollars for a good soaking rain, and just about the time the rainmakers began operations, the Salvation Army commenced praying for the same blessing. Both parties labored zealously, and three or four days ago the rain came down in torrents. Well, then, when the rainmakers came up for their money the Salvationists put in a claim for it on the ground that the flood was produced by prayer and not by mechanical means. A little later, there came the Methodists with the announcement that the credit belonged to neither party, but to a kind and beneficent providence, alone; while up jumped the Populists with the pessimistic assertion that it rained because they were having a basket picnic on that day. What few Infidels there are in the settlement deny the claims of everybody else, and say that it rained just because it happened to. Hop Wing, the Chinese laundryman, credits the blessing to his joss, in a sort of left-handed way, alleging that he got tired of pampering his idol to no purpose, and whirled in and pounded the blockhead regularly every day till the lazy rascal got down to business and made it rain. It looks as if the court would hav to be called in to straighten out the complication. Meanwhile, several farmers living on the river and along Bitter Creek are patiently waiting for the responsibility to be settled, so that they can begin action for damages on account of their crops having been washed out by the flood."—Puck.

THE striking cloakmakers of this city who were locked out by their employers are now being evicted by their landlords for non-payment of rent.

THE Bethlehem Company has received the contract for 12,000 tons of armor plate for Russian iron-clads, bidding against the great European iron manufacturers.

THE United States Supreme Court has affirmed the constitutionality of the Massachusetts law forbidding the sale of oleomargarine and butterine colored to resemble butter.

JUDGE GRAHAM at Denver decided that the Colorado law which forbids insurance companies to write insurance on the lives of children under ten years of age is unconstitutional.

HENRY L. NELSON, for six years a member of the World's editorial staff, has become editor of Harper's Weekly, taking the place which has been vacant since the death of George William Curtis.

DR. KISSEL, a member of the Pension Examining Board of Ossian, Iowa, who was indicted for complicity with Agent Van Leuven in pension frauds, pleaded guilty on Dec. 18 and was fined $5,000.

A SEVERE storm swept the coast of Northwestern Europe the latter part of last week. It destroyed houses, caused the overflow of rivers, and wrecked a large number of vessels. Many lives were lost.

THE House passed the Forest Reservation bill by a vote of 159 to 63. The Army Appropriation bill also passed. Among its provisions is one transfering the Leavenworth military prison to the Department of Justice.

ERASTUS F. BEADLE, who made a fortune in "dime novels" before the dawn of the present era of cheap literature, died at his residence in Cooperstown, New York, on Dec. 18. He was born there Sept. 11, 1821.

JERE HARALSON, once a member of Congress from Alabama, and lately an attorney at Pine Bluff, Ark., has just been sentenced to two years' imprisonment or to pay a fine of $5,000 for pension swindling. He will go to jail.

ON Dec, 18 Henri Brisson, who was Prime Minister on the fall of Jules Ferry in 1885, was elected President of the French Chamber of Deputies to succeed the late M. Burdeau, by a vote of 249 to 213 for M. Meline, the French protectionist leader.

JAMES LUSK ALCORN, formerly very prominent in the politics of Mississippi, having filled, among other offices, those of governor and United Sates Senator, died at Eagle Nest in that state on Dec. 20. He was the founder of the state levee system, and was born in Golconda, Ill., on Nov. 14, 1816.

THE Rev. George Edward Ellis, who was at one time president of the Massachusetts Historical Society, filled editorial positions on the Christian Register and Christian Examiner, and was otherwise prominent in the Unitarian church, died in Boston on Dec. 20. He was born in that city on Aug. 8, 1814.

A STRONG effort is being made to break the monopoly of the Standard Oil Company. Combinations of independent dealers in kerosene hav been formed in Ohio, Florida, Texas, Massachusetts, and other states. The independent pipe line is already completed to Wilkesbarre, and oil is being run through it to the seaboard. This places the independents on an equality with the Standard.

THE Court of Appeals of New York has affirmed the judgment under which the state Board of Canvassers were fined for contempt of court in canvassing the "Mylod" returns from Dutchess county in 1891. It was this matter which became known as the "Maynard case," and resulted in the defeat of Judge Maynard last year and of Mr. Hill this year, and also gave the Constitutional Convention to the Republicans.

IT is reported that the Chinese government has sent envoys to Japan to sue for peace. Charges are made by the correspondent of the World, who is with the Japanese army under Marshal Oyama, that the Japanese soldiers committed great outrages when they entered Port Arthur, and for three days thereafter, and that more than 2,000 non-combatants were slaughtered. The correspondent of the Herald, who is also on the scene, denies that there was a massacre, and says that the victorious troops did nothing more than could hav been expected under the circumstances, and that they were justified in what they did. The correspondent of the London Times, which paper is not friendly to the Japanese, concurs in the opinion of the Herald's correspondent.

AT the last day's session of the Federation of Labor in Denver it was decided that trades unions as a party shall not take up political matters; that the Federation will not co-operate with the Knights of Labor until its officers shall show a spirit more favorable to trade unionism, and that it will oppose compulsory arbitration. In the case of the Debs decision it was unanimously voted to demand the enactment of a law setting a limit beyond which "equity Courts" may not go.

ON Dec. 18 Sergeant Taylor testified before the Lexow Committee that he had received bribe money from patrolmen and turned it over to Inspector Henry V. Steers, lately retired. He also implicated Inspector McAvoy. Half a dozen policemen and one ex-ward man testified that they had received this bribe money and turned all or some of it over to Captains Schmittberger, Gastlin, and Allaire, and Acting-Captain Taylor (above mentioned). On Dec. 21 Captain Schmittberger made a full confession before the Committee. Being already under indictment, it is probable that this confession will save him from the penitentiary. He implicated Ex-Sergeant Liebers, Ex-Captain Devery, Captain Price, Ex-Inspector Steers, Inspectors Williams and McAvoy, Ex-Commissioner McClave, and Commissioners John C. Sheehan and James J. Martin, the latter president of the Board of Police Commissioners.

ZECHARIAH HATH THE NIGHTMARE.

To the Senate and Assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York:

We citizens of the State of New York, respectfully request you to repeal the Sunday law of this State. We ask this because,

First, Sunday being a period of time of precisely the same nature as Saturday or Monday, there is no natural reason for its being elevated above or depressed below the other days of the week.

Second, Said Sunday law is, in the best possible view of it, useless; it is wholly inoperative as a conserver of the rights of any inhabitant of the State.

Third, It is invasive of the equal rights of the citizens of the State, an impertinent meddling with their private affairs, and its effect is to disturb their peace and rob them of their earnings.

Fourth, In making or amending our laws, common sense and experience should be the guides, instead of sentiment—religious or otherwise. Experience has demonstrated that Sunday laws are not observed by the people, and common sense teaches that, in the nature of things, they never will be, for it cannot be wrong to do on one day what it is right to do on another. The people, feeling this and knowing this, will not be governed by the dead churchmen who made these laws, which are anachronistic and have been perpetuated by hypocrisy. Here we will call your attention to the words of Martin Luther, a churchman we are willing to put against the ecclesiastics of to-day: "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it. . . . If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance upon a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it—to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty."

Fifth, Sunday laws are vicious, for they are used as instruments of blackmail and of cruel oppression by the police of the cities, as the revelations of the Lexow Committee abundantly show. They produce more crime than they could possibly prevent, for blackmail is more immoral than drinking.

Sixth, All such laws are essentially religious in their intent and effect and as such they are opposed to the spirit of our institutions, which do not favor the union of church and state. The Sunday law of the State of New York is no exception to the rule, and it should be immediately repealed in the interest of religious liberty, if for no other reason. This law is a survival from the time when there was a state church and the civil power enforced the Sunday law of the state church, just as it enforced that church's blasphemy and heresy statutes. But where there is no state church the state has nothing to do with the enforcement of the domestic rules of any church or those of Christianity in its entirety.

For these and other reasons we ask the entire repeal of the Sunday laws rather than a patching which shall discriminate against one business and foster another. We ask that the liquor trade be subject to the same rules on Sunday that it is on other days, and the same with all other kinds of business. It is not proper for the state to legislate in the interests of any legitimate trade as against any other legitimate trade, and we ask your careful attention to this admitted fact and particularly ask you to bear in mind the also admitted fact that Sunday laws are a fruitul source and an adequate means of blackmail.
